Preface

A New Kind of Book

The authors of this book are academics who studied Olaylarla Türk Dış Politikası (Turkish Foreign Policy through Events), the main book used in Turkish universities in this field since the end of 1960s.

The surest sign of the success of a book is when the people who have used it cease to be satisfied with it at some point. This also applies to a person, an institution, or a system. Having grown up with this textbook, we have assimilated it to such an extent that we rarely refer to it in this book. Because we now consider it to have become inadequate, we have written the present work.

Why inadequate? Above all, because, in effect, it ended in 1971. The rest was very brief, consisting almost exclusively of headings. Overall, the authors determined what subjects would be dealt with, whereas it should have been the other way around. The book had no editor, so it did not have internal consistency. It lacked a unified style, and its language had become archaic. Because it was a product of the Cold War years, it was difficult for the authors to diverge from commonly held views, which gave the book an "official history" flavor. To cite an example, the Sadabad Pact signed by Turkey, Iran, Iraq, and Afghanistan was described as being directed against Italy.

Bearing in mind that the readership in Turkey for foreign policy books is relatively restricted, the authors felt that the present book, the result of the labors of fourteen specialists working together over three and a half years, should be broader in scope than a specialized university textbook. That is why it was written with an eye to appeal even to high school graduates interested in the subject.

Approach, Form, and Content

The present book has been conceived and realized with this novel approach in mind. First, each contribution has been based on a carefully worked-out plan and repeatedly reviewed by the editor. In this manner, all the contributions conform to the same standard. Special care has been taken to make the text readable. Explanatory notes have been provided in boxes for those concepts and terms that may not be familiar to the average reader.

Second, the authors have been selected according to the subject. That is to say, instead of having a particular author write about a certain period, each subject has been entrusted to an expert.

The third distinguishing feature is that the book may be read vertically in chronological order or horizontally according to themes. In other words, the reader can follow Turkey's policies vis-à-vis all countries over a certain period (say, 1919 to 1923) or can study Turkey's policies in relation to a specific country in different periods from 1919 to 2006. In this manner, we have eliminated the shortcomings of the exclusively chronological approach, where the reader cannot follow the relations with a specific country without interruptions, and the shortcomings of the thematic approach, where relations with specific countries cannot be seen in relation to the full historical background of the period.

Fourth, the different periods represent all parts of the theoretical approach outlined in the introduction and not disjointed bilateral relations. Care has been taken to integrate the periods to bring out the continuity of foreign policy.

Fifth, we have taken steps at the beginning of the discussion of each period to provide the reader with a view of the period in its differing aspects and also as a whole. We have included tables that contain the names of the principal actors in foreign policy (head of state, head of government, minister of foreign affairs, secretary-general/permanent undersecretary of the ministry) and the dates of their tenures. The chapter "Appraisal of the Period" first analyzes "The International Environment and Dynamics" as well as "The Domestic Environment and Dynamics" before discussing the foreign policy produced by these factors and examining bilateral relations. Our intention is to provide not snapshots but a reel of film. At the same time, detailed tables containing data on Turkey's foreign economic relations and macroeconomic performance are also included, because foreign policy cannot be studied without reference to economic developments.

Finally, in addition to its novel approach, this book also offers the reader new findings on Turkey's foreign relations. An example is the section dealing with payments relating to Mosul petroleum.

What must be emphasized about this book's approach is the great effort that has been made to attain maximum objectivity. In providing and interpreting data and information, we have consistently adopted a neutral position. Facts appearing to favor Turkey have not been exaggerated; nor have facts reflecting negatively on Turkey been suppressed. The information has been reflected accurately without embellishment.

From the point of view of language, the Turkish names for Aegean islands are accompanied by the Greek names in parentheses. When interpreting a provision of a treaty, we generally provide the original text rather than summarizing the provision. We did not want the reader to accept our interpretation without seeing the original text. We have avoided using expressions like "we," "our country," "our nation," and "our foreign policy," preferring to use "Turkey," "Turkish foreign policy," and "Turkey's interest."

In regard to substance, we have tried to maintain objectivity by making sure that each country's system and views are reflected before taking up its bilateral relations with Turkey, because interpretations without understanding the other side or knowing its motives could easily lead to error. Thus we have made an effort to explain the internal politics and external relations and viewpoints of countries such as the U.S., the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR), and Greece with which Turkey has maintained intensive relations.

The reason for this approach is not only to achieve objectivity but also to enable those who pursue Turkey's interests to do this more effectively by seeing the viewpoint of the other side. If young people today are taught to believe that "in such and such a case we were right and country X was wrong" with no explanation of what the other side's arguments were, then they can commit serious errors when they reach positions of responsibility, for the facts might be very different from what they were taught. The conduct of foreign policy leaves no room for error, because the stakes are extremely high.

Another characteristic of this book is its interdisciplinary approach. All important concepts and technical terms are explained in a concise form in separate boxes to enable those who are not familiar with Turkish foreign policy to follow the text without referring to other sources. During the courses on diplomatic history that I gave as guest professor at the Department of International Relations of a not-so-newly established university in 1995 and 1996, I discovered that my students did not have an adequate knowledge of general history, Turkish foreign policy, international law, political science, economics, current international affairs, or philosophy. Therefore I was forced to provide background information in parentheses to enable my students to overcome their limitations. This method worked very well, and the information contained in boxes in this book serves the same purpose.

In addition, we have included illustrations and maps to facilitate the use of this book and render it more effective, thus making the use of an atlas unnecessary. We have tried to liven up the text by including political cartoons and photographs.

The order in which we present Turkey's bilateral relations is designed to facilitate the reader's understanding of the subject. Historical events to which reference is frequently made (like Montreux, Mosul, and Hatay) are explained more extensively and in greater detail. Unless otherwise stated, documents and treaty texts are drawn from İsmail Soysal's book, which is the most comprehensive source on the subject. For the texts relating to Mudros, Sèvres, and Lausanne, unless otherwise indicated, we have relied on the research of Seha L. Meray and Osman Olcay.

Spelling, Explanatory Notes, and Acknowledgments

Having placed explanatory information in the boxes, we indicate sources in parentheses in the text when the material is attributable to a single study or in the case of a dissenting opinion or an important piece of information or interpretation. When dealing with Turkish proper names after 1934, we use surnames, which became compulsory for Turkish citizens at that time (for example, Atatürk). For periods before 1934, we employ the name in use at that time (for example, Mustafa Kemal); at the first mention of the name, we indicate the future surname in square brackets (for example, Yusuf Kemal [Tengirşenk]).

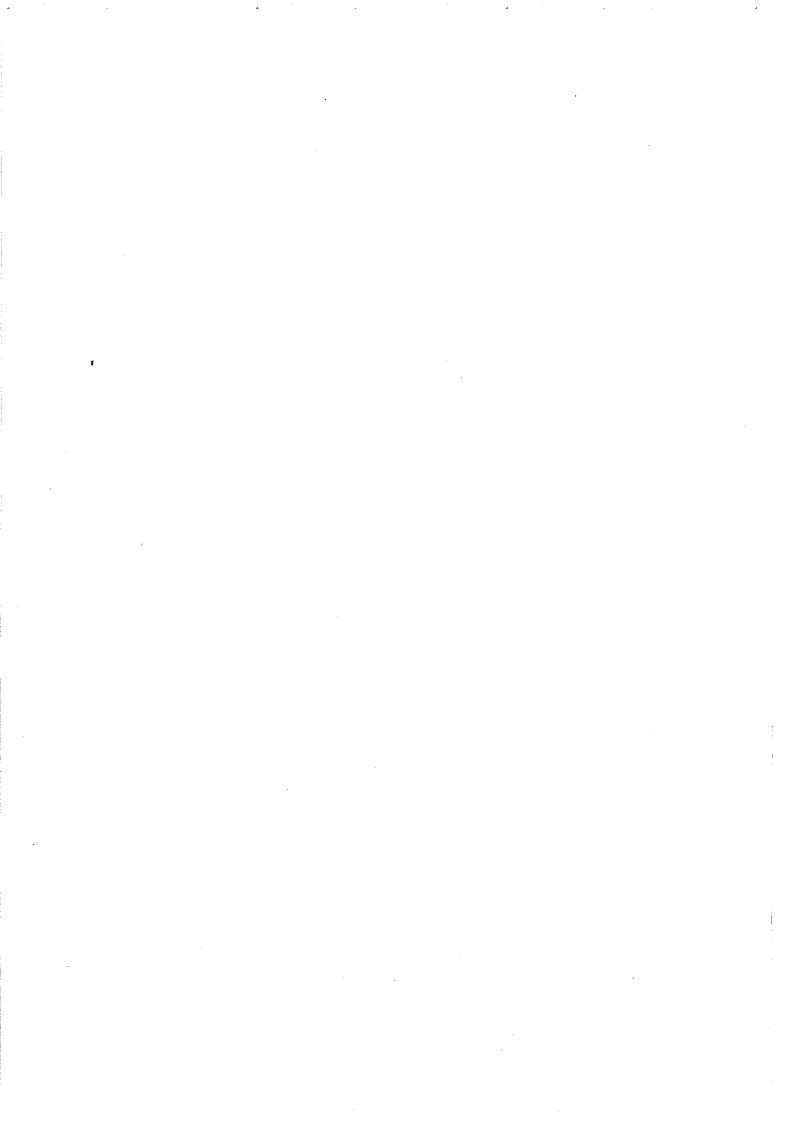

This is a long book. Despite all our efforts, errors may have crept into its pages. We would appreciate the reader's assistance in identifying these errors and letting us know by sending an e-mail message to us at oran@politics.ank ara.edu.tr. We will gladly acknowledge your correspondence and make sure the necessary rectifications are made in future editions.

Finally, we would like to acknowledge the valuable assistance provided to us. The authors would like to thank the following friends and scholars: Hüsnü Abbas, Mustafa Akkaya, Sina Akşin, Ayşenur Alpaslan, Ali Arsın, Mustafa Kemal Basa, Sertaç Başeren, Abdülrezak Bilgin, Hakan Bingün, Ali Rıza Cihan, Nezih Danyal, Gökhan Erdem, Aydemir Erman, Haluk Gerger, Bülent Gökay, Mustafa İsen, Orhan Koloğlu, Hasan Köni, Deniz Kuru, Bilsay Kuruç, Gün Kut, Faruk Loğoğlu, Ünal Maraşlı, Bülent Meriç, Necil Nedimoğlu, Tan Oral, Nimet Özbek, İnan Özyıldız, Yücel Sayman, İstemihan Talay, İlhan Tekeli, Eser Torun, Nihat Tuna, and Nuri Yeşilyurt. Special gratitude is of course due to Mustafa Akşin, who translated the book; to Ünal Ünsal, who reviewed the text; and to our copyeditor, Kathy Burford Lewis, who checked everything.

As editor, I would like to note that it is a rare event for so many scholars to work together for years to produce a book with unity and consistency. I owe a special debt of gratitude to my colleagues who read and contributed to my portion of the text and who responded positively to all my requests during our three and a half years of collaboration.

As this book was being written and especially in the final stages, my wife, Feyhan, stayed up with me until dawn and with her ever-bright disposition never allowed me to get a true inkling of how much she had been neglected. To her, I offer a terse "thank you" full of love.

Introduction

Turkish Foreign Policy in Theory and Practice

From Empire to Nation-State: Similarities and Differences in Foreign Policy

The many similarities and differences between the Ottoman Empire and the Turkish Republic are also reflected in their foreign policies.

The foreign policies of these two states exhibit striking similarities, because they share the same geography and population, with one being the successor of the other.

Both have based their existence on two basic tenets: to be aware of the balance of power and use it for survival and to steer clear of wars involving others unless directly threatened.

The early phases of the Ottoman Empire were characterized by the drive to conquer ever more territory. Once this expansion was checked in the seventeenth century, however, its foreign policy, like that of its predecessor the Byzantine Empire, was compelled to take the course of relying on the prevailing balance of power. Yet in the final phase the Ottoman Empire got involved in the inferno of World War I, when it could very well have kept out. This decision by Enver Paşa is the only such example and brought the empire to its end.

Although the similarities in the foreign policies of the two states are numerous, the differences arising from the contrasting philosophies of the two states are also considerable.

The Ottoman Empire was based on the principle of immutability. It wanted to preserve a multinational, multireligious, multisectarian empire within its existing borders and its heterogeneous population despite the advent of the age of nationalism, without making any changes in its basic political, economic, and ideological structure.

The founding of the Turkish Republic, in contrast, is based on the principle of change. It strove to ensure its survival on a smaller territory, with a fairly homogeneous population. It is also attempting to restructure itself fundamentally, according to the model of a Western contemporary civilization. It is aware that its predecessor fell because it failed to adapt to changing conditions.

This book traces the reflection of this change process in the country's foreign policy. It also describes how the Turkish Republic's failings in conforming to "contemporary civilization" led to difficulties in its foreign relations.

We can now look into the factors influencing foreign policy after the demise of the Ottoman Empire.

The Overall Framework of Turkish Foreign Policy

Basic Factors Influencing Turkish Foreign Policy

We can study the elements affecting Turkish foreign policy under the following headings. These elements can be positive or negative, giving this foreign policy a complex character.

A. The Cultural Dimension

Turkey has numerous ties and links to various cultures. These can be classified as Central Asian, Middle Eastern-Islamic, and Western.

Central Asian

The origin of the Turks of Asia Minor is Central Asia. The traces of this are still visible. About 97% of Turkey's territory lies in Asia. Its society bears the traces of feudal and nomadic cultures. The prevalence of kebabs (grilled meat) and pita bread in the popular cuisine attests that nomadic people do not grow vegetables and must confine their diets to meat and cereals. In domestic politics the tendency is to eliminate an adversary rather than to seek a compromise to attain a win-win situation. It cannot be said that politicians are of a high caliber. There is a tendency to rely on strong leaders rather than on sound institutions. When a military coup occurs, it is able to gather popular support because the people are more used to authority than to democracy, whether in the family or in public life.

Another Central Asian trait is that people often stoically accept oppression and difficulty but, at the same time, may be easily roused and may show disproportionate reactions. This can also carry into foreign relations. A rational negotiator can be taken by surprise to encounter a violent reaction after long and patient negotiations. This trait can also occasionally lead to the breakdown of negotiations and bargaining sessions, with one side walking out or "going into a sulk."

Democracy in Turkey is relatively new and without deep roots. Capital punishment was abolished only in 2003 and after fierce resistance. The concept of human rights is novel and fuzzy. Especially when proposed from outside, it can trigger a reaction reaching a kind of xenophobia.

Middle Eastern-Islamic

The full extent of the Middle East has never been properly defined, and the concept remains blurry. It is not surprising to hear people exclaim: "This is Turkey, you can expect anything, anytime."

The common denominator of Middle Eastern countries is Islam, and Turkey's population is 98% Muslim. This religious factor becomes clearly discernible when Muslim Bosnians or Chechens are persecuted abroad. At the same time, Russia is perceived as a traditional enemy of Islam, which resulted in popular sentiment against communism before the demise of the USSR, which in turn created support for the U.S. Turkey is a stranger to Islamic principles, however; the state functions according to secular principles.

The second distinguishing feature of the Middle East is the prevalence of Arabism in this region. Turkey is foreign to this factor, which excludes it from the Middle East.

Western

Although only 3% of Turkey's territory lies in Europe, Western influence in the country is strong. Turkey is the country in the Middle East that is closest to the West in every respect and the most Westernized. Turkey and Israel are the only democracies in the region.

Furthermore, Turkey is the most radical if not the only Muslim state in the world that pursues a policy of laicism/laicization (Box Intro-1). Among the capitalist countries, Turkey carried out the most radical and most successful revolution from above. In this manner Turkey

Box Intro-1. Laicism-Secularism

These two words are often considered synonymous. This is incorrect. Laicism is attributable to the state, whereas secularism is attributable to society. The former is a state policy, whereas the latter characterizes society.

Religion is the cohesive ideology of feudal (agrarian) societies. For this reason, in societies still bearing feudal traces the relationship between state and religion is quite different than in those societies where such traces have been eliminated.

Turkey is an excellent example of the first category. Members of the Westernized elite, in conformity with the constitutional principle of laicism, find themselves in a constant struggle to ensure that the country is run along rational, laical principles and not religious principles as embodied in the Sharia. This is the policy of laicism of the "revolution from above." The reverse situation is the one that prevails in Sharia-run countries like Saudi Arabia. In addition, in "gray" countries like Egypt, unlike Turkey, no policy of laicism or laicization can be implemented.

In countries of the second category the state does not need to pursue policies of laicization, because all vestiges of feudalism that might defend the principles of running the state along religious principles have long since been eliminated by the bourgeois revolutions. These societies have been secularized. Britain and France (since 1905) are examples of this (France followed laicization policies between 1789 and 1905 and ended up by secularizing its society).

The U.S. is a special case, because it never passed through a feudal phase. Thanks to European immigration, it went directly from the tribal stage to commercial capitalism. That is why the U.S. has always remained strictly aloof from all religious faiths. By the first amendment of its Constitution, the federal government can neither interfere with nor provide any backing for any particular religious faith. In a multiethnic society with many religions, the federal government must operate on this basis of neutrality. When people and institutions with religiously inclined ideologies in Turkey allude to the "American model of laicism" they have in mind the noninterference of the U.S. government in religious affairs.

It is also necessary to deal with the laicism-democracy dilemma in this context.

As the case of France cited above suggests, the goal of a laicization policy is to bring about a secular society. In this process it is to be expected that the principle of democracy will suffer, because the majority with a feudal mindset will want to support those who use religion for political ends. If we insist on complying with democratic rectitude, we must resign ourselves to achieving the secularization of society at the slow pace of the society's internal dynamics. Such a slow pace would have negative effects on basic human rights and, in particular, women's rights.

Conversely, a laicization policy pursued without restraint can turn into a form of repression in the hands of the elite. That is why laical policies should have the primary objective of preventing the interference of religion in state affairs, while keeping the state from getting involved with the religious preferences and worship of the individual.

To summarize, a secular society is essential for democracy. Consequently, laical policies designed to bring this about are good for democracy. But if these policies are not implemented with sensitivity they can violate democratic principles. The best way of preventing this is to soften the laicism policy and strive to achieve a broad social consensus to the extent that the religious establishment stops aspiring to political power and becomes integrated within the country's political system. Only then can the American form of laicism be achieved in Turkey.

deliberately detached its superstructure from Ottoman history, language, and culture (that is, from Central Asia and the Middle East), and its ruling elite became Westernized. In fact, the Westernization of the elite started about a century earlier (after 1839) than for the elite of developing countries with a colonial history (Box Intro-2).

As a result, this cultural dimension of Turkey is in direct contradiction with its other two cultural dimensions. A second consequence is that Turkey is not considered Western by the West. Third, most Turks suffer from an identity problem, having to choose between the Eastern/Middle Eastern culture and Western culture. Fourth, the differentiation between the elite and the masses is not negligible.

Nevertheless, members of the elite, who determine the direction of both domestic and especially foreign policy, are definitely Westernized. This ensures that Western values will prevail in the structure of the state over the medium and long term. That is why it is natural that Turkey should constantly seek to align itself with the West and with Western institutions.

B. The Historical Dimension

The Turkish Republic is the state that brought the Ottoman Empire to an end. Nevertheless, it acquired from this great empire many of its features.

The Ottoman Empire was a European state, even if it was referred to as the "sick man of Europe." The great majority of the Ottoman viziers, well until the empire's expansion stopped at the end of the seventeenth century, originated as Islamicized Christian boys from the Rumeli/European provinces of the empire. Especially in the period after the conquest of Constantinople in 1453, grand viziers of Anatolian/Turkish origin were rare; seven out of nine grand viziers of Suleiman the Magnificent were of Christian origin (Mantran, vol. 1, p. 228). The Ottoman Empire was an essential element of the European balance of power in the nineteenth century. Ottoman diplomacy skillfully used this situation to prolong the life of the empire by about one hundred years.

The same can be said for other states located in this region, including the Byzantine Empire and the Republic of Turkey. By exercising skill in its diplomacy, Turkey is able

Box Intro-2. Revolution from Above

This concept refers to revolutions or revolutionary changes taking place not from below as a result of natural socioeconomic evolution and pressures but from above as a consequence of elites' taking over the apparatus of the state and imposing their revolutionary will on the masses.

In other words, if revolutionary changes cannot take place naturally from below because of the static nature of society, then an elite group claiming to "represent the popular will" takes charge of society and, without regard for the "unenlightened views and attitudes of the masses," imposes its "revolutionary will" by force through the instrumentality of the law

The most successful example of this is the Kemalist revolution from above carried out in the 1920s and 1930s. Some of the Kemalist reforms of the superstructure have even led to changes in the infrastructure—that is, the economic foundation. To illustrate this, whereas the Ottomans allowed daughters to inherit one share against a son's inheritance of two shares, the Civil Code of 1926 introduced equality of the sexes, As a result, the ownership of property in Turkey today reflects this new situation.

to play a more important role in world affairs than would otherwise be possible. After 1453 the Ottoman Empire considered itself the successor of the Byzantine Empire. It should be recalled that the sultans also bore the title "Sultan of Rome" (Sultan-1 İklim-i Rum). Both of these empires took advantage of the status quo through the pursuit of balanced policies that allowed them to survive for many years in a weakened condition. This characteristic of maintaining the status quo and using the balance of power is also a prominent feature of Turkey's foreign policies.

Furthermore, the roots of laicism in Turkey should be sought not in the West but rather in the Ottoman and Byzantine periods. Even if the Ottoman Empire was apparently run according to Sharia laws, the sultan's edicts regulating mundane affairs in fact had definite precedence. Not only did the Turks have a long pre-Islamic past, but after the conquest of Constantinople it was no longer possible to regulate the complex day-to-day life of a realm of imperial scale on the basis of Islamic legislation designed for Arab tribes living in the seventh century.

In any case, it should be recalled that religion in the Ottoman Empire was always under the domination of the state. Even though the conformity of the sultan's edicts with Sharia law was determined by a decision of the Sheikh-ul-Islam (Şeyhülislam), this head of the religious establishment was appointed by the sultan as a public servant and could therefore be dismissed and even put to death by strangling (because the blood of a Muslim scholar was not supposed to be spilled). This practice was inherited from the Byzantine Empire. Whereas two Greek Orthodox patriarchs are known to have been executed in Ottoman times, historians have lost count of the number of patriarchs put to death by the Byzantine emperors.

For all these reasons, Turkish diplomacy is a natural extension of Ottoman diplomacy. The new Republican regime never went through the growing pains of the newly established states of our times. It resisted the great powers at Lausanne and successfully concluded the negotiations. When we survey the periods from 1919 to 1923 and 1923 to 1939, it is easy to discern a determination and pride in the conduct of Turkish foreign policy that harks back to the imperial period. In fact, this imperial pride triggered the War of Liberation: the occupation of İzmir in 1919 by a "former subject nation" was an affront that could not remain unanswered.

Turkey has always had an ambivalent attitude toward the Ottomans. On the one hand, it rejected everything Ottoman, including the alphabet, and declared the last sultan a traitor. On the other hand, it was always ready to accept the continuity between the two entities. When accused of being responsible for the misdeeds of the Ottomans, it never tried to evade this responsibility. Turkey did not resort to the plausible defense that charges of being responsible for the psychological scars left by past Ottoman incursions in Europe or accusations of Armenian Genocide could not be leveled against it. The Republic has refused the Ottoman regime, not its state.

The significant difference between Turkey and its predecessor was that the aim of Ottoman diplomacy was to ensure the survival of a multinational and multireligious/ sectarian state, while Turkish diplomacy was designed to serve the needs of a nation-state.

C. The Strategic Dimension

This question has three aspects: the geographical factor (Turkey's geostrategic location, its neighbors, the Turkish Straits), the regional security rings, and the global power axes.

Turkey's Geography

This factor has had profound effects, both positive and negative, on Turkish foreign policy.

Geostrategic Location

The territory of the Republic of Turkey is located at a very strategic spot adjacent to the Balkans, the Caucasus, and the Fertile Crescent in the Middle East. It is also situated between the industrialized West and its main sources of energy in the Middle East and the Caspian. This location gives Turkey an importance and advantages beyond its actual dimensions.

Against this, the country is situated on historic and even present-day migration routes, which account for the Turks having settled here in the past. This engenders feelings of insecurity, which explain why Turkish foreign policy is constantly preoccupied with security issues.

Neighbors

The direct relationship between the number and nature of a country's neighbors and its security is well known. The more neighbors a country has, the greater the likelihood of its being invaded or threatened or being compelled to fight on several fronts.

In this sensitive geostrategic region, Turkey has always bordered on a good number of neighbors. It had eight of them before World War II: Greece, Bulgaria, the USSR, Iran, Iraq, France through Syria, Britain through Cyprus, and Italy through the Dodecanese Islands. After the war, the number was reduced to six: Greece, Bulgaria, the USSR, Iran, Iraq, and Syria and then, as of 1960, Cyprus. At the end of the Cold War, this figure went up to eight again: Greece, Bulgaria, Georgia, Armenia, Azerbaijan through Nakhechevan, Iran, Iraq, and Syria. This figure can be raised to twelve by including overseas neighbors: Ukraine, Ruisia, Romania, and Cyprus.

The nature of these neighbors does not provide Turkey with much reassurance either. It has historical feuds and conflicts of interest with most of them. True, the USSR, its strongest neighbor and the one that gave it the most trouble in the past, is no more. This country's successor, the Russian Federation, does not have a common border with Turkey; but given its enduring influence in the Caucasus, it continues to be a neighbor. In fact, one of the most threatening aspects of the demand for independence by Kurdish nationalists is that, if successful, it would deprive Turkey of "strategic depth" as an important security element vis-à-vis Russia in eastern Anatolia.

These security concerns have led Turkey to seek alliances.

The Turkish Straits

Turkey's possession of the Straits raises its importance from a regional to a global level. Despite the development of nuclear weapons, the Straits have enormous strategic importance, which gives Turkey the possibility to influence global developments. This also creates problems for Turkey by exposing it to the effects of global developments.

Furthermore, the defense of the region of the Straits poses many problems. In addition to being exposed to attacks by sea and air, Turkey does not possess strategic depth in its European territories. This explains why the powerful 1st Army is deployed in this region (Aydın, p. 58).

Turkey's Regional Security Rings and Its Dilemmas

Bearing in mind Turkey's general geostrategic location and its neighbors, the country must find integrated solutions for its security concerns when formulating its foreign policy. The existence of five regional security rings covering Turkey makes this a necessity. These rings are interlocked. The balances of forces in each of them are mutually linked. In addition, these rings have no natural border or obstacles between them. Any geographical limits that might be drawn would be totally artificial. Turkey must act as a pivot to maintain the balance of forces among these rings and ensure their compatibility. Finally, each of these five rings poses dilemmas for Turkey, as explained below (Sander).

The European Perspective

This perspective is influenced by the global system, which is dominated by relations between the superpowers. Here Turkey's recurring dilemma is to play an active part in the Western alliance—the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO)—without threatening the big northern neighbor, whether it be the USSR or Russia. A more recent dilemma is how to accede to the European Union (EU) without allowing interference in Turkey's internal affairs.

The Balkan Perspective

Being the gateway to Europe, the Balkan region is important for Turkey. As we shall see later, this is the reason why Turkish foreign policy was so deeply preoccupied with the Bosnian issue. This gateway must somehow remain open at all times, making it imperative for Turkey to be constantly engaged in this region. The objective is to ensure that either the Greek route or the Bulgarian route always remains accessible. Turkey cannot afford to be on bad terms with both Greece and Bulgaria at the same time, as was the case from 1984 to 1990.

The Mediterranean Perspective

Here the dominant issue is relations with Greece. Turkey must protect its vital interests against Greece, which encircles it to the west, and Cyprus to the south. The Aegean islands could block the western ports of Istanbul and Izmir while Cyprus completed the pincer movement on the southern ports. It is this threat of being surrounded in the Aegean that has driven Turkey to declare that the Greek attempts to extend the territorial waters beyond the present six miles in the Aegean would be considered a casus belli. In doing this, it must make sure that it does not turn an ally (Greece) into an adversary that can block its links to Europe. In such a case, the damage to the interests of Turkey (whose relations are mostly with countries to its west) would far exceed the damage to Greece's interests if its routes to the east were blocked. It should also be recalled that this thorny issue with Greece has always elicited negative reactions from the U.S. This situation has become even more serious with Greece's entry into the European Union.

The Middle East Perspective

In this oil-rich region influenced by the global system and by international rivalries, Turkey's dilemma is how to capitalize on its ability to be active while not getting drawn into the complex web of regional disputes and conflicts.

In addition, the Middle East is also important for Turkey in relation to the Kurdish question. Turkey has conducted military operations in northern Iraq since 1983. A Ministry of Foreign Affairs document entitled "Priority Measures in Connection with Our Iraqi Policy" that was circulated to key government agencies in May 2001 was leaked to the press. This internal document stated that "the establishment of a Kurdish state in northern Iraq should be considered grounds for our intervention" (Cumhuriyet, 13 May 2001). This is documentary evidence that such interventions have become established state policy.

The Caucasus Perspective

This is a region where Russian influence is still dominant. For Turkey it is important because of the oil and gas pipelines that go through this area. Here the dilemma is to reduce Russia's influence by supporting friendly and strong regimes in the region and to secure the construction of energy routes over Turkish territory, but to do this without angering Russia.

Russia is an important balancing factor, however, against the now unchecked power of the U.S.

Turkey's Location and Global Power Axes

It has always been stressed that Anatolia is a bridge. This assertion is true not only in geographical terms but in two other, more important aspects (Sander).

As a result of the Cold War, the world was divided along strategic, political, ideological, and economic lines into two camps; the resulting vertical axis ran across Turkey. Turkey found itself to the west of this axis and participated in the Truman Doctrine, NATO, the Council of Europe, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), and other Western projects and organizations.

A second and more important axis is the one that started appearing in the late 1980s. This horizontal axis divides the world into North and South along economic lines and also crosses Turkey. Turkey is striving to remain to the north of this axis, as demonstrated by its efforts to join the European Union.

Turkey did not have much difficulty in coming to a decision with respect to the first axis. For a number of reasons, above all security, it opted for the West. In the case of the second axis, however, the diplomatic decisions were harder to make. Turkish delegations at the United Nations often face difficulties when voting, owing to their need to reconcile their membership in southern organizations like the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) with their membership in the OECD or their candidate status with the European Union.

D. The Domestic Dimension The General and Historical Aspects

The ethnic and religious makeup of Anatolia had a profound impact on the foreign policy of the Ottoman Empire by driving the Ottomans ever westward.

This westward drive had several causes. The exploitation and chaotic conditions stemming from the corrupt feudal structure of the Byzantine Empire led its inhabitants to look upon the much fairer prefeudal system of the Ottomans as their salvation. This greatly facilitated the Ottoman advance in Byzantine and Balkan territories (the factor of the infrastructure). The Islamic practice that led to declaring the West darül-harb (meaning theater of war or lands that should be conquered for Islam) facilitated the implementation of a conquest-oriented economy (the factor of the superstructure). Finally, the mountainous and unproductive terrain of eastern Anatolia in contrast with the fertile plains of western Anatolia also pushed the Ottomans toward the West (the factor of the environment).

Aside from these factors, the ethnic/religious/class composition of Anatolia and the problems it created pushed the Ottomans constantly westward and brought them into closer contact with Western civilization. When the Turks first arrived in Anatolia from Central Asia as a limited number of tent dwellers, they ran into two other important autochthonous peoples besides the Armenians: the "Rum" (Greeks/Byzantines) and the Kurds. The Kurds fought with the Turks against the Greeks at the Battle of Malazgirt in 1071. Because they lived in the mountains, these Kurds remained semiautonomous until the time of the centralization drive undertaken during the reign of Mahmut II. In other words, because they were populated by Sunni Muslims and because of their semiautonomous state, the Kurdish regions were not regarded as suitable for conquest. As a result the Ottomans always had a tendency to drive westward.

A further reason for this westward drive was the Turkmen (Turcoman) tribes. The few eastern campaigns undertaken by the Ottomans all took place before the big westward drives, in order to pacify their chief rival, Iran, and thereby ensure the rear. The determining factor behind this is not military, ethnic, religious, or ideological but has to do with the class structure in Anatolia. At this time, there was a constant stream of Turkmen migrants from Central Asia. These migrants were a major source of concern for the Ottomans, who came increasingly under Byzantine influence after the conquest of Constantinople and adopted a sedentary way of life. The migrants were overrunning farmlands, clashing with the local populace, and refusing to submit to any discipline. Derogatory expressions like "dumb Turks" used by the settled Ottomans to disown the migratory Turkmens are signs of a class conflict that was perceived at the time as being a sectarian conflict. In contrast to the Sunni beliefs of the Ottomans that enjoin respect for authority, the Alevi creed of the Turkmens reflected the free and independent spirit of their migratory society, still very much under the influence of shamanism.

Thus the Ottomans pursued the dual objective of trying to prevent any links between these Alevi Turkmens and Shah İsmail of Iran (who was an Alevi at the time) and settling these Turkmen tribes in the frontier regions of the newly conquered Balkan territories to relieve population pressures (see Box 1-26 in Section 1).

Another factor is the existence of a large non-Muslim population in Anatolia. When the empire entered its stagnation phase, the West used this population as a pretext to apply pressure on the Ottoman state. This compelled the Ottomans to pay more attention to the West, to diplomacy, and to the balance of power.

The Specific Present-Day Aspect

The Republic of Turkey has inherited the most important component of the Ottoman Empire's ethnic mix: the Kurds. The Kurds revolted just sixteen months after the establishment of the Republic and intermittently kept their revolt going until 1938. All of the treaties concluded with countries to the east and south of Turkey during the 1920s and 1930s (including, in particular, the Sadabad Pact) were intended to keep the Kurds under tight control.

Subsequently Kurdish nationalism initiated a very serious armed insurgency in the 1980s, which left a deep imprint in Turkey's foreign policy. First, it compelled Turkey to be a defender of the status quo in its relations with all countries, opposing the autonomy and certainly the independence of all separatist groups, whether Chechens or Kosovans. Second, the measures to suppress the very serious armed rebellion of the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) in the southeast of the country resulted in severe violations of human rights. This became a major stumbling block in Turkey's quest to become part of Europe and delayed its transition to modernity.

The Ideological Aspect

Finally, the "development model" in Turkey has been one of the factors influencing foreign policy. This aspect is dealt with in greater detail below. Two important points should be noted here, however.

First, the development model will influence the selection of a country's allies. A country subscribing to the capitalist model will find it difficult to enter into strong and lasting alliances with a socialist country.

Second, the development model is important because it has a major influence on a country's development effort. Obviously, the influence of a developed country in international affairs will not be the same as that of an underdeveloped country. The degree of success of a country's development model and of capital accumulation will have a direct bearing on the weight of its foreign policy.

- II. THE MILITARY, POLITICAL, AND ECONOMIC BACKGROUND OF TURKISH FOREIGN POLICY
- A. Turkey as a Strategic Medium Power (SMP): Military-Strategic and Economic Dimensions

The Concept of a "Medium Power"

Two questions need to be asked when starting the examination of Turkish foreign policy.

Within the international system, in what category does the Republic of Turkey belong from the perspectives of its general situation and its foreign policy?

This question has no clear answer: because of Turkey's sensitive location, its foreign policy encompasses many problems, faces numerous threats, must enter into differing alliances, and must cater to conflicting interests. In order to examine this question, however, it is necessary to identify some fixed patterns and parameters within a complex picture.

In terms of dimensions, it is customary to classify states as major or minor.

It is relatively easy to describe the category of state that was known as a major power before World War II and subsequently came to be known as a superpower. Such a state can effectively influence the regional and global balance of power because of its population, geographical size, economy, resources, military power, and so forth. It is also easy to describe minor powers, because they are the opposite. They are easily affected by regional and global events but have little influence over them.

Not all states fit into these two categories, however. A third, intermediate category can be described as a medium power. Provided they hold a geostrategic position, such states can influence the international system only marginally but can have an impact on regional developments and especially smaller neighbors, resist pressures coming from major powers, bargain with them, and, by taking advantage of circumstances, even influence their actions. Examples are Israel, Iran, Turkey, and to a certain extent Egypt.

Such SMPs can also be described as regional powers. Their ability to influence events does not allow them to resist major powers successfully or to engage in armed conflicts with them. SMPs under threat from a major power can either resort to the balance of power by playing one major power against another or seek protection within an alliance. This choice is not always easy. The balance of power can shift. Or, after joining an alliance, the SMP can find itself reduced to being a satellite of the major power of that alliance. Sometimes it is not within an SMP's ability to exercise these choices because of the nature of the international system at that particular time or because of the circumstances of that SMP within the international system (Hale, p. 2). In a rigid bipolar system an SMP is very likely to be forced to adhere to one of the two camps, especially if its geostrategic location is considered critical by their leaders. Raymond Aron has explained in Peace and War that in such circumstances it is impossible to pursue policies that are independent of the two camps. This is known as the Aron paradigm (Aydın, pp. 93–94).

The Elements of an SMP:

The Economic and Military-Strategic Dimensions
The elements of an SMP can be classified under two headings: economic and military-strategic.

An SMP must have a certain economic size and strength. The economy is already important per se; it is also the basis of military power, which is necessary for defense and to make a country's voice heard in international circles. An economy is never completely trouble free. If it is chronically in trouble, however, then a country will have to compensate by emphasizing the military and geostrategic dimension in order to preserve its strategic medium-power status.

It has to be noted that the ability of this power to resort to military action is not unrestricted. If an SMP attempts to acquire land in a sensitive geostrategic region against the wishes or interests of the influential or hegemonic power in that region, it can create serious problems for itself. Having annexed Hatay in 1939 with the consent of the regional power (France), Turkey faces no serious problem there today. Because it invaded Cyprus without the consent of the hegemonic power (the U.S.), however, and continues to maintain forces there to this day, Turkey has had to face unending problems. Although it can count on a much higher degree of U.S. approval, Israel faces similar problems as it keeps building new Jewish settlements in the occupied territories (Box Intro-3).

If the SMP finds itself far from the main international axes of power, however, it can avoid suffering sanctions. This can be illustrated by Turkey's annexation of an Iranian territory called the Little Ararat in 1930 (see "Relations with Iran" in Section 2).

Turkey belongs in the medium power category when considered in the light of its economic indicators. It is larger in surface than any of its neighbors except Iran. Its population also exceeds that of its neighbors. Turkey is self-sufficient in basic food production. Its endowment in natural resources is in large measure adequate, except for hydrocarbons. With a nominal gross national

Box Intro-3. Hegemonic Power

Since the fifteenth century certain states have acquired power in the international arena, gained the ability to influence international developments, earned a larger share in international trade, and thereby placed themselves in a dominant position in international affairs. An important precondition for this was the possession of the largest merchant fleet and the strongest navy. From a historical perspective, Portugal in the fifteenth century, Spain in the sixteenth century, France in the seventeenth century, and Britain in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries were the hegemonic powers. The U.S. became a major power after defeating Spain in 1898 and transformed itself into a hegemonic power after becoming actively involved in world affairs following World War II. As a result of technological progress since that time, the U.S. has maintained its status as the global hegemon:

In the past a challenger has always contested the position of the hegemonic power. At that point a major war between the hegemonic power and the challenger occurs, resulting in a fundamental transformation of the international system. This happened when Germany challenged Britain's hegemony, but the war exhausted both contestants, making way for the U.S. to gain hegemony.

Hegemonic powers have stood for free trade and tried to force other countries to lower their customs barriers. Britain in en an ar en en en en tariorise franco (kapados se disente de 1906). Petit the nineteenth century launched the open door policy. Today the U.S. is the driving force behind the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and subsequently the World Trade Organization (WTO), while the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank are in large measure under U.S. control.

A hegemonic power has a strong currency that is internationally utilized, possesses bases and allies throughout the world, and intervenes in regional crises to demonstrate its leadership, Since 1945 the possession of nuclear weapons has been added to the attributes of a hegemonic power.

To maintain its position the hegemonic state cannot rely solely on raw power. It must earn the approval of a significant number of countries and persuade them to follow its leadership. The hegemonic power must also legitimize its status by spreading its way of life, culture, and values and gaining new converts.

Today the U.S. has the power, the ability, and the will to influence all developments in the world and continues to remain the hegemonic power. But history tells us that no hegemonic power can maintain its position indefinitely, because such powers exhaust themselves in the effort to maintain their hegemonic edifice, thus leading to the appearance of challengers.

product (GNP) of $655.9 billion in 2007, it ranks 17th in the world. Russia apart, it has the 7th largest economy in Europe (World Development Indicators —WDI—The World Bank, 2009, p. 210). Leaving aside the 9% decline in GNP during the 2001 crisis, the Turkish economy has grown from 6 to 9.9% per annum since 2002 (see Table 8-2 in Section 8). This importance is borne out by its inclusion among the G-20 (the twenty most developed economies). Although not completely self-sufficient in armaments, it also has a respectable defense industry.

The military dimension is crucial for a world power to become a hegemonic power. Similarly, a medium power must rely on the military component to become a regional power or even to maintain itself as an SMP. Clearly the military dimension becomes more relevant if the country is located in an important geostrategic region.

An important geostrategic location has benefits but also drawbacks. If the country is strong, this kind of location will contribute substantially to its status as an SMP. If the country is weak, the location can deprive it of its security, prevent it from keeping its defense expenditures at a low level, and thereby damage its economy. It can force the country to seek alliances and also threaten its existence by encouraging those with designs on the region. In other words, strategic importance could get the SMP in trouble (see "The Question of the Relationship of Security, Economy, and Foreign Policy in a Developing Medium Power" below).

But even these drawbacks of a special geostrategic location can help a country to be regarded as an SMP. Its geostrategic location might be considered so critical by the major powers that the country would have to be taken into account because of its weakness as much as its strength. The Ottoman Empire was a classic example of this situation throughout the nineteenth century. All of Europe, especially Britain and Russia, was preoccupied with the so-called Eastern Question, which involved coping with the problems that would result from a sudden collapse of the Ottoman Empire (Chase and Hill).

Turkey, the successor of the Ottoman Empire, is such a pivotal state for the U.S. Turkey has to be heeded because of its weaknesses, deriving from its many unresolved problems. This situation could lead to serious instability in the region and threaten the interests of the hegemon, the U.S., and its ally Israel.

Turkey is also important because of its strength. Compared to the Ottoman Empire, it is more compact and easier to govern, with a much more homogeneous population. Turkish foreign policy displays features such as the ability to influence the regional policies of the major powers and, when necessary, confront these powers. This characteristic was very much in evidence before and during World War II, when Turkey's military strength was relatively limited. During the Cold War, both camps valued it from a strategic point of view. For a variety of reasons, Turkey was able to maintain this position of importance

Box Intro-4. National Interest

The concept of national interest appeared after 1789 with the development of the modern state.

This concept assumes that the nation as a whole has common interests. Although the reference is to the nation, the concept is attributable to the independent state within which the nation is organized. It is the state that represents and pursues the national interest. In reality this concept has existed since the coming into being of the state and even of its precursors such as tribes. But at that time it had a different name. For example, in the period when sovereignty in the state belonged not to the nation but to the monarch, it was known as raison d'état (reason of state), where the sovereign's interests were declared to be those of the state. In even earlier times, when sovereignty was attributable not to an individual but to a metaphysical being (God, spirits, and so forth), the national interest was expressed in other terms. Whatever the term, the reference is to the collective interests of society.

This interpretation of the concept of national interest has led to criticisms from both liberal and Marxist quarters. According to the liberal view based on the individual, the nation and the nation-state are losing influence with advancing globalization and thus the concept of national interest must share a similar fate. In pluralistic societies it cannot be maintained that there is a common national interest (Frankel, p. 21). In fact, it is impossible to use this concept in the context of the European Union. The Marxist view based on class, however, claims that the national interest attributable to the state actually reflects the interests of the dominant class in society. Consequently, there cannot be a single national interest but only class interests, and the interest of the oppressor class cannot be similar to the interest of the oppressor class cannot be similar to the interest of the oppressor class cannot be rational interest is a fiction that the dominant class uses to present its interest as being identical with the collective interest of all segments of society.

(B. ORAN)

after the Cold War ended. With the demise of the Warsaw Pact, the natural raison d'être of NATO came to an end. Even in this period, almost all of the political flash points confronting NATO were within Turkey's vicinity. Given the military-strategic dimension, Turkey emerges as an SMP despite its economic difficulties.

B. The Security Factor of Foreign Policy

What does the pursuit of foreign policy entail for a country, especially if it is an SMP? What is the purpose of foreign policy?

These superficially easy-sounding questions are difficult to answer in a clear way. What comes immediately to mind is the obvious reply: "To further the national interest beyond a country's borders." This in turn leads to a very complicated question: "What is the national interest?" (Box Intro-4).

Nevertheless, it can be said that the foremost objective of foreign policy is to secure the broadest measure of national security against outsiders and thereby ensure the country's survival. Parallel to this, domestic policy will be based on the need to serve the public interest (Frankel, p. 38). Naturally, we must understand security as being defined by those who make national and independent decisions; this precludes the full security that could be obtained through union with a hegemon.

National security has three components that should be conceived as three overlapping circles: military, economic, and political-social. These circles are the foundation of the national strength that underpins foreign policy. If one of these circles is wanting, the system of national security will be damaged. Finally, these three circles must be placed within a fourth larger circle: the international system. In this scheme, the three circles of national security and the encompassing international system are constantly interacting and affecting one another. The foreign policy formulated by a government and implemented by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs must be based on keeping the three circles sound and healthy (the internal dynamics) while making sure that the international system is favorable (the external dynamics), keeping in mind that the internal and external dynamics will affect one another.

We can now examine this proposition as it applies to Turkey.

The Domestic Setting of Turkish Foreign Policy The Military Circle

The first circle is the military dimension, based primarily on weapons and personnel but also including factors such as morale, esprit de corps, command and control, and degree of preparedness. The weapons and the personnel are ultimately dependent on the economic strength and educational level of the country. It will be recalled that during the Arab-Israeli War of 1967 the Egyptian aircraft were destroyed on the ground without even getting a chance to take off.

In addition to the fighting spirit and ability of the Turkish soldier, it is generally acknowledged that the competence of technical military personnel is quite high. Turkey is able to procure only about one-fifth of its weapons systems from national sources, however, and is dependent on foreign sources, primarily the U.S. Given the speed with which weapons become technologically obsolete, this situation should be regarded as normal and unlikely to change over the medium term. The Turkish defense industries are either not at a high technological level, as in the case of the Makina ve Kimya Endüstrisi Kurumu (MKE), or dependent on foreign inputs, as in the case of the aerospace industry (the F-16 project; see "Relations with the USA and NATO" in Sections 6 and 7). Although Turkey is acquiring tanker aircraft for aerial refueling and Airborne Warning and Control Systems (AWACS) early warning aircraft and even contemplating the acquisition of aircraft carriers to strengthen its defenses, all of this depends on the willingness of the superpower that will supply such equipment.

In addition to this lack of self-sufficiency in armaments, the Turkish economy is becoming increasingly dependent on outsiders. When this is considered against the background of the regional difficulties discussed above ("The Strategic Dimension" in "Basic Factors Influencing Turkish Foreign Policy" above), the difficulties that have to be confronted become more apparent.

This military component (circle) is the one that Turkey relies on most. At times it displays its military power much beyond the capacity of its foreign policy, as it did when it threatened military action against Syria to secure Abdullah Öcalan's expulsion from that country in October 1998. When seen from a broader perspective, however, it must be noted that the military power backing foreign policy remains limited.

The Economic Circle

Turkey is among the so-called "emerging market econmies." Although 22 percent of its active male population was engaged in agriculture between 2003 and 2006 (against 25 percent for Brazil and 3 percent for the U.S.), even in this sector the country is gradually becoming import dependent. Imports now include commodities such as lentils, chickpeas, corn, beans, wheat, cotton, tobacco, sunflower seeds, and rice (Cumhuriyet, 29 May 2001, p. 9).

Turkey's economy has been chronically plagued with problems since the mid-1950s, with income distribution becoming more unbalanced and the country becoming more import dependent. In addition, since the 1980s the economy has relied increasingly on external and internal borrowing. The foreign debt, which was under $1 billion in 1960, grew to $15.7 billion in 1980 and $49 billion in 1990. When economic indicators, including the rate of inflation, were all moving in the right direction in 2000, prior to the economic crisis of February 2001, the foreign debt burden had reached $114.5 billion. Over the last ten years there has also been a huge increase in the internal debt. Between 1991 and 2000 this debt increased by a factor of 796 in Turkish lira terms. Even when converted into dollars, the internal debt increased by a factor of 5.3 over the same period. In June 2001 Turkey's interest payments amounted to 111.08% of its total tax revenue, which means that the state's total tax income could not cover its interest payments. No amount of statistics could highlight the starkness of the economic situation better than this fact (see "The Domestic Environment and Dynamics" in "Appraisal of the Period" in Section 7).

In this situation, whether we describe it as "not being fully developed" or describe it in technical terms as "not having upgraded from peripheral country status to semiperipheral," Turkey's persistent economic problems make it difficult for it to qualify as a genuine SMP. For a country to be considered a durable SMP, it must reach a level of development that allows it to upgrade itself from a peripheral to semiperipheral country (Box Intro-5). The economic dimension is examined in greater detail below. In these circumstances, it can be said that we are dealing with a foreign policy that is not grounded on a sound economy.

The Political-Social Circle

A country with an untroubled political and social order has a sound basis for developing an effective foreign policy. Turkey has a serious drawback due to the fragility of its political and social structure. The internal structure of its political parties is not all that democratic; it is difficult to change party leaders, making it hard to introduce new faces among the political leadership. Even when circumstances have changed fundamentally, the tendency is to stick to old remedies. This is because Turkey does not confront its problems (some of which date from the nineteenth century) with modern methods, that is, by engaging in rational debate to produce alternative solutions. The prevailing tendency is to put off dealing with problems. The resulting accumulation of difficulties creates an insurmountable barrier: fear of change, leading to anxieties in foreign relations and a weakening of national cohesion.

As a result, starting in the 1970s, Turkey has had to face various internal social conflicts. The struggle against the terrorism of Kurdish nationalism beginning in the mid-1980s came on top of this. Then came the friction brought about by political Islam, which triggered the debate about whether the source of power in the state is the nation itself or God. Finally, there is the rivalry between the military and the civilians. All of this is taking place in

Box Intro-5. The Concepts of the Center, the Periphery, and the Semiperiphery

The street of the street of the street

The concepts of the center and the periphery denote both the level of development of countries and their place in the global division of labor. The periphery must play the economic role that is assigned to it by the center. It is also subservient to the center in a number of noneconomic spheres.

The center has many ways of controlling the periphery to prevent this state of affairs from changing. New technology is always developed in the center. The periphery does not engage in research. In addition, there is ideological control. All news originates from a limited number of news agencies located in the center. Just as the "discotheque culture" is automatically imported along with the import of blue jeans, the import of industrial products entails the import of the corresponding ideology. Finally, the international financial system and its methods of providing credit also help in maintaining the status quo. Loans extended to the periphery are designed to provide markets for the products of the center. Together with the loan, the recipient is forced to accept liberalism under the guise of "structural reform." Because the periphery can only repay the interest on loans with its limited exports, its indebtedness never ends. Furthermore, although it is not resorted to very often, the possibility of direct intervention is always present. Typical examples are the coups engineered by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) of the U.S. in Iran against Mohammad Mosaddeq and in Chile against Salvador Allende.

Nevertheless, it is possible to break out of the periphery and attain the level of the semiperiphery, whereby a country reaches a higher level of development without becoming as developed as the center. There are two ways of achieving this.

In the first case, a country can take advantage of a favorable international conjuncture and adopt a statist/protectionist model and detach itself temporarily from the international division of labor, secure a certain level of development, and then open up to the world on the basis of export-led growth. Japan and South Korea are modern examples of this, and Turkey's model of statism also had this objective.

In the second case, certain center countries select a country in the periphery to be their regional partner and serve as a distributor of their products. They engage in intensive cooperation in selected fields. For this they will designate either a country with a high economic potential (a "pivotal state") or a country with strategic importance, preferably both. Israel is a typical example. In the early 1960s the EEC may have regarded Turkey in this light. This type of semiperiphery status is analogous to the status of a medium power that is in close alliance with major powers.

(B. ORAN) (Source: Keyder, pp. 80–133)

the center of the most unsettled regions of the globe: the Balkans, the Caucasus, and the Middle East. The lack of internal cohesion and unity deprives Turkish foreign policy of a solid foundation.

The International and Regional System in Which Turkish Foreign Policy Operates

Since the end of the sixteenth century Turkey has found itself in an international system where the West is paramount. Although this predominance was fractured at times (Britain/France versus Germany) or contested (the West versus the USSR) and occasionally Turkey was able to profit from this, in the final analysis the West was unrivaled. Even the USSR, when it was most powerful, had to conduct its international trade according to the rules of capitalism. After the disintegration of the socialist bloc in the 1990s, the international system has become even more monolithic. The same can be said about the regional system.

These two external dynamics that prevent Turkey from deviating from its path are reinforced by two internal factors. First, the security circles alluded to earlier weaken the hand of those who manage foreign policy. Second, members of Turkey's elite have a Western-oriented approach, which makes it difficult for them to consider non-Western foreign policy alternatives.

In these circumstances Turkey is not able to deviate much from the general direction set by the West. Since 1990 the path it has had to follow has become even narrower. With the ending of the East-West conflict and the demise of the Warsaw Pact, Turkey's usefulness to NATO has come to an end. True, the U.S. still needs Turkey to maintain its hegemony in the Balkans/Caucasus/Middle East triangle and continues to take an interest. But the EU, although still having strategic interests in the region, has less need for Turkey for its defense and in any case seems to rely on the customs union, which binds Turkey economically to Europe.

As a result, since 1990 Turkey has been compelled to tread the path of the U.S. in its policies, whereas before it was treading the path of the West in general. This is becoming more obvious as the EU spurns Turkey, especially because of its human rights record. At one time Turkey profited from tensions and crises to underline its usefulness to the West and thereby maintain its status as an SMP. Now Turkey needs the U.S. to pursue this course. It will be noted that Turkey's foreign policy successes since 1990 have all been in areas where its interests have coincided with those of the U.S.: Bosnia, energy pipelines, the capture of Öcalan, humanitarian-assistance undertakings, and operations in northern Iraq.

The question to ask is: "Must Turkey, in these constricting circumstances, always conform to U.S. wishes?"

The answer is no. A nation-state, especially if it is an SMP, by definition has enough autonomy in matters pertaining to foreign policy and to security in particular—provided it is prepared to pay the price. In other words, from time to time and where it deems necessary to safeguard its vital interests, Turkey can follow courses that may be in conflict with those of its Western allies. In the medium term this can only be possible if the country regains its economic freedom of action. This autonomy is not a given for a country that has to persuade the International Monetary Fund (IMF) to come to its aid to repay its foreign debts.

Therefore it is necessary to examine Turkey's foreign policy in a political economy context.

c. The Political Economy of Foreign Policy

The political economy of foreign policy involves the economic criteria (distribution of income, savings, etc.) that determine a country's political processes. These processes lead to capital accumulation by the public/private sector for the purpose of economic growth/development and the rational allocation of capital. The social dimension of development is the availability of qualified human resources in sufficient numbers to manage the process.

Selecting the model for capital accumulation is not a matter of simple preference. In this selection, the internal dynamics of a country (the class structure) and even more the external dynamics (the degree of integration in the international division of labor) play a part. In other words, the model for capital accumulation is an important factor of foreign policy. As mentioned earlier, it determines external alliances, and the success or lack of success in a country's development efforts has a direct bearing on the strength of its foreign policy.

There are two basic models of capital accumulation: the protectionist and the liberal model. The first model aims to achieve development by shielding a country's economy from the influence of the international economic system (international capitalism) and takes two forms. In capitalist countries it involves industrialization through import substitution (IIS), while in socialist countries it involves the socialist form of accumulation. The second model tries to connect the country to the international economic system and seeks development through this integration.

In the final phases of the Ottoman Empire an enforced integration with the outside world took place. In the first years of the Republic (1923–29) there was little digression from this course. The country's class structure led to this course of action, as reflected by the deliberations of the İzmir Economy Congress of 1923, the policies designed to create a Muslim business class inherited by the elite from the Union and Progress Party, and the international obstacles (the trade convention signed at the Lausanne Peace Conference in 1923 prevented the raising of customs tariffs for five years). It became possible to switch to a more independent development model after the economic crisis of 1929, when foreign conditions allowed, indeed imposed, a change in policy. This import substitution model did not include certain features of the model applied from 1960 to 1980 (such as increasing the purchasing power of labor through collective bargaining, trade unions, etc.). But it nevertheless reflected the typical features of those formative years of the Republic from 1923 to 1945.

1. Industrialization through Import Substitution (IIS)

"IIS" is the economists' term for the strategy of developing domestic industry by protecting it from imports.

This model is not confined to the Turkish Republic. Throughout the nineteenth century and up to 1945 the U.S. pursued such policies. The same is true for Prussia and then for Germany in response to its political/military needs. Japan also began to apply this model in the latter part of the nineteenth century. IIS has been employed by countries trying to attain the takeoff stage of economic development.

Although Turkey severed its political ties with the past in 1923, in the economic sphere the break occurred in 1930, when Turkey switched to the import-substitution model. The other "oppressed nations" would resort to these policies after World War II.

A country usually resorts to IIS as the result of an international or local crisis or an acute foreign exchange shortage or as a reaction to the process of being turned into a semicolony. The main thrust of IIS is to limit or ban imports and thereby promote domestic production. In this model, requirements are not met through imports even if it would make more sense to do so. Instead needs are met through local production even if the price is higher or the quality lower or the technology obsolete.

The strategy is to start with consumer goods, move up to intermediate goods, and end up by producing capital goods for the domestic market. This does not entail cutting off all links with the outside world, however. Some intermediate and other goods will always need to be imported. Furthermore, if the strategy proves successful, the country can shift to an export-led model.

This type of accumulation is the result of a state's relative external autonomy and also helps to reinforce this relative autonomy. This model was adopted by Turkey from

Box Intro-6. The Relative Internal and External Autonomy of the State

The concept of the relative autonomy of the state was developed primarily by N. Poulantzas. Unlike the "vulgar Marxist" view that perceives the superstructure as being absolutely dependent on the infrastructure, this concept is based on the assumption that, with time, there is a divergence between the economic level of the state and the political/ideological level. When the political level is relatively autonomous of the economy, the state will become more autonomous in its decision-making.

Relative autonomy has an internal and an external dimension. The relative internal autonomy of the state occurs when it is relatively autonomous of the social classes in the country, which means the state is not compelled to take action to satisfy their short-term interests. Naturally, the state will be influenced by the long-term interests of classes. But at the same time the state must try to balance the interests of classes and thus preserve unity. The introduction of the right to strike is designed to preserve this balance even if it is against the interests of the ruling class. For relative internal autonomy to prevail, there must be a situation where the class structure in the country is not fully developed (impotence of classes) or a situation where neither of the ruling classes, consisting of feudal landlords and industrialists, is able to assert superiority (equilibrium). Atatürk's Turkey is an example of underdeveloped class structure, while South Korea illustrates the case of equilibrium between classes.

In the case of relative external autonomy, a state is able to preserve this autonomy vis-à-vis the international system and other states. In normal circumstances no medium power can be so strong that it can insulate itself completely from foreign pressures. For this to happen, the international system and its principal major powers must have become ineffective owing to other pre-occupations, or a balance of power between states/blocs must prevail. In other words, relative external autonomy is the outcome of external dynamics.

1929 to 1945 and from 1960 to 1980. Even in the years from 1945 to 1960 it was not discarded. Combined with the nature of international relations of the period, this helped Turkey to enjoy relative autonomy in its foreign relations from 1929 to 1980 (Box Intro-6).

These periods differ in important ways, however, as will be seen when they are examined later. From 1919 to 1945 no superpower on the international scene was imposing its own version of "Pax." The Turkey of Atatürk's time took advantage of this unusual situation, when there was no attempt to interfere in its domestic affairs, its economic policies, or its diplomacy. But the Cold War rendered the period from 1960 to 1980 quite different. Turkey enjoyed relative autonomy at this juncture, even though it was in the Pax Americana camp, because the world was divided into two Pax camps at the time.

The aftermath of the IIS period from 1929 to 1945 was markedly different from the aftermath of the period from 1960 to 1980 in the field of foreign relations. In both instances foreign policy lost its relative autonomy and had to operate within a more confined framework. But the two periods differed in the manner in which they ended.

The first period came to an end in 1939 with the outbreak of World War II, when the main objective of foreign policy was to stay out of the war and avoid foreign occupation. All resources were mobilized for defense, so development plans had to be shelved. The failure of the import substitution program was due to external dynamics.

The end of the second period (and the relative autonomy that it conferred) is rooted in the debt trap and the payments crisis, so its causes are internal. Import substitution was resorted to because of the shortage of foreign exchange. As the country developed, the demand for imported products increased without a corresponding increase in exports, owing to the inability to produce export-quality products. To bridge the resulting gap in payments and maintain development programs, there was just one solution: more foreign aid and loans. Turkey failed to make the transition from import substitution to export-led growth, with dire results. Countries like Japan and South Korea had managed this transition smoothly and were to serve as models for others.

The periods 1923–39, 1939–45, and 1960–80 were the three eras when IIS policies were implemented. In this book we examine them as "Relative Autonomy" periods 1, 2, and 3.

Integration in the International Economy

This is the "normal" model that fits the international capitalist system and is applied when there is no crisis or when the IIS phase has been successfully completed. Both internal and external dynamics lead to this phase.

1. The external dynamic: the only prevailing international economic system is capitalism. This was so even when there was a powerful socialist bloc of countries. Both political systems existed within one universal economic system.

This international system compels countries that have not completed their economic development to integrate with the international system in a number of ways.

First, through globalization capitalism is constantly expanding its market and forcing other countries to join the system (Box Intro-7).

Second, in this single market the logic of the rule of comparative advantage (that is, the ability of certain countries to provide certain goods and services more cheaply and thereby to specialize in these fields) forces countries into specialization. Moreover, the actor making decisions about comparative advantage is no longer the nation-state. It is international speculative capital, which after 1990 acquired an enormous scale and high mobility. This capital flows into whichever country appears advantageous at the time and flows out when these advantages disappear. States are powerless to deal with this phenomenon.

Third, in this global market no country can be selfsufficient either in the production of goods and the provision of services or in the production of technology.

Fourth, thanks to the communications revolution (broadcasting via satellites, TV, the Internet, etc.), the system is able to carry out an intensive ideological conditioning, inducing the masses to adopt the capitalist pattern of consumption.

In the case of medium powers with remarkable geostrategic importance like Turkey, the system will exert even greater pressure.

2. The internal dynamic: one of the basic concepts of the Third World approach that was influential in Turkey during the late 1960s and the 1970s was the "national bourgeoisie." The dominant ideology of the Left was to work for a "national democratic revolution." It was national because it was against imperialism and democratic because it was aimed at freeing the peasant majority from the oppression of the sheikhs, feudal landlords, and superstition while at the same time liberating toilers in the cities. This process included a place for a national bourgeoisie. Through import substitution policies, a national bourgeoisie would develop that would defend the national economy against the interests of the international bourgeoisie. Subsequently there would be a transition to the socialist revolution stage. The basic assumption here was that the national bourgeoisie would oppose the international bourgeoisie.

Today, however, we know that the domestic bourgeoisie also has only a single rule: maximization of profits. This can be achieved either through import substitution or through integration, depending on the circumstances. During a crisis, import substitution occurs; when the crisis has been overcome, integration is preferred (Keyder, p. 102). For this reason, and contrary to the notions of the Third World approach, there is no distinction between a national bourgeoisie and a comprador bourgeoisie (the local collaborators or agents of foreign capital). The bour-

Box Intro-7. The Three Waves of Western Expansion

Globalization can be defined as the global expansion of the West with its infrastructure (capitalism) and its superstructure (all that pertains to Western culture, especially rationalism, democracy, human rights, etc.). The driving force behind this is not the deliberate expansionist policies of certain countries but the fundamental objective of capital: maximization of profits. For this to happen, markets (and also finance, etc.) have to be expanded.

The West has expanded in three waves, Roughly speaking, the first wave occurred in the 1490s, driven by mercantilism and leading to colonialism. The second wave occurred after the 1870s, driven by the results of the industrial revolution, which led to imperialism. The third wave occurred in three stages: the birth of multinational corporations in the 1970s, the advent of the communications revolution in the 1980s, and the disintegration of the USSR in the 1990s, which left the West without ideological rivals. This third wave is called globalization.

It will be noted that the common denominator of these waves is the expansion of markets. The waves occurred at times when the size of the market became inadequate, resulting in a pressing need to secure their expansion. Western Europe in the 1490s, Europe in the 1890s, and the Western world in the 1990s became inadequate for global capital, and the market (as well as production, finance, etc.) started to expand to encompass the whole world.

The third wave is a continuation of the second. In the intervening period, there was a hiatus arising from the coming into being of the USSR, which, once it was eliminated, allowed the process to resume its course. The difference between these waves is mainly twofold. First, the third globalization excludes military occupation (that is why the U.S. of George W. Bush has been the only imperialist power in the world). Second, international speculative capital has now acquired a mobility that does not allow, at least for the time being, any type of regulation (see also Box 7-1 in Section 7).

geoisie will decide and act in a way that will maximize profits. As a result of developments after 1990, the decision to maximize profits is no longer up to the national bourgeoisie. It is now international capital that makes the decisions. Since the crisis of February 2001, the national bourgeoisie has complained bitterly that it has been forced into selling its businesses (see "Appraisal of the Period" in Section 7).

This model of capital accumulation is of course very sensitive to external events, because it is in large measure dependent on the functioning of the international capitalist system. Therefore it runs counter to the state's relative autonomy. In this situation the state's sovereignty and its ability to make independent decisions are much more limited.

This limitation, combined with the powerful influence of the international system, has led to a weakening of Turkey's foreign policy autonomy and increased foreign influences during those periods when the integration with the international economy model was being implemented (1945 to 1960, 1980 to 1990, and 1990 to the present). The first two periods are dealt with under the heading "Turkey in the Orbit of the Western Bloc," part 1 and part 2, and the third under the title "Turkey in the Orbit of Globalization."

The Question of the Transition from the IIS Model to the Integration Model

Turkey has had a peculiarly negative experience in its development efforts. Although it has tried both import substitution and integration, it has failed to attain a level of economic development befitting an SMP—that is, it has not been quite able to upgrade itself to the semiperiphery yet. During these periods Turkey has gone through authoritarian and democratic phases. Yet numerous countries have managed this transition through both protectionism and the liberal capital accumulation model. Examples of the former are the USSR, China, and Malaysia, while Spain, Portugal, and Greece are examples of the latter.

A country cannot insulate itself from the world economy forever. At some point it must carry out the transition to integration. But those that have managed this have deliberately carried out their integration after achieving takeoff through import substitution. The USSR developed very well under the protectionist model but failed to make the necessary transition, which resulted in its disintegration. Turkey failed because it did not have an economic policy that was national in its essence. It should have passed to the integration phase with deliberation and proper planning. This it was not able to do. As a result it was dragged into integration in the 1980s head first, with no planning or programming and under the pressure of the international system. If Turkey had been more decisive and better prepared, it could have achieved a certain level of development-and independence-even in the unipolar Western capitalist world that emerged after the disappearance of the socialist bloc.

The conclusion is that autonomy in foreign policy is dependent on the phase at which the transition from import substitution to integration is effected (early vs. mature; prepared vs. unprepared; after becoming a nation vs. before) and on the methods employed (deliberate vs. involuntary; gradual vs. in one stroke).

The Question of the Relationship of Security, Economy, and Foreign Policy in a Developing Medium Power

There is a close relationship between a country's security and its economy with respect to their influence on and even their ability to determine its foreign policy. Let us examine this proposition.

1. We have already seen that when the efforts to achieve a healthy economy fail, it becomes more difficult to ensure security, that the primary element of a country's national strength is its economy, and that a weak economy results in weakened security.

Another important observation is the following. If a country gets in the habit of making up for scarce domestic resources by resorting to external resources (in other words, to foreign borrowing), its foreign policy autonomy can be seriously undermined. The Ottomans started experiencing this situation as far back as 1860, which led to the problem of the Ottoman Public Debt (Düyun-1 Umumiye) and the Sèvres Peace Treaty.

To cite the example of modern Turkey, the cumulative deficit in its balance of trade from 1950 to 1980 is $7,968,000,000 in 1950 dollars (Akat, pp. 62–65). If we deduct from this sum the remittances of Turkish workers abroad, amounting to $4,561,000,000, again in constant 1950 dollars, we obtain the figure of $3,407,000,000, representing the net injection of foreign resources into the Turkish economy. In this thirty-year period Turkey covered this deficit, amounting to 42%, exclusively with foreign aid or borrowing (Gerger, p. 199). This does not include the substantial military assistance that was also received. If this is also included, the degree of dependence on external sources becomes even more striking (Akat, p. 64, footnote 16).

This situation has had two very negative effects. Turkey never felt the need to launch an export drive, because it got used to relying on the unearned foreign exchange obtained from external aid and loans. Loans must eventually be repaid, so this excessive dependence on foreign borrowing had negative effects on the country's ability to conduct an autonomous foreign policy after 1980. It was necessary to borrow increasing amounts in order to service the foreign debts.

In such a situation it is difficult to obtain additional foreign loans without paying a political price. New loans can be made conditional on the introduction of specific legislation or repealing of some laws. It may become more difficult to procure weapons and military equipment, or they may be delivered with limitations on their use. Thus the economic and military-strategic components of security would be affected, making it harder to pursue an autonomous foreign policy.

2. When the economy starts performing badly, this also affects a country's security. Major powers always on the lookout for forward bases and installations in different regions will find it easier to pressure such countries to grant these types of facilities, especially if the country is located in a sensitive geostrategic location (e.g., the Adnan Menderes period). They might also press it to maintain a larger army than it actually needs.

Among the most important features of an SMP is the maintenance of a large military establishment, which can easily lead neighbors to perceive a military threat and force them into heavy rearmament programs. This can spiral into a serious burden, as in the case of the Turkish-Greek arms race.

The maintenance of a military establishment larger than warranted by possible regional threats and a constant preoccupation with security concerns, however, can have harmful effects on the development of democracy in a country. For example, the growing influence of the military on politics might well jeopardize the democratic process.

Sometimes the perception of a foreign threat is deliberately reinforced by inventing "internal foes" or by exaggerating their capabilities if they actually exist. This can lead a country to waste its positive energy in a struggle against these imaginary internal foes and distract its attention from real problems. It can damage a country's unity and release harmful centrifugal forces. The conceptual chaos unleashed by such a situation can result in serious paranoia. In fact, when Turkey was in the process of joining the Western Bloc in the 1940s and 1950s, the Communist threat was deliberately exaggerated even though the Communists in the country numbered only a few thousand. After the riots of 6–7 September 1955 (see Box 4-13 in Section 4), Communists were the first to be arrested. In the 1990s those who advocated that the Kurdish question could only be solved by expanding individual freedoms were declared internal collaborators of the PKK terror.

- 3. An economically weak strategic medium state could well try to stand on its strategic importance only. This is a dangerous situation, especially if this country tries to emphasize its geostrategic importance by artificial means when this importance is weakened by external dynamics such as international developments or changes in weapons technology. In this situation this country could even reach the point where it specifically tries to create a security crisis. Turkey experienced this in 1957 when Prime Minister Menderes threatened Syria.
  - 4. An even more serious threat exists if the economy remains chronically sick. In such a case, a medium power can resort to becoming a kind of "mercenary" in crises created by the hegemonic power if it believes that this might extract more foreign aid/credits. It could send its soldiers to die for others. During the Gulf crisis of 1990 Turkey under Turgut Özal was getting ready to intervene in Iraq and was concocting scenarios for reconquering Mosul.

To summarize, it is not easy to claim that the security components that underpin Turkey's foreign policy are adequate to the task of allowing an effective foreign policy to be conducted.

Despite these shortcomings and faults, however, Turkish foreign policy has been much more successful than might be expected and much less open to outside influence. This can be explained by international developments favoring Turkey's relative autonomy and also by the ability of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to minimize the effects of negative internal factors on foreign relations (see "The Ministry of Foreign Affairs" in "The Implementation of Turkish Foreign Policy" below).

III. THE GUIDING PRINCIPLES OF TURKISH FOREIGN POLICY

It is not easy to reduce the foreign policy of a country extending over a period of eighty years to a few principles or to attribute a consistent permanent pattern to it. Nevertheless, Turkish foreign policy can be said to rest on two firm pillars: maintenance of the status quo and a Western orientation.

A. Maintenance of the Status Quo

In a sensitive region where the balance is always precarious, this policy, inherited from predecessor states, had two implications for Turkey.

1. Preserving Existing Frontiers

For Turkey, defense of the status quo meant to be satisfied with existing frontiers, to preserve them without changes, and to refrain from pursuing irredentism (the policy of annexing adjacent territories where co-nationals live) in lands containing Turkish minorities.

This policy is enunciated in a speech made by M. Kemal in 1921 and also in his reply to President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's congratulatory message sent on 29 October 1933 (the tenth anniversary of the Republic), containing the maxim "Peace at home and peace in the world." This became the guiding principle of the defenders of the status quo.

On 1 December 1921 M. Kemal delivered a speech at the Turkish Grand National Assembly (TGNA) while the War of Liberation was still being fought:

Gentlemen, we are not pursuing grandiose illusions. We did this in the past and attracted the odium of the world on this nation. We did not pursue Pan-Islamism. We may have said: "We are doing it" or "are going to do it"; and our adversaries said: "Let us get rid of them to stop them from doing it." We did not engage in Pan-Turkism. We said: "We will do it, we are doing it"; and they said: "Let us get rid of them!" Instead of gaining new enemies by talking about dreams we did not or could not carry out, we must know our limitations and, as a nation, seek only the right to live and be independent. Only for these goals do we sacrifice our lives. (Atatürk'ün Söylev ve Demeçleri I, p. 201)

The maxim "Peace at home and peace in the world" was enunciated when the new order was already established and signified the following: once the domestic order on a Western model consisting of statism in the economic sphere, a single party in the ideological sphere, and a single nation in the political sphere (after the crushing of the Kurdish rebellion) has been established, there should be no alterations regarding this domestic order. Now that our independence is secured, however, we have no demands abroad. We are satisfied to live within our borders and have no wish to interfere in matters beyond our frontiers. As long as no claims are made on our frontiers, we shall live in peace with everyone.

This stance in favor of the status quo has several causes.

First, after the War of Liberation Turkey was too weak to be concerned with any foreign issue other than a direct threat to itself. This was a period of construction and consolidation of the state and the regime. It was a time to repair the ravages of war, carry out Westernizing reforms, and suppress the Kurdish rebellion. There was also the question of the removal of certain persons from the ranks of the leadership.

Second, at all stages the Soviet reality had to be taken into account. This country had the largest concentration of Turkish ethnic minorities. Under the treaty signed in 1921, the Soviets undertook not to foster communism in Turkey, while Turkey promised not to incite Pan-Turanism in the Soviet Union. Furthermore, the Soviet Union was the political and economic window to the world, both during the War of Liberation and afterward.

Third, the new Turkey was established as the successor of the empire that had come to grief as a consequence of the Pan-Turkist policies of the leaders of the Union and Progress movement. Turkey stayed clear of irredentism, vis-à-vis not only the Soviets but other countries as well. Its leaders knew that upsetting the existing balance for the sake of irredentist policies would damage Turkish interests. The new Turkey was persuaded that its borders as traced at Lausanne corresponded in very large measure to the borders aspired to under the National Pact (see "Revisionism and the Status Quo in the National Pact" in Section 1) and wanted nothing more than that Turkish minorities in neighboring countries should be able to live in peace and happiness.

Fourth, M. Kemal's personal influence also came into play. Unlike Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini, the Turkish leader knew where to stop. This explains how Kemalism attained its objectives and endured while the Nazis and Fascists were destroyed. Kemal's objective was not conquest but the strengthening of the nation-state.

Nevertheless, Turkish foreign policy also got involved in situations that ran counter to the Versailles order or undertook interventions beyond the frontiers.

First, the War of Liberation was a full-fledged act of revisionism (a policy aimed at changing the peace treaties that concluded World War I; see the discussion of the period 1919 to 1923 in Section 1). Furthermore, it was the first revisionist move that resorted to arms.

Second, after the end of the War of Liberation and the signing of the Peace Treaty of Lausanne came two more revisionist episodes. The Lausanne Convention of the Straits was changed at Montreux in 1936. In 1939 Hatay was annexed, and the Lausanne borders were changed.

Third, a number of transboundary interventions also occurred. From 1950 to 1953 a military contingent was sent to Korea. In 1974 Turkey made a military intervention in northern Cyprus. In the 1980s and 1990s military operations were conducted in northern Iraq. Turkey also joined the interventions in Somalia in 1993, Bosnia in 1994, Kosovo in 1999, and Afghanistan in 2001.

If we analyze Turkey's policies in favor of the status quo in the light of these examples, we can draw the following conclusions.

First, the Nationalist Movement interpreted revisionism restrictively even in the course of the War of Liberation. As soon as the war ended and the Lausanne Peace Treaty was signed, policies defending the status quo were launched. These policies are still in effect.

Second, the actions at Montreux and Hatay were carried out in conformity with international law and without resorting to arms. This is the opposite of what the revisionist states of the period were doing. Montreux removed the limitations on sovereignty over the Straits as a result of the consensus reached at the international conference. The annexation of Hatay was the result of cooperation and agreements with France and the League of Nations. In these examples we can detect the influence of the policies inherited from the Ottomans (who sought to base their actions on legality to minimize adverse foreign reactions) as well as the care that M. Kemal took in the same respect.

Hatay is the only instance of territorial expansion. Although it is an example of both revisionism and irredentism, it remains an isolated case and not the manifestation of a policy of irredentism (see the discussion in Section 2, 1923 to 1939).

Third, the intervention in Cyprus was in compliance with article 4 of the 1960 Treaty of Guarantee, although the protracted presence of Turkish troops on the island eventually harmed the status quo policy. As for hot-pursuit operations in northern Iraq, until 1988 these were carried out in accordance with the bilateral agreement concluded with Iraq. Subsequent operations were conducted with the implicit consent of Iraq and the overt consent of the U.S. The Korea, Somalia, Bosnia, and Kosovo operations took place within the framework of international organization operations designed to maintain the Western status quo.

Despite the view that the policy of defending the status quo had been dropped after the radical transformation of the international system in the 1990s, Turkish foreign policy has continued on its traditional path of maintaining the status quo.

2. Preserving Existing Balances

The second aspect of Turkey's status quo-oriented policies is the reinforcement and preservation of balances within the established order. This had two distinct manifestations. First, despite the Western orientation of its policies, Turkey always tried to establish a kind of balance between the West and its adversaries as a consequence of its geostrategic location. Second, for the same reason, Turkey has sought to ensure a balance with the different components of the West.

The first sort of balance was not easy to achieve, because the West was able to establish its dominance in the international sphere, leading to a unipolar world after the victory of the West in the Cold War. Nevertheless, Turkey has tried to diversify its options by taking advantage of the existing balance. In the period from 1923 to 1939 and from 1960 to 1980 Turkey took advantage of the USSR as an element of balance.

Turkey also took advantage of the second sort of balance by using the different Western European countries in the periods 1919–23, 1923–39, and 1939–45. With the entry of the U.S. on the world scene, this balancing act could have been between the U.S. and Western Europe, but that was not to be. In the aftermath of World War II Western Europe was very weak; and in the period from 1960 to 1980 Turkey was unable to come to a final decision regarding the European Economic Community (EEC). In the period after 1980 the hostile European reaction to the military regime of 12 September 1980 resulted in Turkey being practically excluded from Europe.

Three conclusions can be drawn from Turkey's policies of maintaining the status quo.

First, since the established order has always been under Western domination, the pro-West and pro-status quo policies are merely different faces of the same coin.

Second, when some sort of balance could be preserved, it was easier to follow a pro-status quo course. When Turkey leaned exclusively on the U.S., as in the Menderes era (Baghdad Pact) or Özal era (the scenarios of the Gulf War), deviations from the pro-status quo course occurred. When it became possible to preserve a balance (as was the case in 1923—39, 1939—45, and 1960—80), it was easier to maintain the status quo.

Third, Turkey's relative autonomy increased in these periods of balance. This relative autonomy was restricted in the Menderes, Özal, and post-1990 periods, while it was greater in 1923–39, 1939–45, and 1960–80.

B. Westernism

The Meaning and Roots of Westernism

Western civilization has an infrastructure based on capitalism and a superstructure based on rationality rather than on faith. In other words, the West is not a geographical term.

This concept has undergone changes since Turkey was established in 1923. Its infrastructure changed from a system that excluded the labor unions to the welfare state of today. Its superstructure had lost its solid liberal character between the two world wars when it was challenged by the Hitler order extolling a single leader, a single party, and a single ideology. Today it is a democratic order emphasizing human and minority rights. The West that has developed over time contains two strains that are completely opposed to one another. Turkey has usually been influenced by the dominant Western strain of the time, M. Kemal's main concept of the West, however, was the Anglo-Saxon version, and this determined Turkey's course.

Why the West? There must be good reasons for a Middle Eastern country with only a tiny fraction of its territory located in Europe to be so fervently pro-Western.

- 1. The historical dimension: as we have already seen, Anatolia's geographical, religious, and other features drove the Turks westward even before the establishment of the Ottoman Empire. Islam's gaza (holy war) tradition of spreading the faith was used to reinforce this tendency.
- 2. The ideological dimension: Union and Progress (UP), the political movement that made the strongest impression on Turkey's recent history, was both nationalist and Western. The Republic was established by the members of this movement, who maintained their policies of Westernization under the new regime (Box Intro-8).
- 3. The social dimension: Turkey's class structure and its development model have pulled it westward, as we have already seen.
- 4. The cultural dimension: the cultural influence of the West is very strong in Turkey. Both the state and the people want to be identified not as Eastern but as Western.
- 5. Turkey has pursued status quo-preserving strategies from the days of the Ottomans, as indicated earlier. As an SMP it has always been careful to maintain the status quo. For Turkey, the status quo and Westernism are synonymous.
- 6. Turkey is basically an underdeveloped country. Kemalism, as it developed in the 1930s, is the first example—perhaps the prototype—of the nationalism of underdeveloped countries that emerged in the 1950s. In

Box Intro-8. The Westernizing Reforms of Union and Progress

Aside from the declaration of the Republic, all of the seeds of the Kemalist reforms of the 1920s and 1930s were sown by Union and Progress. The UP leadership was Turkist and wanted to put "Muslim merchants" in the place of the non-Muslim minorities. The Law for the Promotion of Industry provided free land for factory building, customs exemptions, and tax relief to "national merchants." Under the Republic, a law with a similar title and content was passed in 1927. UP established the Itibar-i Milli Bank, while the Republic founded the is Bankasi in 1924. Policies for protecting and promoting national industries were launched by UP. The Republic was to do this after 1929. UP set aside a special week during which only locally produced goods. would be bought. In 1914 the capitulations were abolished. To keep the working class under strict control, UP enacted the law on "The Stoppage of Work," which banned unions and strikes. The Republic kept this law in force until 1937 and legalized the strikes only after 1961.

As regards superstructure, the UP leadership declared Turkish to be the official language in 1908 and considered reforming the alphabet but failed to implement this because of the war. In 1916 all tribunals were placed under the Ministry of Justice and all primary schools controlled by religious foundations under the Ministry of Education. UP established employment agencies for women, and matrimonial matters were removed from the competence of religious courts and placed under the competence of civil courts. A man was no longer able to enter into a polygamous marriage without the wife's consent. After 1916 an annual painting exhibition was held, and paintings were purchased to decorate the walls of public offices. The Quran was translated into Turkish.

It was during the Republic that these reforms were carried out wholesale and in a systematic manner, completely transforming the superstructure.

these countries nationalism and Westernism are synonymous (Box Intro-9).

All of these reasons are important. But Turkish Westernism is the result of a revolution from above. Until recently the country was still not free from semifeudal practices. In this context, to understand Westernism in Turkey we must understand the elite: the intellectuals.

The Rudder and Engine of Westernism: The Intellectuals

The term aydm (usually used in the plural form aydınlar: the enlightened, meaning intellectuals) applies only in underdeveloped countries. There is no corresponding term in developed countries. The words "intellectuals" and "intelligentsia" do not correspond exactly to aydınlar, which is derived from the Age of Enlightenment that the West went through in the seventeenth and eighteenth

Box Intro-9. Nationalism and Westernization in Underdeveloped Countries

Both in the prototype that appeared in Turkey in its Kemalist version and in the version that appeared about twenty-five years later among all the colonial and semicolonial countries, nationalism in underdeveloped countries has three main objectives: (1) gain independence, (2) become modern, (3) develop a positive identity.

The second objective can also be described as Westernization. The intelligentsia put into practice the values acquired from the West and tried to transform their country into a Western model. The political dimension of this remodeling is establishment of an independent state, the social dimension is nation building, and the economic dimension is industrialization through state capitalism, given the absence of private capital.

The third objective derives directly from the second. The first objective implies throwing the West out through the front door, but the second implies letting it back in through the rear door. This creates a feeling of frustration, which is compounded by the fact that these underdeveloped countries consist mostly of peoples with darker skins that make them particularly sensitive to the condescending racial attitudes of the West. This leads directly to the third objective of trying to solve the identity problem.

To summarize, nationalism in underdeveloped countries is both anti-Western and an admirer of the West, trying to install the West in its local environment. In fact, all the nationalisms that followed the original Western European nationalism of 1789 are reactions to Western European nationalism that nevertheless adopted it as their model.

centuries. Aydınlar refers to people who have assimilated the values of the Enlightenment and made these values applicable to their day-to-day lives. This is why there can be no such thing as "Islamic intellectuals" (İslamci aydınlar); this would be a contradiction in terms.

Probably the best available definition for the term aydın is a person who is "the product of modernization before this modernization reached his country" (Kautsky, p. 46). This is achieved by individuals belonging to the educated segment of the petty bourgeoisie who manage to get an education either in the West or in a Westernstyle educational institution in their own country (Box Intro-10). As a result, these intellectuals assimilate the values of the West, which are quite alien to the values of their underdeveloped society. In this manner they are able to observe their society from the perspective of the outsider.

As long as their society remains at its current level, the aydınlar cannot put their Western knowledge to good use or reshape their society, or even find employment suit-

Box Intro-10. The Social Roots and Basic Characteristics of the Aydınlar

The intellectuals (aydınlar) do not constitute a class but are a segment or a stratum of the educated wing of the petty bourgeoisie. The petty bourgeoisie can be divided into two parts. (1) The aydınlar are products of Western education and uncompromising Westernists who make a living thanks to their education and are usually employed in the bureaucracy. (2) Small traders make a living as traders and service providers even if they are educated. The influence of the West has a negative effect on small traders, unlike the aydınlar, because it forces them to change or go out of business. The Western superstructure (women's rights, etc.) is allen to them. Consequently, this segment is very conservative and anti-Western.

The aydınlar can be classified as both interclass and supraclass. The first category makes them insecure and gives rise to the accusation of being "spineless" because they aspire to join an upper class. The second category renders them relatively autonomous of the country's class structure. This allows them to pursue a pro-independence foreign policy and a domestic policy based on rational principles.

As products of the West, these intellectuals base themselves on the Western model, which is capitalism, and try to adapt it to their country's structure. In the second half of the 1970s, however, we encounter a second generation of intellectuals who were influenced by the Soviet and Chinese models and who wanted to modernize upon a Marxist infrastructure. This group failed to make headway following the ascendancy of globalization in the 1980s.

able to their skills. This is why they seek to change their country of birth according to Western models. When they come across resistance from the internal dynamics, they strive to reach their goal through revolution from above on the basis of their administrative skills acquired from the West.

The Aydınlar in Turkey, the West, and Foreign Policy

The aydınlar in Turkey are markedly different from the intellectuals of the other underdeveloped countries. The reasons for this difference and its repercussions on relations with the West can be summarized as follows.

- 1. The historical perspective: the Ottoman realm did not experience imperialist occupation, so its inhabitants had no reason to hate the West. Because there never was a colonial administration that suppressed these intellectuals, they did not become alienated from the West.
- 2. The structural perspective: even the Turkey of the 1920s was at a more advanced level in terms of the mode of production and the class structure than many countries were thirty years later. It was also closer to the West. For this reason, its dominant classes did not reject the West from the very outset.

- 3. The ethnic perspective: Turkey is a country with territory in Europe and with a white population. That is why the kind of anti-Westernism that is fed by the color bar does not exist in Turkey.
- 4. The chronological perspective: the Soviet revolution was still in its early stages during the formative stage of the Republic, and the Western development model was the only valid model. Furthermore, the "leftist intellectuals" (who may be called the second generation of the intellectuals) were not yet on the scene or were unable to influence the Republican cadres.

For these reasons, Turkey's Westernization process was easier, less complicated, and more radical than the Westernization process in other developing countries. Not only was Turkey's structure less alien to the West, but its intellectuals had received a Western education; far from being anti-Western, they greatly admired the West. On this basis they were prepared to copy the West systematically in both the infrastructure and the superstructure. This led to a foreign policy in which an alternative to the West would be unthinkable.

To understand Turkey's Western-oriented foreign policy, we should also bear in mind the background of Kemal Atatürk. To begin with, Atatürk was a graduate of the War College (Harbiye), the Ottoman institution that was most under the influence of the West. He was also a complete realist: this trait ensured that he would avoid conflicts with the Western major powers and seek accommodations with them. He was determined to adopt the Western superstructure as well as the infrastructure. We shall revert to this theme in the appraisal of the period from 1923 to 1939.

The Implementation of Turkish Foreign Policy

I. THE MINISTRY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS

A. The Relative Autonomy of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs

The Ministry's Difficult Task

Invariably the precondition for a successful foreign policy is for the country to rest on a sound foundation. The reason for the great influence of the U.S. in the international arena is the strong foundation of the country—military, political, and especially economic—rather than the skill-fulness of its diplomacy.

As we have already seen, this does not apply to Turkey. Many of the country's chronic problems go back to the beginning of the twentieth century and sometimes even earlier (the Kurdish question, the Armenian question, disputes with Greece, differences with the Arab countries, etc.) and are not susceptible to solutions by modern methods because of Turkey's Asian and Middle Eastern dimensions. The attempt to solve these questions in isolation renders them even more complicated in the long run.

As a medium power, Turkey was able to take advantage of its geostrategic location during the Cold War to further its economic development. With the end of the Cold War this possibility was in large measure lost. U.S. aid to Turkey, which began in 1947, came to an end in 1998; the IMF is little concerned with geostrategy (although the situation is now somewhat different in the post-9/11 world).

In addition, succeeding governments have not been able to deal successfully with the economic consequences of globalization. This rigidifies their stand vis-à-vis the outside world in political questions, making it harder to implement an appropriate foreign policy. That should not be understood to mean that the usual attempt is being made to distract the public from internal questions by directing its attention abroad. Turkey's various political/ideological groups (Kurdish nationalists, Islamists, etc.) are developed enough to avoid falling into this trap. What is referred to here is the attempt to use certain steps that relate to foreign policy (such as resistance to the abolition of the death penalty, recognition of ethnic identity, and acceptance of nonviolent freedom of expression) as a cover for economic submissiveness. This renders the task of Turkish diplomacy very difficult.

In practice, however, these negative factors are not fully reflected in Turkey's foreign relations, despite the revolution that has taken place in communications. One reason for this is Turkey's lingering geopolitical importance. But another reason is the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA), which, compared to other institutions, has been relatively less affected by the country's upheavals and limitations. This institution has had its share of criticism. Certain quarters have berated it for not publicizing Turkey adequately or for not putting across Turkish causes convincingly. This criticism is unwarranted. Turkey's domestic problems resulting directly from an internal structure that is badly in need of reform are reflected abroad in a manner that plays down their negative aspects. The ministry is able to accomplish this difficult task thanks to its relative insulation from the country's turbulent politics.

To understand Turkey's foreign policy, it is necessary to examine this relative autonomy of the ministry. But let us look at the statistics first.

The Ministry's Personnel and Budget

The ministry's personnel consists of professional staff, popularly referred to as diplomats, and support staff.

According to the 2001 data, 1,040,101 civil servants work in Turkey's ministries. This figure does not include those working in the president's office, the Grand National Assembly, the Ministry of Defense, the National Intelligence Organization (MIT), the gendarmerie, the public economic enterprises, and provincial and local administrations.

The total number of personnel in the MFA is 2,675. Foreign policy is implemented by professional staff (career diplomats), numbering 880 in 2001. Of these professionals, 21% are women. Roughly 45% are stationed at headquarters in Ankara, with the remaining 55% serving at 157 posts in 93 countries. Service at headquarters is a minimum of two years, followed by foreign postings, which (with a few exceptions) cannot exceed five years.

The budget of the ministry represents 0.3 to 0.4% of the national budget. In comparison, the budget of the Administration for Religious Affairs is 1.5 times larger. The share of the State Department in the U.S. federal budget is over 4%.

After 1990 posts were established in newly independent countries, but the number of professional staff did not increase correspondingly. Especially in periods of erosion in the value of the Turkish currency, the MFA has to carry out its tasks with huge budgetary and personnel constraints.

The relative autonomy that allows the MFA to operate effectively is derived from powerful sources. We shall examine these in two categories: sources from outside the ministry and within the ministry itself.

Outside Sources Feeding the MFA's Autonomy

These sources can be subdivided into those related to the nature of the diplomatic profession and those related to the special features of Turkey.

The Nature of the Diplomatic Profession

First, Foreign Affairs, the Interior, and Finance constitute the principal ministries in all countries.

Second, the MFA and the Ministry of Defense are concerned with foreign countries and come to be closely associated with the national interest.

Third, diplomacy is a very special field and requires special skills that other civil servants need not have. Knowing foreign languages, being at home in labyrinthine international practices, and being able to keep pace with the ever-changing international environment are just some of these special requirements.

As a result, the MFA is least affected by political patronage and pressures for special favors. This allows it to remain free from voters' demands and political impropriety. Furthermore, the margin for error in foreign relations is very narrow. An error in domestic politics can be readily redressed, but a provision inserted in a treaty as a result of oversight can bring about untold difficulties to a country for many years, directly affecting its national interest.

The Special Features of Turkey

First, the West has a special place in Turkey, and the MFA has been a prime vehicle for transmitting the values of the West to the country since Ottoman times. The earliest contacts with the West were through the military. Long before its forerunner the Reis-ül Küttaplık was transformed into the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in 1835, delegations were being sent to the West and were bringing the West to the attention of the country through their dispatches. During the Directoire period in France (1795–99), Morah Esseyit Ali Efendi studied how the French MFA operated and reported his findings to Istanbul. This practice is still kept up, with embassies submitting periodic reports to headquarters.

A second feature is that the prime minister is usually familiar only with the domestic scene. Even when familiar with the international scene, the prime minister cannot keep up with the pace of change or the intricacies of international economics. By the nature of Turkish politics, prime ministers tend to originate from provincial small towns. The MFA is the institution that is supposed to keep abreast of international developments. Politicians can lose their positions after an election, but professional diplomats stay at their jobs for roughly forty years before they retire.

The third feature is that Turkish politicians and civil servants do not as a rule have foreign language skills; nor are they familiar with international procedures. This places a special burden on the MFA. When politicians and civil servants travel abroad and find themselves on unfamiliar ground, they must rely on diplomats. Even the personnel of other ministries posted in foreign countries rarely know foreign languages and procedures well enough to conduct their business directly with their foreign counterparts.

A fourth feature is the case of politicians who make wrong moves that harm Turkey, requiring the intervention of diplomats to repair the damage. This usually occurs when the MFA is excluded either deliberately or by oversight. In any situation that has international implications, the rule is that politicians should consult the MFA to make sure that they do not run counter to the country's current position with regard to that subject. When this rule is not heeded, the country can be placed in a difficult or embarrassing situation. When a minister gives a speech supporting an independent Kosovo in order to curry favor with the Albanian lobby in Turkey or out of sympathy for the Muslim community in the Balkans, it is the MFA that has to make sure that foreigners do not link this support for separatism with Turkey's problems in the southeastern part of the country.

From having to do this often, the MFA has gained considerable expertise in this field. A typical example of this is when the ministry issues a press release stating that the minister in question was expressing his or her private views, that in democracies such things do happen, and that the government's official position is that the issue in question should be resolved within the framework of the UN Security Council resolution. If the minister has received the representative of the "Chechen Republic" in the presence of TV cameras without consulting the MFA, the ministry tries to prevent the broadcasting of the event. As a courtesy, most channels will comply with such a request. The next step would be to invite the Russian ambassador to the ministry and inform the ambassador that the minister in question has made a statement that is open to misinterpretation, that the matter should not be needlessly blown up or seen in a negative light, and that the Russian Federation is well aware of Turkey's policy. In more serious cases, the matter is allowed to cool off in an effort to have the episode forgotten. If it is difficult to forget (as in the case of T. Özal's actions during the Gulf War), then the ministry tries to minimize the damage.

One of the situations that would be difficult to redress is when the government has joined, in one way or another, an international organization that follows a line contrary to Turkey's general orientation. It is conceivable that a prime minister might establish a link with an organization of doubtful value that might also be following an anti-Western line. The MFA would follow instructions and carry out the requirements of membership. Once the prime minister is out of office, the staff would minimize links with the organization even though they would have to attend meetings to demonstrate the state's continuity of purpose. Summit meetings, however, would be attended by a minister of state. At a second stage, the organization's joint projects would be delayed or suspended. Of course, all these efforts naturally drain the limited resources of the ministry.

The MFA must also cope with situations caused by politicians who fail to take the international repercussions of their actions into account. When Öcalan showed up in Rome and sought political asylum in late 1998, the police failed to prevent an angry crowd from tearing down the sign of the Italian embassy in Ankara. When the French parliament passed a law on the Armenian question in 2001 that was perceived as being anti-Turkish, French firms were prevented from bidding for projects in Turkey. This did not help Turkish ministers who went to Paris or Rome some months later to secure loans or attract investments.

2. Factors within the Ministry That Contribute to Relative Autonomy

The Quality of Personnel

The quality of the personnel of the MFA is far above the average level of civil servants in Turkey, for a number of reasons.

To qualify for employment in the ministry, candidates must pass a rigorous competitive exam (Box Intro11). They cannot transfer from other ministries. In the past, difficulties arose in obtaining the authorization of the Ministry of Finance for the necessary number of positions. Now it is difficult to fill all the positions available because an insufficient number of candidates with the right qualifications apply. This is because public sector employment is not as desirable as it used to be, the ministry's salaries have lost their attractiveness, diplomats serving abroad face the threat of assassination, and the possibility of finding employment in foreign countries has increased.

The examining board consists of at least five ambassadors. Other ministers plenipotentiary and ambassadors may choose to join the board. The exam is meticulous and fair, because senior diplomats try to maintain the MFA's high standards. They know that the quality of their subordinates will reflect on the quality of their own work.

That is why favoritism in the exam is extremely rare. Even the son of a president of the Republic is known to have failed the exam in his first attempt.

This is also true for the candidates taking the exam for administrative personnel, but the same cannot be said about the personnel not included in these two basic categories. Promotions are difficult but fair. Those succeeding in the entrance exam are admitted to the ministry on probation for two years. The first year is a period of in-service training. After this comes one year as attaché, three years as third secretary, and three years as second secretary; if the incumbent has a personal record of at least seventysix points out of one hundred, he or she can then take an exam to be promoted to first secretary. Those who fail this exam three times are downgraded to the category of administrative staff. Each failure lowers the position of the incumbent in the hierarchy. Up to this point the incumbent has been ranked according to the entrance exam grade. After this, the promotion exam for first secretary will determine ranking up to the level of senior counselor. If the diplomat becomes minister plenipotentiary, he or she is a candidate to become ambassador. Thirty-five to forty members of the staff are in this category.

Box Intro-11. The Entrance Exam for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs

The exam consists of two parts, written and oral. The passing grade is seventy. The written part consists of four different tests: a composition in English, French, or German, a composition in Turkish; a translation from Turkish to a foreign language; and a translation from a foreign language to Turkish. Those taking the exam in German must obtain a grade of at least fifty in one of the other two languages. Those taking the exam in two languages will gain an advantage. Turkish composition is given particular attention. The Turkish text that is to be translated is complicated and difficult. Each test is graded separately, and a passing grade is required for all four tests. The total of the grades determines the level of the candidate.

Successful applicants are then invited to take the oral exam, which can last from thirty minutes to one hour. The candidate must answer questions on diplomatic history, international politics, Turkish foreign policy, constitutional law, international law, civil law, private international law, international law, international economics, the Turkish economy, finance, and general culture. The questions are selected by drawing lots. In this exam-cum-interview, candidates are judged according to their knowledge and general comportment as well as the order and manner in which they deal with the particular subjects.

(B. ORAN)

Rising in the hierarchy depends exclusively on the diplomat's place in the seniority list. This list determines promotions and assignments. No other ministry has this type of ranking, derived from the Vienna Convention. Naturally, diplomats cannot get promotions as fast as in other ministries.

Diplomats remain attached to their jobs and work with devotion despite the difficulties and threats to personal security experienced in foreign assignments, because of the equitable system that prevails in the MFA. They know that if they are hard-working and successful the system will ensure their regular promotion. Although certain ambassadors may somehow have attained the position without really deserving it, the staff of the ministry knows that every deserving diplomat attains the rank of ambassador. All ambassadors are selected from among the staff of the MFA, the last noncareer ambassador with a military background having retired in the early 1980s.

The knowledge that diligence and effective performance will be duly rewarded encourages keen competition among career diplomats. Although foreign assignments might not always reflect the ranking in the entrance exam, the urge to get desirable postings and qualify to join the ranks of the thirty-five to forty diplomats who are considered ambassadorial material sharpens the competition and improves the performance of the staff.

There is a strict hierarchy and discipline in the MFA. In this respect it ranks immediately after the armed forces.

An individual who becomes a career diplomat immediately begins to conform to a model. Diplomats must always be properly attired and well behaved and must observe the rules of protocol and etiquette. They must address their superiors deferentially and seek permission to leave when the workday is over. They must remain at a party until their superior leaves. Their private life, drinking and gambling habits, ability to live within their income, and personal relations will all affect their careers and determine whether they get promoted and especially whether they become ambassadors. Although this strict discipline and hierarchy can wear diplomats down, it is important in preserving the quality of personnel. The hierarchy may be strict, but the diplomats know that it will be fair. Young diplomats are aware that in the future their subordinates will serve them with the same dedication with which they serve their superiors. They have no doubt that working overtime will always improve their prospects of promotion.

Thanks to this discipline, the decline in the quality of civil servants observed since 1980 has had a minimum impact on the MFA.

Unlike their counterparts in other government agencies, diplomats never withhold information or documents from their colleagues. Any information or document in any department is automatically transmitted to other related departments in the ministry and to other related organizations. In this manner proper coordination is achieved both within the MFA and among government agencies. At the same time, diplomats are provided with all the available information related to their field of competence so that they can have a full picture of any situation. This is achieved through the following mechanisms and procedures.

Telegrams: telegrams arriving from missions abroad are distributed to related departments. To cite an example, if the ambassador in Sofia has made a demarche on the subject of the Council of Europe to the Bulgarian MFA, the dispatch is addressed to Turkey's representation to the Council of Europe in Strasbourg and to the departments of the ministry dealing with the Council of Europe and Bulgaria. If the demarche relates to some action of the Council on Cyprus, the Turkish Embassy in Nicosia and the Cyprus department in the MFA will also receive copies of the dispatch. If the Bulgarian official has referred to something the Russian ambassador said, the dispatch will also go to the embassy in Moscow and to the ministry's Russian department. All plain and coded messages other than technical ones (for example, acknowledging receipt of a parcel) are also received by the MFA's senior staff, the president's office, the prime minister's office, and (depending on the subject) the chief of the General Staff and the National Intelligence Organization. Requests for visas are transmitted to the Ministry of Interior.

Service notes: service notes are reports drafted by diplomats on all demarches made by them or to them at headquarters. These service notes are transmitted to the senior staff of the MFA, the offices of the president and prime minister, and also the deputy prime ministers when there is a coalition government. In any event, diplomats in the position of cabinet chief or advisor in these offices maintain a close liaison between these offices and the MFA. The distribution of confidential material is more restricted, but all interested offices and departments will get their copies.

The MFA also employs circular service notes in its communications. For example, when an important event like Vladimir Putin taking over the Russian presidency takes place, the MFA's appraisal is communicated to all departments in the ministry and missions abroad through this device.

This communication system not only operates according to strict rules but is based on the deep-rooted traditions of the MFA. This reinforces the integrity of the MFA, rooted in its role as a historic institution with staff members who have been the products, until very recently, of a limited number of elite schools, and with well-defined traditions, discipline, and hierarchy.

The decision-making process in the MFA, which can be described as "democratic centralism," secures the effective functioning of the institution and contributes to the development of a motivated staff. In this system decisions are initiated at the level of section chief; the proposal works its way up to the top echelons, where the final decision is made and then executed at a lower level. This allows the personnel to get proper training, to develop loyalty to the ministry, and to identify with the duty being performed.

The MFA's Bureaucratic Character

Despite the distinctiveness of its personnel, the MFA makes a great effort to be a smoothly operating part of the general state bureaucracy. This contributes to its relative autonomy. Let us see how this is accomplished.

First, the ministry strives to maintain continuity within the state and relies on its traditions to do this. The ministers of foreign affairs and the permanent undersecretaries are not subject to capricious change.

The frequency of change among ministers is less than among governments, and this helps provide a certain continuity in the state's foreign policy. In the 975 months that elapsed from the establishment of the Grand National Assembly in April 1920 to July 2001, there have been sixty-three different governments but only thirty-seven ministers of foreign affairs. The average span of governments was 15.4 months, while the ministers lasted for 26.3 months. This means that the period in office of the minister was 71% longer than that of the government. (In fact, this proportion would be higher if it were not for the frequent change of ministers after 1990. During this period there have been eleven governments and thirteen ministers.)

Because foreign relations is a difficult and specialized field, the actual person at the helm of the MFA is usually not the minister, who is a politician, but the undersecretary, who is a professional. In Atatürk's period the undersecretary had a special place in the state hierarchy. To this day the undersecretary's official car carries a red registration plate, similar to that of a minister. The 12 September coup administration (following the military takeover) and T. Özal wanted to put an end to this practice but were probably thwarted by the knowledge that the original decree establishing the practice bore Atatürk's signature. By Decree No. 4334 of 1 March 1981, however, the second highest ranking person's title of secretary-general was changed to undersecretary, as in the case of other ministrates.

During the years of the Republic the undersecretary of the MFA has always been a diplomat who had risen in the ranks. This practice is observed only in the ministries of the Interior, Defense, and Finance. In other ministries the undersecretary comes and goes with the minister. With the exception of the Ministry of Defense, only in the MFA is it known beforehand who the next undersecretary will be. If we look at the statistics from the establishment of the TGNA to July 2001, there have been thirty-one undersecretaries, with an average span in office of 31.4 months. Their time in office is longer than that of ministers by over 19% and longer than that of governments by 104%.

Second, the MFA stays clear of domestic politics and its day-to-day functioning. This keeps it out of the political fray and contributes to its relative autonomy.

The ministry tries to insulate itself and the government from the influence of public opinion in the formulation of foreign policy. This is relatively easy, given that foreign policy is a field far removed from clientelist relations. When dealing with questions such as Cyprus, Azerbaijan, or Bosnia, public opinion obviously cannot be completely ignored. Willy-nilly, the MFA has to take account of public sentiment in such cases. Furthermore, it has become harder to ignore public opinion, because since 1990 influential lobbies have sprung up in Turkey.

When the lobby's activities are parallel to Turkey's interests, there is usually no problem. A typical example of this is Greenpeace's efforts to keep dangerous cargoes out of the Turkish Straits. Other examples are the Turkish lobbies in foreign countries, like the Turkish lobby in the U.S. that tries to block anti-Turkish legislation in Congress. In some cases, however, the lobbies have used abusive language against Armenian, Cypriot, Kurdish, or Greek associations and followed Pan-Turkic policies based on racism. This is highly embarrassing to the MFA, which tries to distance itself from their activities or to steer them toward more rational courses.

The lobbies that cause the MFA the greatest difficulties are the ones located in Turkey. First of all, these lobbies try to get Turkey aligned with their ethnic kin (Albanians, Abkhazians, Georgians, Chechens, Circassians, Azerbaijanis, etc.). Second, they also try to put Turkey into a frame of mind where decisions are based not on right and wrong but on irrational and dangerous distinctions such as active/passive, friend/foe, and even Muslim/infidel. Third, they raise unfeasible and irrational expectations among the Turkish public by advocating the bombing of Serbs in Bosnia or Armenians in Nagorno Karabakh, leading to severe disappointments. Such lobbies get their members of parliament to apply pressure on the MFA. When the MFA referred to armed Chechen hijackers of the ferryboat Avrasya as terrorists in 1996, the ministry's telephones were deluged with protest calls.

The MFA has to deal in different ways with these lobbies that attempt to derail Turkey's traditional sober policy of staying out of foreign conflicts. When the Abhaz lobby presses the ministry in connection with humanitarian aid to Georgia, the pressure can be deflected by sending additional humanitarian aid to Georgia with the request that it be distributed to the Abhaz people. But if the pressure is considered a threat to Turkish interests, then the MFA will resist. If the pressure is to bomb Bosnia, the ministry will work in close consultation with the General Staff to prevent such an extreme course. When the Albanian lobby agitates for the independence of Kosovo or the dismemberment of Macedonia, it is blocked from advocating a course that could constitute a bad precedent for Turkey in its efforts to maintain its territorial integrity. The MFA persuades the Chechen lobby that good sense dictates that Turkey must not damage its good relations with Russia.

Third, the MFA's guiding principle is "service to the government, loyalty to the state." Although its loyalty is fundamentally to the state, the ministry scrupulously executes the policies of the current government regardless of any qualms that its personnel may have. The MFA has its personnel in the office of the president and the prime minister to provide liaison and serve as advisors. The ministry also has experts to brief professional bodies, universities, ministries, associations, and other groups on subjects coming within its field of competence. It provides notes to institutions and individuals on particular subjects, furnishing background information and explaining the ministry's views on the subject.

This practice, which was inherited from the Ottomans but also corresponds to the practice of all modern MFAs, constitutes a major asset to the state. When the War of Liberation ended with the victory of Ankara, the ministry continued to provide its professional services with the same loyalty to the new regime.

The employees of the MFA are usually more tight-lipped than the personnel of other ministries. It is not unusual for senior Turkish officials to speak or leak to the press when they cannot persuade politicians to follow a sensible course. This rarely occurs in the MFA. Because the ministry's loyalty is above suspicion, governments need not attempt to "gain supremacy" in the ministry. It is an established fact that the MFA will carry out its duties without questioning. This ensures that the MFA is free from sniping and able to get on with its duties with relative autonomy.

In this context the MFA avoids taking an openly contrary position on taboo "national" issues such as anticommunism during the Cold War, Armenia later on, and Cyprus (we shall revert to this question later). In fact, on issues where public opinion is tough and unyielding and its own freedom of maneuver is consequently very restricted, the MFA can be said not to have a "foreign policy." In such cases, it merely carries out the policies dictated by the prevailing chauvinistic atmosphere and avoids attracting unwanted criticism.

The practice of careful execution of government policies by the MFA has limits, however. One is when the MFA is kept out of foreign policy decisions. Naturally, this is a matter of survival for the ministry, and it is perfectly understandable that it should react. Such an instance (not as an isolated incident but as a matter of deliberate policy) occurred only once. T. Özal had the notion that the Mülkiye (Faculty of Political Science of the University of Ankara) approach, which stands for upholding the public interest, traditions, legality, and hierarchy, was preventing important initiatives. Özal started taking fundamental steps in the field of foreign affairs (such as the unilateral lifting of visa requirements for Greek nationals, preparations for the 30 January 1988 Davos meeting, and making important contacts not through ambassadors but through businessmen and journalists close to himself) without even informing the MFA. He also prevented the keeping of records at crucial meetings. The MFA's reaction was to continue to carry out its duties faithfully, while taking subtle steps to ensure that Özal's actions contrary to Turkey's traditional policies of rationally upholding the status quo and his personal gaffes and political mistakes became public knowledge.

The second limit is even more important: deviation from the fundamental pillar of Turkish foreign policy, Westernism. This limit was breached twice, causing internal grumbling in the first case and open opposition in the second. The first case was when Gündüz Ökçün as minister tried to add a pro-Third World strand to Turkr ish foreign policy from 1977 to 1979. The second case was when the Necmettin Erbakan government (the coalition between the Welfare and True Path parties, lasting from 8 July 1996 to 30 June 1997) tried to bring relations with Muslim countries to the foreground, especially with its D-8 project. In this instance, opposition did not involve refraining from performing duties. Instead Erbakan's blunders and shortcomings while visiting Libya, Iran, and similar countries were discreetly leaked to the press. It is widely believed that the MFA acted in close coordination with the General Staff in this case (see Box 7-59 in Section 7).

The Rational Aspect of the Ministry's Bureaucracy

This aspect of the ministry's bureaucracy may appear to conflict with the "typical" aspect described in the previous section but in fact does not. The two aspects complement one another and enhance the MFA's importance and thereby reinforce its relative autonomy. In certain circumstances, policies must show flexibility to avoid failure, and the ministry's task is to prevent failure by adjusting policies to changing circumstances.

First, although the MFA implements the foreign policy of the government without questioning it, it certainly questions and debates all issues internally, including taboo subjects. It does this through brainstorming sessions where discussion papers are circulated and considered. The aim is to be prepared for policy changes when the need for such changes arises (we shall return to this question from a different perspective at the end of this section). Sometimes it even prepares the ground for such changes. In July 2000 the media reported that the MFA was taking initiatives to establish diplomatic contacts, though not diplomatic relations, with Armenia, while trying at the same time to persuade Azerbaijan to accept this.

Second (and perhaps more importantly), while carrying out without question policies that may appear necessary from a domestic vantage point but may be harmful to the state in the external context, the MFA personnel will also caution politicians about possible dangers.

This is done in two basic ways. First, the negative aspects of harmful policies are explained to politicians in very discreet language and in a roundabout way. This is done with a rational solution proposal that does not give the impression that a veering away from traditional state policies has occurred. For example, instead of proposing that Öcalan's death sentence should not be carried out in order to prevent great damage to Turkey's international image, the ministry conveys the message that it is inappropriate for Turkey to remain (along with Russia) the sole country in the Council of Europe not to have signed the Sixth Additional Protocol (relating to the abolition of the death penalty) of the Convention on Human Rights and the Protection of Basic Freedoms.

Perhaps the most typical example of this type of warning is the information release put out by the ministry on 25 September 1992, containing this paragraph written in diplomatic language on the post of high commissioner on national minorities newly established by the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE): "the new mechanism might well be used against Turkey or any other member of the CSCE. As long as Turkey is making progress in the fields of democracy and human rights, there will be no grounds for feeling disturbed over the development of CSCE mechanisms" (see Box 5-1 in Section 5).

The second way for the ministry to issue warnings is an integral part of its functions: the transmission of information on external events to the domestic scene. When the subject is sensitive this is done with proper emphasis so that it is not overlooked. The important thing is to transmit the foreign reaction with appropriate emphasis but without including the MFA's views. An example of this is the decision in 1982, following the coup of 12 September, to hold a ceremony marking the twentieth anniversary of the establishment of the Constitutional Court. On that occasion the embassy in Bern was instructed to issue invitations to the Swiss Federal Tribunal to participate at the ceremony. The primary duty of the MFA was to warn the administration that the holding of a ceremony by the members of the Constitutional Court in a country where the Constitution had been abolished through a military coup would be perceived negatively in Europe. The warnings were not heeded, and the invitations were issued. The federal judges not only refused to attend the ceremony but also arranged a press conference at which they appeared in their judicial robes, contributing to the spread of a negative image for Turkey. The embassy's task was to transmit this information in full detail to Ankara and vividly convey the reigning negative atmosphere. This warned Ankara to be on guard against similar events and ensured that the MFA would be taken more seriously by the state machinery in the future.

In analogous situations the MFA has given sensible warnings to various government agencies and in particular to the General Directorate of Foundations in connection with decisions relating to minorities in Turkey. In carrying out its duty to propose correct policies to the state, the MFA helps Turkey to preserve its reputation abroad and demonstrates that it is advisable to keep the ministry in the decision-making process in domestic issues with foreign implications. For example, any restrictions on non-Muslim pious foundations in Turkey applied in contravention of the Lausanne Treaty bring about an immediate reaction against Turkish foundations in Western Thrace. This brings home the message to politicians that the warnings of the MFA on such issues should be heeded. It should be noted, however, that the MFA's warnings are only partially effective and do not always prevent the same errors from being repeated.

The passage of time has invariably demonstrated the soundness of the MFA's warnings. In the case of the Lice incident of 1993, the MFA indicated in 1997 that it would be wiser to reach a friendly settlement with the local inhabitants whose houses were destroyed by gunfire, because the compensation that would be awarded by the European Court of Human Rights would be higher (see "The Issue of Human Rights" in Section 7). Events proved the MFA to be right. Such cases contribute to the strengthening of the credibility, the prestige, and the relative autonomy of the MFA within the state structure.

The Closeness of the MFA to the Military

The MFA's relative autonomy is also enhanced by its similarity to the military, which holds first rank in the field of relative autonomy. Some of the attributes that give the military its relative autonomy are also the attributes of the MFA. Furthermore, there is a general impression that the MFA and the military are working closely together.

First, these institutions are based on two of the windows that opened to the West even in Ottoman times: the War College (Harbiye) and the College for Civil Servants (Mülkiye), the third window being the Medical School (Tibbiye). The graduates of these three colleges are convinced that there is no satisfactory alternative to the West.

Second, the MFA and the military also resemble one another in form. Their members wear uniforms: one military, the other civilian. It is inconceivable that a diplomat would show up at work without a jacket and tie. The same similarity exists in regard to respect for superiors, strict discipline, observance of protocol, and hierarchy.

The third resemblance is in their operating methods. Both hold innumerable internal meetings to reach their conclusions. They even go through simulation exercises where some of their members are asked to play the part of the opposition in order to get a better idea of the position of the other side. Once a decision is reached, they execute orders faithfully and without questioning.

Fourth, the MFA and the military share the same values. Their fundamental duty is to be concerned with foreigners. That is why they have a keen sense of awareness for their land, national defense, patriotism, the public interest, and the national interest. Members of the military feel close to the MFA because they entertain no doubts about its patriotism.

Fifth, their approach to crises is similar. In matters dealing with foreign affairs both institutions act with extreme caution. Many examples of this can be cited, going back to the early days of the regime. There was much opposition in the Turkish Grand National Assembly (TGNA) to the Treaty of Lausanne after its signature, and it took the combined efforts of the chief of the General Staff, Marshal Fevzi Çakmak, and TGNA president Marshal Mustafa Kemal to stem this opposition. When the Germans offered the Aegean islands to Turkey through informal channels near the end of World War II, the opposition (the leaders of the future Democratic Party to come to power in 1950) wanted to capitalize on this by turning the issue into a "national cause." They were checked by a coalition of diplomats and soldiers. Another instance of preventing foreign adventures occurred during the Gulf War of 1991.

It is also well known that the MFA has had to use the National Security Council to "persuade" prominent politicians who strayed too far from Turkey's traditional foreign policy by espousing the causes of ethnic lobbies for electoral gains. When diplomats and soldiers act in unison, their combined voice carries weight not just in Turkey but also in highly developed countries, including the U.S. This ability to influence the outcome reinforces the closeness of diplomats and the military, which also gains strength from the collaboration between diplomats and military attachés in Turkey's foreign missions.

Esprit de Corps

A strong feeling of professional solidarity within the community of diplomats, deriving from a number of sources, contributes to the relative autonomy of the MFA.

The first thing to bear in mind is that diplomats constitute a very small segment of the civil service. Because of this, the MFA has a weak hand in the negotiations for salary increases or budgetary appropriations. Everyone can agree on the need to renew hospitals or tanks; but, in a country where the currency is constantly being devalued, it is not easy to persuade people to set aside foreign currency to repair an embassy building. When diplomats travel abroad to attend a meeting, their per diem will barely cover their hotel expenses, so they end up staying in the homes of their colleagues. Diplomats serving in missions abroad constitute a very small group. Even those who do not get along will not criticize one another to outsiders.

Second, the MFA does not elicit much sympathy from the general public. The prevailing view is that diplomats are "a bunch of effete snobs." This negative perception is compounded by the condescending and patronizing attitude of many of these professionals. The ministry always attracts unfair criticism without due regard for the general situation of the country and the constraints that have to be overcome. Because so much of the MFA's work is confidential, it is not always possible for diplomats to defend their actions or boast about their successes. In any case, they do not make public statements.

Third, the esprit de corps among diplomats draws strength from their common social class and therefore common culture. The vast majority of diplomats come from the educated petty bourgeoisie. According to a brochure put out by the MFA, the parents of personnel admitted to the ministry were from the following backgrounds: bankers 4%, lawyers 6%, physicians and pharmacists 6%, architects and engineers 7%, self-employed 13%, diplomats 15%, retired civil servants 19%, civil servants 25%, others 5%.

Finally, the consciousness of being a member of a "select" group also strengthens the existing esprit de corps.

B. Shortcomings and Weaknesses of the Ministry

As in the case of the MFA's strengths, we shall examine its weaknesses in two parts: external and internal.

The MFA's External Shortcomings and Weaknesses

Material Constraints

The many problems that the ministry has to contend with and its organizational shortcomings are in large measure derived from the fact that it operates with a very restricted budget. Although the salaries of diplomats when serving at home are slightly above the general civil service level, they are completely inadequate when considered in the light of diplomats' protocol obligations. In these circumstances the diplomats are eagerly awaiting their foreign assignments, which reduces their effectiveness. As files change hands every two years, continuity suffers. Sometimes important departments are faced with a complete change of personnel. We could almost say that it is the deputy directors general who preserve continuity at headquarters, because they serve for a period of three to three and a half years.

Continuity is also lacking in missions abroad. To economize on salaries, a replacement is sent abroad only when the diplomat has returned to headquarters. To have an orderly transfer of files, however, it is necessary for the departing diplomat and his or her successor to work together for at least two weeks, which the state will not allow in order to save half a salary.

Erosion of Responsibility

Ever since the 1960s, when the question of joining the EEC came under the responsibility of the State Planning Organization, the MFA's areas of responsibility have been trimmed. This tendency accelerated after 1980 when T. Özal, as part of his project to diminish the influence of the Mülkiye tradition in the bureaucracy, recast the personnel and the functions of the three principal ministries: the Interior, Foreign Affairs, and Finance. All government agencies are in a race to appropriate the functions of the MFA, with serious consequences for implementing a well-coordinated foreign policy. For example, the Undersecretariat of Foreign Trade corresponds directly with the Belgian Embassy in Ankara. It has been reported in the press that the Ministry of Health rejected the relief assistance of certain countries after the Marmara earthquake of 1999. In June 2000 the members of an Armenian delegation who were attending a meeting of the municipality of Kars were deported upon the orders of the local governor. The chief prosecutor of the State Security Tribunal applied directly to the representative office of the European Commission, seeking information about an investigation he was conducting.

According to international practice and for the sake of achieving proper coordination, it should have been necessary for these agencies to seek the advice of the MFA, with all correspondence with foreign entities being conducted through the MFA. As a matter of fact, article 1 of Law No. 1173, dated 17 May 1969 and entitled "Law on the Implementation and Coordination of International Relations," stipulates that the contacts and negotiations between the Republic of Turkey and foreign states, their missions, and representatives will be conducted by the MFA in consultation with the related ministry.

2. The MFA's Internal Shortcomings and Weaknesses

The external negative factors aggravate those that derive from the MFA's own organizational structure.

"Memory"

Ihsan Sabri Çağlayangil, who served as minister of foreign affairs three times for a period of eight years, once remarked that the MFA has no memory. This is a very serious shortcoming and has a number of causes.

To begin with, the archives might just as well not exist because they are not properly classified and are in a dispersed state. Documents less than five years old are kept in the departments by persons who are not experts in filing and maintaining archives. After five years files are transferred to a temporary location in the basement of the main building and eventually transferred to the newly established state archives building in the Yenimahalle district of Ankara. Archives of the Ottoman period are kept in the Prime Ministry's archives, located in Istanbul. Still other documents are kept in embassies.

Because fax messages are not transcribed to regular paper, they fade over time and become useless. The MFA's computer network did not adopt the Windows operating system until July 2001. As a result, retrieving any bit of information—even if it is related only to the recent past such as the 1980s—takes time unless the person with the information is at hand. The library, which is not particularly extensive, was moved recently from the annex building to one located closer to the main building. Being housed in several dispersed buildings is in itself a serious handicap for the MFA.

Policy Planning

The MFA does not conduct policy planning activity that fits the description and meets the requirements of the age. Reading the incoming dispatches and carrying out day-to-day duties leave no time for medium- and long-term policy planning.

Until 1995 there were two kinds of coordination meetings. The first is the compulsory and traditional weekly meeting, with the participation of the undersecretary, the deputy undersecretaries, the staff of the Policy Planning General Directorate, and, depending on the agenda, specific general directors and their deputies. The second kind of meeting takes the form of a brainstorming session, with the participation of the section chief where the preparation of the paper to be discussed was initiated. The head of the academy (the in-service training unit) and the staffs of the policy planning and information departments also participate. At these meetings all participants freely express their views without regard to the hierarchy. This second type of meeting is now rarely held.

Both kinds of meetings take up the pressing questions of the day. As a rule, no attempt is made to consider foreign policy alternatives in a systematic way, because the current issues are usually very urgent and time is always scarce. Participants are eager to return to their desks to read embassy dispatches and carry out the appropriate action.

As already noted, the MFA has a tendency to avoid tackling taboo subjects. This is probably one of the reasons why policy formulation is inadequate. Even when policy formulation is carried out, there is a tendency to avoid formulating alternative policies. This is a blot in the MFA's record.

Alternative Policy Proposals

In addition to these limitations of the coordination meetings, the ministry makes no obvious institutional effort to elaborate alternative policies that take into account new developments and conditions. True, occasional small steps are taken in this direction. The policies vis-à-vis Armenia are being seriously discussed and questioned. But these are still diffident steps. In an environment where it is impossible to engage in policy planning, the ministry should encourage and even organize the elaboration of alternative policies and strategies by experts, even if only behind closed doors. This job could be undertaken by an affiliated body of the ministry, the Strategic Research Center (SAM in its Turkish acronym). But its present budget, personnel, and structure prevent it from filling the existing void. In any case it is difficult for a research center that depends on the MFA to produce independent views. The MFA should seek the assistance of qualified institutions and individuals for this purpose, given that its diplomats do not seem to be eager to "put their careers into jeopardy" (which can be translated as being assigned to a "hardship" post abroad) by proposing alternative solutions to taboo subjects.

The Question of Specialization

The MFA urgently requires two categories of specialists: (1) people who can look at medium- and long-term issues comprehensively and provide appropriate advice; and (2) people with expertise on particular subjects and regions. The MFA is not organized in a way to provide solutions to these problems, however.

It is not unusual for a diplomat to work at the Greek desk and become familiar with its work and then be assigned to the embassy in Amman and end up at the U.S. desk upon returning to headquarters. As a result, diplomats cannot concentrate on a specific subject. The first six months at headquarters are spent on familiarization with the job and the last six months are spent getting ready for a foreign assignment, so effective work can only be carried out for about a year. The same conditions apply to foreign assignments. In fact, during the first assignment (lasting five years) the diplomat has to serve at two different posts, including spending two to three years in a "hardship" post.

In these circumstances ministry employees can only claim full familiarity with the files they are currently dealing with. They will know about related information not in the file only if they have taken a personal interest in the matter. For example, a diplomat might know about the as yet unpublished U.S. plans for Kosovo or Nagorno Karabakh, but, having just returned from Indonesia, might not know when the MFA had contacts with Kosovar or Armenian officials. This is the main reason why the ministry is said to "have no memory."

Then there is the question of misallocation of human resources. As noted earlier, members of the administrative staff of the MFA are hired on the basis of a serious and fair entrance exam, and some of them are as qualified as the career diplomats. Instead of entrusting certain categories of consular work to the administrative staff, however, the MFA will assign diplomats to these jobs, aggravating the shortage of specialists.

These problems are rooted in the argument (going back to Ottoman times) as to whether foreign service officers should be generalists or specialists. Of course, these issues are not confined to Turkey.

Both schools of thought have strong and weak sides. If diplomats' expertise in a specific subject is carried to extreme lengths, they will end up being ignorant of other subjects and afflicted with professional distortion, becoming completely identified with their subject and incapable of gauging its relative importance. This will make it difficult to decide where to place their subject within the general framework of events and achieve proper coordination. This approach would also require a much larger MFA. The ministry already has a shortage of career diplomats because of the need to maintain standards. If a Middle East expert becomes unemployable in NATO affairs, the shortage of personnel will get worse. There is also the question of "desirable" versus "hardship" posts. All the assignments of officers who specialize in EU affairs will be in desirable posts, with Central Asia specialists ending up in hardship posts. That is why in some cases diplomats will not admit speaking Arabic, to avoid being regarded as specialists.

If the emphasis is placed on generalists, then jobs requiring specialization will not get done properly, at a time when the trend everywhere is increased specialization. This will not be good for the MFA and may have dire consequences in the long run.

At present neither of these schools prevails in its pure form in any country. The general approach is eclectic. Turkey has adopted the generalist approach, with specialization being the exception, so it must find a way to compensate for the system's weaknesses. One way to achieve this would be to secure very close cooperation between the MFA and academic specialists.

Except for a few isolated instances, this approach was first adopted by minister Gündüz Ökçün in the late 1970s. But at that time the ministry did not know how to use experts; nor did the experts in the universities know how to work with the ministry. The impression was quickly created that the MFA was somehow inadequate; moreover, the minister himself was an "outsider," having come from academia. That led to concern in the ministry. This first attempt revealed that the MFA was not yet ready to seek outside help: the generalists did not relish working with specialists. After this experience the MFA did commission some academics to prepare projects in the 1990s, but this practice never became institutionalized.

This suspicion about outside expertise was not completely unwarranted. The chief legal counselors of the MFA, who were naturally drawn from international law chairs, usually ended up being assigned to one of the missions as ambassador. This created considerable resentment among ministry personnel, who saw it as an encroachment on their preserve. The concern is that recruitment of other experts in a similar fashion will result in a diminution of the relatively restricted number of ambassadorial posts. A specialist on Central Asia whose children reached university age could conceivably start agitating for a posting in London. In fact, even filing clerks get assigned to administrative posts in foreign missions as a result of chronic shortage of personnel, and it is difficult to block this practice. The expert is not a professional diplomat, however, and therefore not subject to the strict discipline and hierarchical structure that applies to the career diplomat.

The MFA is always wary of getting drawn into domestic politics by recruited experts. This can happen because the expert has links with a political party or at least certain political/ideological leanings. The parties that did not share these ideologies would then try to foist "their own professors" on the ministry.

Another reason for keeping experts out is the nature of the work of the MFA, much of which is classified.

Finally, there are the administrative difficulties. Experts who are employed must be placed on the ministry's payroll. It would be difficult to attract top experts with the modest salaries available.

These are the principal reasons for not hiring experts. Nonetheless, the opposing view has more validity. It would be relatively simple to prevent experts from seeking foreign assignments, especially those outside their field of specialization, by inserting a provision in Law No. 4009 ("The Structure and Functions of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs") that would exclude experts from foreign assignments. In fact the post of chieflegal counselor of the ministry is now being assigned to a diplomat, to prevent an outsider from being awarded an ambassadorial post. In addition, the place of the experts in the hierarchy could be properly and clearly defined. These persons would have no representational function; they would not be assigned to foreign missions and would only serve as an expert advisor to a professional diplomat. In recent years some career diplomats have given their relationship with advisors and experts a quasi-institutional character and thereby rendered valuable services to the ministry. At the same time, the MFA has increasingly resorted to the services of young specialists, one example being the hiring of specialists in water issues.

Many experts in Turkey have no political affiliation. As a matter of fact, most true experts fall in this category. The links between politics and those fields requiring specialization are scant. In any case, all individuals have political leanings. It would be wrong to claim that diplomats have no political/ideological preferences (especially since 1980). Some of them have entered into politics.

Another point to bear in mind is that it would be wrong to assume that advisors or experts who are hired would leak restricted information to the press or reveal confidential information to outsiders.

The MFA's main difficulty is not in securing new posts (cadres) but in filling vacant posts with qualified personnel. Therefore, obtaining posts for advisors and experts would pose few problems. It would be wrong to claim that these people cannot be attracted due to lack of material rewards, because expert academicians would probably want only part-time employment. Their main concern would be to gain access to specialized books, contact prominent foreign specialists, participate in international conferences, and keep abreast of the latest developments. The level of their salaries would be of secondary importance, because the chance to take part in international conferences from time to time would be reward enough. Those who want more would not be hired.

To conclude, it can be said that the members of the MFA's professional staff are performing brilliantly, given the conditions prevailing in Turkey. But because of the way the ministry is structured and its large volume of work, they do not have adequate expert information about an increasing number of subjects and are unable to make up for this deficiency through their own efforts. In these circumstances the MFA must hire advisors and specialists who can become the "collective memory" of the specific department without regard to whether they seem to threaten the diplomatic staff. In other words, the ministry must change the manner in which diplomats carry out their duties and the system through which they get foreign postings. If it refuses to make these changes, we must conclude that those who claim that the generalists do not want specialists around because they fear the competition are justified.

In these circumstances it will be difficult for the MFA to maintain either its record of successes or its relative autonomy in a world where international affairs are getting increasingly complex and specialized.

II. THE FORMULATION OF TURKISH FOREIGN POLICY A. The Historical Dimension

As in most countries, foreign policy is executed in Turkey by the MFA. In addition, this ministry prepares alternative policies for submission to decision-makers, evaluates current policies, and makes the necessary adjustments.

Other individuals and institutions also get involved in the elaboration stage of decisions, however, and influence the process in a number of ways, depending on the period and the circumstances.

The process of formulation of Turkish foreign policy has gone through a number of changes during the periods following the establishment of the Republic. These changes came about as a result of the changes in Turkey's internal structure as well as the changes in the international system. Among the factors influencing the process are the leadership, the changing weight of bureaucratic institutions, the press and public opinion, economic and other pressure groups, and the changing role of the military.

We can study the process through different periods. In doing this, two things need to be kept in mind. First, each period in Turkey's political history has witnessed the rise of specific institutions and agents. The predominance of certain institutions and agents should not lead to the conclusion that other agents have been driven out of the process.

Second, once a factor makes itself felt in the decision-making process, its relative weight can increase or decrease, depending on the period and the circumstances, but it will not disappear. For example, factors such as public opinion, the press, the military, and the business community that became influential in the 1960s have continued to exert their influence to this day, both in unison and individually.

In this process the MFA has maintained its central position in identifying options and charting alternative courses as well as implementing decisions and following up. Though it has kept a low profile, it has continued to be the main formulator of foreign policy. Even politicians who have tried to exclude it have depended on its support.

After this introductory explanation, we can examine the decision-making process in the following periods.

- 1. The period when the leader was the determining factor (1919 to 1950).
- 2. The period when the MFA became increasingly influential (1950 to 1960).
- 3. The period when public opinion, the opposition parties, and the intellectuals (aydınlar: the enlightened) became influential (1960 to 1980).
  - 4. The 12 September period (1980 to 1983).
- 5. The period when the business community came to the forefront (1983 to 1991).
- 6. The period when the military gained influence (the 1990s).

1. Leaders as Determining Factors (1919–1950)

The National Struggle and the period of M. Kemal: both during the National Struggle and after the establishment of the Turkish Republic, M. Kemal's views carried great weight in internal politics and in the formulation of foreign policy. On many occasions his views were the determining factor. When it came to determining the general orientation of Turkish foreign policy, Atatürk had the last word.

In the period of the National Struggle M. Kemal had the authority to determine foreign policy, first as chairman of the Representative Delegation (Heyet-i Temsiliye) then as the speaker of the Turkish Grand National Assembly (TGNA) after it was convened in 1920 and as head of government. He was also an effective leader with a strong personality. In this period M. Kemal centralized the decision-making process in order to cope with the extraordinary circumstances. At the same time, he sought legitimacy for his foreign-policy initiatives by keeping the TGNA informed of developments. M. Kemal was not only the decision-maker during that era. He also got involved in the execution of foreign policy, as in the case when he personally carried out the negotiations with France that led to the 21 October 1921 agreement.

M. Kemal's special place in the determination of foreign—and also domestic—policy lasted into the Republican period. Atatürk respected the views of experts, however, and reached his decisions after careful examination of the MFA's reports and detailed discussions with officials and diplomats. He even consulted foreign diplomats in Ankara on specific subjects (Aras, p. 59). Certain important diplomatic notes were submitted to his approval.

During this period another important actor in the field of foreign policy was Ismet Paşa [İnönü]. When it was decided that he should go to the Lausanne Conference, he was appointed minister of foreign affairs. Ismet Paşa differed from his two predecessors in that he was a successful field commander and a close friend of M. Kemal. After that he was to become prime minister, with some breaks, until Atatürk's death.

Dr. Tevfik Rüştü [Aras] became minister of foreign affairs in 1925 and remained in this position until 1938, making him the longest-serving minister in the Republic's history. In foreign policy, however, Atatürk was the decision-maker, while Aras was the executor of policy.

The İnönü period: after Atatürk's death, he was succeeded by İnönü. International tension reached a peak during this time, culminating in war in September 1939. In the İnönü period the previous model of one leader making most decisions on foreign and domestic policy continued to hold sway (Erkin, p. 191), in large measure because there was a war going on, İnönü had a military background, and he took a close interest in foreign policy. The MFA correspondence that was considered important was regularly submitted to the president. The biggest change in the foreign policy establishment was the replacement of the foreign minister T. Rüştü Aras by Şükrü Saracoğlu for the following reasons.

First, as a leader in the Atatürk tradition, İnönü wanted to hold the reins of foreign policy in a time of war. This might have been difficult with a minister who had held the post for thirteen years and was a member of Atatürk's immediate entourage. Furthermore, in certain instances (for example, at the conference on Mediterranean security held at Nyon, Switzerland, in 1937) Atatürk and İnönü disagreed. At such times, Atatürk used Aras to carry out his policies. Second, T. R. Aras was also disqualified because during Atatürk's long illness he formed part of the Şükrü Kaya clique, which shielded Atatürk and kept İnönü at bay. Third, it has been claimed that Aras, the man who gave precedence to relations with the USSR, was replaced by an Anglophile, Şükrü Saracoğlu. Nevertheless, unlike the prime ministers of the Ottoman period, no one in the decision-making machinery during this period could be labeled as being under the influence of a foreign power.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs: this ministry officially came into being on 2 May 1920 with the establishment of the Ankara government on that day. The first minister of foreign affairs of the Ankara government was Bekir Sami. Although he died before the legislation requiring all citizens to adopt surnames came into force, he is often referred to as Bekir Sami Kunduh because he was the son of Musa Kunduh Paşa. Bekir Sami resigned in 1921 after the London Conference and was succeeded by Yusuf Kemal [Tengirşenk] (Girgin, p. 117). Neither of these ministers carried much weight in the decision-making machinery because they were frequently absent on lengthy trips abroad and because of the preponderance of M. Kemal as the leader.

At this time, the Turkish diplomatic establishment was in its early formative stage and was in the process of absorbing the venerable and deeply rooted Ottoman Ministry of Foreign Affairs. In the early years of the Republic one-third of ambassadors and ministers plenipotentiary were transplants from the Ottoman ministry (Şimşir, p. 24). With these transplants, the ministry acquired the diplomatic savvy of the Ottomans. In the years when the empire was crumbling the Ottoman government had become adept at playing the major powers against one another. It was governing highly strategic regions of the globe populated by different ethnic and national groups. These traits went all the way back to Byzantine times. During the national struggle M. Kemal also took advantage of rifts among the major Western powers while securing the diplomatic and military support of the Soviets. This diplomatic tradition was kept up in the interwar years when the Turkish economy was extremely weak as well as during World War II. Although Turkey came increasingly within the orbit of the West and of the U.S. in the foreign policy sphere during the late 1940s, the MFA maintained this diplomatic tradition because of the imperatives of its sensitive strategic situation.

The military: during the Atatürk and İnönü eras the military's role in the formulation of foreign policy was confined to technical fields because Atatürk wanted to keep the army out of politics, and İnönü maintained this approach. As early as 1923 a law was enacted that required officers to resign if they wanted to become parliamentary candidates. Those officers who were already deputies had to relinquish their commands. Under the 1924 Constitution the chief of the general stafflost his seat in the cabinet (Hale, pp. 72-73). The justification for keeping the army out of politics was the bitter lesson of the late Ottoman period, when the officer corps was divided between rival political camps. Furthermore, neither of the two leaders wanted competition from the army. Both leaders kept the army on a tight leash through Fevzi Çakmak, who remained chief of the general staff until his retirement in 1944. Çakmak was a moderate with no political ambitions and was therefore able to work harmoniously with both leaders while keeping the army out of politics. He was even invited to join meetings of the cabinet. In 1944 a new chief of the general staff was appointed and was made accountable to the prime minister. This situation lasted until 1949, when the chief of the general staff became accountable to the minister of defense.

Apart from the general staff, a war committee was established in 1922, answerable directly to the TGNA. The members of this committee were the ministers of defense, interior, foreign affairs, finance, and health under the chairmanship of the speaker of the TGNA. A supreme defense council was established in 1933, consisting of the prime minister and the chief of the General Staff, with the president of the Republic presiding over its meetings. In 1949, after World War II, the supreme council of national defense was established, under the presidency of the prime minister. The armed forces were represented on this body only by the chief of the general staff, with civilians constituting a majority on the council.

2. The Growing Influence of the MFA (1950–1960)

The single leader model was maintained in the era of the Democratic Party, but with one big difference from previous eras in the formulation of foreign policy: the influence of the MFA was in the ascendancy.

The Menderes period (1950 to 1960) can be divided into two parts in regard to decision-making: Fuat Köprülü was the minister until 1957, when Fatin Rüştü Zorlu took over.

Köprülü, the first minister of foreign affairs of the Menderes government, was a well-known historian and politician, but he was not so well versed in the field of foreign affairs. That is why both Menderes and Köprülü felt the need to rely on the experienced staff of the ministry. In fact Menderes got the MFA to move into the building that housed the office of the prime minister, where it remained until 1987. Menderes was in direct contact not only with Köprülü and Zorlu but also with leading diplomats such as Muharrem Nuri Birgi, Melih Esenbel, and Zeki Kuneralp.

Menderes was prime minister during a period when the Cold War was at its peak and took an active interest in decisions regarding the Korean War, NATO membership, and the creation of the Baghdad Pact. The early 1950s was an era of relative stability in domestic politics, so he was able to devote more time to foreign affairs.

In the second half of his tenure Menderes lost interest in foreign affairs because of the increased tension with the opposition in domestic politics. In addition, the new minister of foreign affairs, Fatin Rüştü Zorlu, was a career diplomat and was asserting his influence in the conduct of foreign policy. Zorlu worked with diplomats like Semih Günver and Hasan Esat Işık, who were considered close to him. This helped reinforce the traditional role of the ministry.

Zorlu and Menderes were related to one another through marriage but were not particularly close. Zorlu was a brilliant diplomat, however, and as such had a special place in the formulation of foreign policy. He was able to take new initiatives because he enjoyed the confidence of Menderes. For example, Zorlu played an important part in reaching the Cyprus agreements of 1959–60, while the prime minister deferred to his minister. Menderes left the day-to-day conduct of foreign policy to his minister, getting involved only in the overall direction of foreign policy. This allowed the formulation and conduct of foreign policy to proceed smoothly.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs: during this period the structure of the ministry underwent a change. Foreign economic relations and foreign aid issues previously had been the responsibility of the ministries of Finance and Trade. Zorlu brought these issues under the field of responsibility of the MFA. A general secretariat had been established in 1948 to deal with foreign aid and economic relations. Diplomats like Hasan Esat Işık, Oğuz Gökmen, and Semih Günver were assigned to the general secretariat, which had privileged status within the MFA. This general secretariat also assumed an important role in relations with the U.S. and in the elaboration of policy options (Günver, pp. 104-5). A special department was set up to deal with NATO affairs, with a permanent representative assigned to the headquarters of the organization.

The military: during this period the army's role in foreign policy matters as well as in domestic politics was quite minor. True, the army's participation in the decision-making process had been enhanced by NATO and Baghdad Pact membership, but it still did not carry much weight in the determination of foreign policy. The Menderes administration had a tendency to remain distant from the military and to underestimate its importance. The appointment of a retired colonel as minister of defense is an example of this attitude. The decision to send a military contingent to Korea was likewise made without consulting the general staff about the nature and size of the unit to be sent (Yavuzalp, 1991, pp. 81–82). In fact, Menderes is known to have remarked, "I could run the army with just reserve officers."

Public opinion and the press: although there was a relaxation in the official attitude toward the press compared to previous periods, it was still not possible to speak of a free press or the free discussion of foreign policy issues. The press did report on issues like the Korean War and the events of 6–7 September 1955, but these subjects were taken up in the traditional way, within the bounds set by the government. The opposition—the Republican People's Party—was only able to influence public opinion to a limited degree, because it found itself under heavy government pressure.

3. The Rise of Public Opinion (1960–1980)

The process that began on 27 May 1960 was a watershed not only in Turkey's domestic politics but also in the field of foreign policy and its elaboration.

Those who carried out this first military coup in the Republic's history wanted to project a reassuring image. They did this by selecting as minister of foreign affairs Selim Sarper, a diplomat with good links to the West. The National Unity Committee (MBK in its Turkish acronym), however, which ran the country during this period, also controlled foreign policy.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs: while a drastic purge was conducted in the civil service by the new government, the MFA was excluded from this operation in the early stages. By a law enacted on 11 July 1960, however, the responsibility for coordinating foreign aid was returned to the ministries of Trade and Finance. The competence of the MFA would henceforth be confined to political and economic subjects relating to the execution of foreign policy (Firat, pp. 50–51). In this manner the cadres who were close to Zorlu would lose their former preeminence within the MFA.

Although its responsibilities in the area of economic questions had been trimmed, the MFA was pressing for new initiatives in foreign policy, both for economic reasons and because of Cyprus. These preparations proceeded under Feridun Cemal Erkin, also a career diplomat, who succeeded Selim Sarper. Ihsan Sabri Çağlayangil became minister in 1965, which led to a more comprehensive and balanced foreign policy. The disappointment caused by President Lyndon Johnson's letter (see "Johnson's Letter" in Section 5) and the pressure of public opinion were instrumental in the adoption of a multidirectional foreign policy.

Public opinion and the press: during the Atatürk and İnönü eras foreign policy was generally the responsibility of the leader. In the Menderes period the MFA's influence grew, but foreign policy remained the preserve of the leader and an exclusive group from the ministry. The relative freedom introduced by the 1961 Constitution allowed other factors to influence foreign policy, if only indirectly.

It now became possible for the press and the public to discuss and to criticize the government's foreign policy line. This allowed at least some sectors of the public to become aware of differing viewpoints in the realm of foreign policy and to take a growing interest in the subject. Previously it had been very difficult for ideas not approved by the government to be reflected in the press (Sezer, pp. 104–5).

Until that time foreign policy had been considered a national issue, and questioning it was regarded as somehow disloyal. This was called a bipartisan foreign policy, a term borrowed from the U.S., where it had been coined after World War II. According to this understanding, differences between parties would be confined to domestic politics. Foreign policy had to be national and enjoy the support of all parties. This approach was designed to prevent questioning of the established order and shield the government from criticism.

While foreign policy issues were being freely discussed in the press and among the intellectuals in the permissive atmosphere of the 1960s, the opposition was now able to bring dissenting viewpoints to parliament and to the public at large. The basic orientation of Turkish foreign policy was being questioned in the magazines Forum and Yön, and alternatives were being proposed. The Turkish Labor Party, established in 1961, was able to win fifteen parliamentary seats in the 1965 election. This party wanted a return to the foreign policies of the Atatürk era and advocated a Third World posture for Turkey.

The Labor Party's critical approach to foreign policy and its anti-NATO, anti-U.S. stance became more pronounced after Johnson's letter of June 1964. This meant that the nonpartisan approach to foreign policy started coming to an end during the 1960s. From then on, the foreign policy line of governments would be subjected to the increasingly critical scrutiny of parties, the press, and public opinion. This had a double-barreled effect on the foreign policy of the government. While the government's freedom of maneuver was being restricted in domestic politics, its hand was now strengthened in the field of diplomacy. For example, governments now felt the need to explain to the public why foreign bases in the country were necessary. At the same time, they could use the public-opinion factor to place these installations on a legal foundation, as was done at the negotiations with the U.S. in 1969. From that time on, all governments—apart from coup administrations—had to formulate and implement foreign policy under these conditions. The growing influence of public opinion on foreign policy also led governments to use foreign policy to influence public opinion and to exploit foreign policy successes for political advantage.

The military: while new factors were beginning to influence the elaboration of foreign policy with the advent of the 1961 Constitution, the military was able to strengthen its position within the political system through the National Security Council (MGK in its Turkish acronym), which became a constitutional organ. In addition, the general staff was made directly subordinate to the prime minister instead of to the minister of defense. Through the establishment of the MGK, the military was able to participate more directly and more effectively in the formulation of foreign policy.

The text of article 111 of the Constitution reads: "The MGK informs the Council of Ministers of its basic position to facilitate decisions relating to national security and their coordination." In the amendment following the military intervention of 12 March 1971, the word "informs" is replaced by "recommends," thus enhancing the MGK's power. Nevertheless, the military confined itself to playing an advisory role in the period from 1960 to 1980.

The leadership: the government of Süleyman Demirel, which came to power in 1965, formulated its foreign policy within these institutional limitations. Demirel was an engineer who had risen to the position of directorgeneral of the state hydraulic works before entering politics. He was well versed in domestic and economic affairs, but his interest in foreign policy was limited. He left this field to İhsan Sabri Çağlayangil, who served for nine years as minister (the longest tenure after that of Aras). A retired governor and seasoned politician, Çağlayangil relied to a large extent on the MFA's staff in formulating foreign policy.

Unlike Demirel, Bülent Ecevit, who came to power in 1973, was directly interested in foreign affairs and was ready to take initiatives in this field. Ecevit followed international developments and the foreign press and participated in the work of the MFA by amending the position papers the ministry prepared for meetings and negotiations. He appointed Professor Turan Güneş in his first term and Professor Gündüz Ökçün in his second term as foreign ministers. Both were from the Faculty of Political Science and were familiar with foreign affairs. But they were not from the MFA; nor were they politicians. This allowed Ecevit to wield more influence, because the ministers were not in full control of the ministry's bureaucracy and did not have a political constituency. Ultimately Ecevit's way of operating was to create problems that resulted in the resignation of Güneş.

In his brief first term Ecevit's most important political action was the decision to undertake the Cyprus operation. Before the decision to intervene, meetings were held in the National Security Council, the General Staff, and the MFA to determine if Turkey had the legal right to intervene and to review the likely implications of intervention. The decision was made to call for a meeting of the TGNA to consider the issue. Ecevit briefed the leaders of political parties about developments. He sought the views of the MFA and the General Staff on technical questions, and a Cyprus Coordination Committee was set up.

In this period the influence of public opinion on foreign policy became fully evident. With the establishment of the National Security Council as an institution, the military's participation in the foreign policy process increased. During this time the MFA became more effectual in the formulation of foreign policy under Çağlayangil as well as under ministers Osman Olcay, Haluk Bayülken, and Melih Esenbel, who all started as career diplomats.

In the 1960-80 period foreign policy became multidirectional. At the same time, the influence of public opinion, the political parties, and the military in the decision-making process increased. The diversity in the political system and in foreign policy found its reflection in the process of elaborating foreign policy.

4. The 12 September Period (1980–1983)

In the period following the coup of 27 May 1960 Turkish foreign policy broke loose, to a certain degree, from U.S. influence and started on a multidirectional course. The opposite took place after the coup of 12 September 1980:

U.S. influence became preponderant. Turkish foreign policy, which had veered under Cold War conditions, returned to its regular course.

The leaders of the 12 September coup followed the example of the 27 May coup and placed a career diplomat at the top of the ministry in the person of llter Türkmen. But the real decision-maker was Gen. Kenan Evren himself. The most concrete example of this is when Evren gave immediate approval to the plan of U.S. general Bernard William Rogers, NATO's Supreme Allied Commander, Europe (SACEUR), which enabled Greece to return to NATO's military wing (see "The Rogers Plan and Greece's Return to the Military Structure of NATO" in Section 6).

The function of influencing, criticizing, and pressuring the foreign policy process that had been exercised (starting in the 1960s) by public opinion, the press, the intelligentsia, and the opposition parties came to an end with the repressive measures adopted by the coup makers.

The 12 September administration increased the number and the power of the military members of the National Security Council, which had been established following the 27 May 1960 coup. In this way it sought to expand the role of the military in the decision-making process. The most noteworthy legal arrangement was the provision whereby decisions on matters relating to national security adopted by the National Security Council would be "taken into consideration on a priority basis" by the government. In addition, before transferring power to the new government, the military increased the powers of the National Security Council, which were regulated by article 118 of the 1982 Constitution. It passed a law on 9 November 1983 (Law No. 2495, entitled "National Security Council and General Secretariat of the National Security Council") by which the General Secretariat, in addition to its other duties, would "monitor and control" the implementation of the decisions of the council.

As the free market economy gained ascendancy because of the economic measures taken after 1983 and Özal's policies, however, the influence of the military in foreign policy did not follow the course intended by these constitutional and legislative arrangements. On the contrary, the influence of the military receded. This trend would be reversed in the 1990s.

5. The Rise of the Business World (1983–1991)

During this period the business world took its place among the factors influencing foreign policy, alongside public opinion, the press, and the military. In addition, during Turgut Özal's tenure as prime minister from 1983 to 1989 and as president from 1989 to 1993, the influence of the leader became important once again. But the most noteworthy event was the increased power of the business world, as Turkey became integrated with the international capitalist economy. In a way Özal was the projection of the business world in the seat of political power.

Leadership: Özal's leadership had certain distinguishing features. Unlike Atatürk and İnönü, Özal was supported in large measure by external factors: the U.S. and international financial circles. As a result, Özal took up a role as the voice of business circles in political life and had no qualms about admitting it.

Özal's period saw the most radical changes in the elaboration of Turkish foreign policy. These changes can be summarized as follows:

- The decision-making process became personalized, especially after the mid-1980s.
- The traditional institutions that took part in policy formulation (such as the MFA, the military, and the TGNA) were excluded.
- Advisors and journalists with no official status or responsibility were engaged in the decision-making and diplomatic processes alongside the traditional actors.
- The direct involvement of business circles in the political process also influenced the process of foreign policy formulation, with some business leaders acting as diplomats.

Before going into the changes wrought by Özal in the process of elaborating foreign policy, we must examine his approach to Turkey's political system. Özal had a pragmatic view of things. His objective was to integrate Turkey into the international capitalist system. This basic objective determined his foreign policy and his methods. Özal perceived the bureaucracy as an obstacle to this process—hence his attempts to weaken it and to render it ineffectual or to short-circuit it. To this end he attracted young executives from the U.S. who were unfamiliar with the Turkish system but were well connected with the Özal family and placed them at the head of important public institutions. The press alluded to these younger-generation executives as "princes."

Özal looked upon foreign policy from the same perspective. He held the view that Turkey's chronic foreign policy problems could be solved with economic measures. He believed that the bureaucracy was, as a rule, conservative, clumsy, and incapable of taking initiatives. The Faculty of Political Science (Mülkiye) school, which dominated the MFA, was perpetuating the cautious Inönü tradition; far from making new decisions, it was not even up to finding solutions to age-old questions weighing on Turkey's foreign relations (Barlas, pp. 116, 117, 127).

When Özal assumed the presidency in 1989, he freed himself from reelection considerations, which allowed him greater latitude in foreign policy. The most striking manifestation of this came during the Gulf War of 1990–91. Özal took the initiative and started determining Turkey's stand in direct telephone contact with U.S. president George H. W. Bush. This was described to the public as "telephone diplomacy." Özal, who was not politically accountable under the Constitution, was taking initiatives on highly important and sensitive questions, without the knowledge or participation of competent institutions. He was exercising remote control over the prime minister's office and was having ministers sign blank decrees, which he was to use when necessary.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs: in the matter of foreign policy elaboration, Özal's attitude toward the ministry led to a reduction in its field of competence. In certain situations the MFA was bypassed. Shortly after coming to power, the Motherland Party government promulgated a decree creating the Undersecretariat of the Treasury and Foreign Trade. Legislation was adopted whereby this new agency would be responsible for international economic and financial affairs. Özal was following a course similar to that of the Menderes government in its economic policies and was adopting the same pro-U.S. stand. Unlike the Menderes government, however, which worked through the MFA, he chose to exclude the ministry. Instead he employed diplomats who were close to him as advisors. In this way institutional relationships were replaced by personal relationships. In this period the minister was Vahit Halefoğlu, a career diplomat who had attained this position upon Evren's request. In the second Motherland Party government set up in 1987, Özal was to bring to this position a novice in the person of Mesut Yılmaz, who would be succeeded by Professor Ali Bozer (a lawyer) and then by Ahmet Kurtcebe Alptemoçin and Safa Giray (both engineers). These ministers served for only brief terms, which allowed Özal to hold the reins in the field of foreign policy.

In the matter of unilaterally lifting the visa requirement for Greek nationals and the project for supplying water to the Middle East through the "peace pipeline," Özal failed to consult the MFA or kept it out of the decision-making process. Furthermore, he employed journalists close to him as go-betweens in important issues like the Kurdish question. All of these risky practices were unprecedented in Turkish foreign policy.

Evren, the leader of the 12 September 1980 coup, became president in 1982 through the referendum adopting the Constitution. Until his term came to an end in 1989, Evren took no initiatives other than having Halefoğlu appointed as minister. In the early years of his government Özal was careful about his relations with Evren. With time, he became more unconcerned and independent.

The business world: the driving force behind Özal's practices was the business circles, whose ambition was to integrate Turkey into the international economic system. These circles perceived the bureaucracy as an impediment to their development and did their best to neutralize it. At this time of transition, when statism was abandoned, privatization was being launched, and the need to diminish the role of the state was being stressed, the state and the bureaucracy had to be curbed somehow. Özal wanted to introduce economic and commercial factors as elements of his foreign policy. He intended to use this approach as a key to solving problems. For this it was necessary to create an infrastructure capable of importing and exporting large amounts of goods and services.

Thanks to the economic measures adopted beginning in early 1980, the strengthened bourgeoisie now played a direct role in politics through more than twenty cabinet members with business backgrounds and through Özal himself. Business leaders were taking a direct interest in foreign developments now that the economy had opened up to the world. They were receiving briefings from the MFA and (as in the case of Şarık Tara) were participating in the Davos process with the ministry's support. From now on, business leaders would be taking part in official trips abroad, a usual international practice. One of the first such trips was taken by Özal to Cyprus in 1984 in the company of a large group of businessmen.

With the encouragement of the MFA, the business community went about institutionalizing these developments and in 1986 established the Foreign Economic Relations Council (DEIK in its Turkish acronym). DEIK was to help develop worldwide links for Turkish business and contribute to the integration of the Turkish economy into the global economy. This was the second organization established by business, the first being the Economic Development Foundation (IKV), established in 1965 to regulate relations with the European Union, to publicize the EU in Turkey, and to lobby the government.

The military: during this period the Turkish Armed Forces felt serious concern about Özal's perception of the differences with Greece, his attempts to solve the question of Cyprus through unilateral concessions, and his approach to the Kurdish question. Özal was seeking to reduce the influence of the military as well as the bureaucracy in the political system and the conduct of foreign policy. In 1987 he intervened in the selection of the chief of the General Staff, which hitherto had been regarded as an internal affair of the military, and secured the appointment of Necip Torumtay instead of Necdet Öztorun.

Ozal's struggle with the civilian and military bureaucracy did not always succeed, however. Among the failures we can cite his attempt to bring the National Intelligence Organization (MIT, a body traditionally led by a soldier) under civilian control by appointing Hiram Abas; his attempt to withdraw troops from North Cyprus; his attempt to solve the question of Cyprus through the businessman Asil Nadir rather than Rauf Denktas; and his wish to open a second front during the Gulf War (see "Relations with the USA and NATO" in Section 7).

The military actually had no objections to Turkey's integration into the international capitalist system or the capitalist model of development. The 12 September coup had already prepared the ground for this. As business gained the ascendancy, however, it tried to enhance its influence on domestic and foreign policy and found itself in disagreement with the military on certain issues.

Despite all the legal arrangements made by the military administration of 12 September, the military found itself being pushed into the background in the face of the foreign policy initiatives of Özal and business. In this period the military's main concern was to thwart Özal's attempts to alter Turkey's traditional foreign policy rather than to be an active actor.

The press and public opinion: with the coming to power of a civilian administration in 1983, the press, public opinion, and the opposition parties started to regain their former influence in the field of foreign policy. The 1982 Constitution was admittedly more restrictive than the 1961 Constitution in the area of rights and freedoms. It was forbidden to challenge the official acts of the 12 September period or the leaders of the coup legally. But those who criticized the government no longer faced prosecution or feared official pressure.

With time, the establishment of other political parties and the restoration of the rights of banned politicians with the referendum of 1987 made possible wider criticism and discussion of the foreign policy of the Özal administration.

The Increased Weight of the Military (1991 to the EU Harmonization Packages)

The structure of the international system underwent great changes in the 1990s. During this period important developments took place in Turkey's periphery and in its domestic scene. All of this rendered the political agenda highly changeable and brought into play new factors influencing foreign policy while altering the importance and role of existing factors.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs: following the 1991 election, the Motherland Party (which had been in power since 1983) was replaced by the True Path-Social Democratic People's Party coalition led by Demirel and İnönü. Hikmet Çetin served as minister of foreign affairs for over three years in this government and distinguished himself with his active foreign policy. The MFA started recovering its former standing. In this period the ministry went through an internal reorganization, reflecting the changes in the international scene. Toward the end of the 1990s, however, the governments and the foreign ministers started changing in quick succession. In an eighteenmonth period in 1997-98, four ministers served for an average of four and a half months each. This was extremely debilitating for a sensitive ministry that had to cope with great changes in the international scene.

To this must be added the special conditions arising from internal developments that were being guided by narrow interests. In these uncertain circumstances, another institution started taking charge of the country's destiny and the formulation of foreign policy—the military.

The military: both internal and external developments led to the growing role of the military in the field of foreign policy. The internal developments were the following.

- 1. As the institution that had a primary role in setting up the state, the military already had a much greater role in Turkey's political and social structure than in other countries. Furthermore, Turkey's political and social culture enabled the military to exercise great influence on the political process even in periods when coup administrations were not in power.
- 2. The instability in the political system, the general lack of confidence in the political parties and the political process, the prevailing corruption, and the Susurluk Accident (see Box 7-6 in Section 7) all conspired to help the armed forces to earn the respect of the public, who perceived the military as untainted by scandal.
- 3. The "low intensity war" that broke out in the 1980s in the southeastern region of Turkey and gained in intensity during the 1990s was another factor. The brunt of the struggle against the PKK separatists was being borne by the military, which adopted a more aggressive strategy after 1993. The conflict in southeastern Turkey, which started in 1984, constituted a question of survival. This brought about a growing fear of dismemberment of the country and—parallel to this—increased the dependence on the military. The capture of the PKK's number-two man after an operation conducted in 1998 by the military (without informing the government) and the subsequent disintegration of the PKK movement (following the pressure on Syria to expel Abdullah Öcalan, which led to his capture) greatly enhanced the prestige of the military.

- 4. The main development that increased the army's importance and led to its greater involvement in the foreign policy process resulted from the policy of Turkish-Islamic Synthesis (see Box 6-3 in Section 6) pursued by the regime of 12 September. This policy led to the rise of political Islam in the mid-1980s, which gained further momentum in the 1990s. In this environment the armed forces (which remained the sole institution that had not been infiltrated by the Islamists and which was now completely free of the 12 September malaise) took the lead in the struggle against the rise of political Islam, also referred to as "reaction" in Turkey. This struggle reached its climax during the Welfare Party-True Path Party coalition, which came to power in 1996. The sectors of the population that defended the secular Republic supported the armed forces, thereby enhancing their prestige and legitimacy. In this way the 28 February process, which was seen by some as a "postmodern coup" resulting in the collapse of the Welfare-True Path coalition, was generally accepted without too much questioning (Box Intro-12).
- 5. Another factor that took the army's role in foreign policy beyond providing technical advice was the increase in the number of arms procurement projects, starting in the late 1980s and continuing at a faster pace in the 1990s. Some of these contracts had significant political aspects.

External developments can be outlined as follows.

- 1. Turkey's security concerns increased as a consequence of conflicts and instability in regions like the Middle East, the Balkans, and the Caucasus. This called for a large military establishment and increased the influence of the army in matters relating to security. Turkey was aspiring to become a "regional leader" in this part of the globe and relied chiefly on its military strength for this. During this period both the politicians and the military would claim that Turkey was a "generator of strategy" in its region.
- 2. Some regional developments were also helping the army to reinforce its place and importance in the field of foreign affairs. The establishment of the Training Center of the Partnership for Peace (where military personnel from thirty-two countries were receiving training), the participation in UN operations in Somalia, Bosnia, Kosovo, and Palestine (Hebron), and NATO operations all led the army to take a closer interest in this type of

Box Intro-12. The 28 February Process

The U.S.-sponsored "Green Belt" (see "Human Rights, the 'Green Belt,' and the Carter Doctrine" and "The U.S., Islam, and the Policy of the Green Belt" in Section 6) policy and the parallel stance of the 12 September regime with its Turkish-Islamic Synthesis of the 1980s led directly to a strengthening of the Islamic movement in Turkey. By the late 1990s it was directly affecting the state. The uneven distribution of income became more acute in the 1990s. This was compounded by mass migrations from the southeast to large cities, with all the attendant problems. To this must be added the general disenchantment with socialism. As a result, the Welfare Party, which had a popular vote of around 10% in the 1980s, received 19% of the votes in the election of December 1995 and became the largest party in the parliament. With the support of the True Path Party, it was now able to form a coalition government, with Welfare as the senior partner.

In the period when Necmettin Erbakan was the prime minister and the True Path leader Tansu Çiller was minister of foreign affairs, certain Internal and external events compromised the secular character of the regime. Erbakan was selecting countries like Libya, Iran, Indonesia, and Malaysia for his visits. Domestically, the antisecular practices of some Welfare Party-controlled municipalities were creating reactions. In particular, the Jerusalem event organized by the municipality of Sincan, with the presence of the Iranian ambassador and prominent display of portraits of the Lebanese leaders of Hezboliah, drew much criticism. That event led some tanks returning from an exercise to drive down the main street of the town. This was a warning sent to the government and to Islamic circles, which the military referred as a "wheel alignment."

At the regular meeting of the National Security Council (MGK) held on 28 February 1997, the military wing demanded that the decisions regarding the raising of compulsory education to eight years be implemented immediately. Erbakan felt himself compelled to sign the MGK decision but was taking no steps to implement the decision. The establishment of the "Western Working Group" by the general staff, the holding of briefing sessions on reactionary activities to which members of the press, the judiciary, and the bureaucracy were invited, and the public statements by the military criticizing the government led to heightened political tension and the expectation of an imminent coup. The reactions were not confined to the military and the opposition parties. A number of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) also took a stand against the government by supporting the 28 February decisions.

These pressures, and the desire of Ciller to become prime minister, led Erbakan to relinquish his position in her favor. When Erbakan had vacated his position, the president called on Mesut Yılmaz to form the new government on the grounds that the Constitution made no provision for the transfer of the position of prime minister. In this way, for the first time in Turkey's history, the army secured the fall of the government without resorting to force or delivering a memorandum. Following this, the constitutional court closed the Welfare Party in January 1998 and banned its leaders from all political activity. A court passed a prison sentence on Erbakan for a speech he had made, but this sentence was not carried out because of the amnesty law enacted in the early part of 2000. Eight years of primary education became compulsory, resulting in the abolition of the junior high school level of education (from the sixth to the eighth grade); As a consequence, the cleric and preacher high schools (public schools held responsible for religious reaction) had their junior high school level abolished. Youngsters who used to go to these schools at the age of twelve or thirteen would now start at the age of sixteen.

These developments also directly affected the process of elaborating foreign policy. The army's active role in Turkish foreign policy, especially in the areas relating to security, became discernible. Throughout the 1990s senior officers started making statements about foreign relations, criticizing neighboring countries, and engaging in crossborder operations, sometimes apparently without clearance from the political authority. Senior commanders were making statements directly criticizing, accusing, and occasionally threatening Greece in connection with the Aegean, all neighbors with the exception of Bulgaria and Georgia in connection with the PKK, Iran in connection with religious reactionary movements, the EU in connection with human rights, Germany in connection with arms sales, and the U.S. in connection with the Armenian issue. Headlines started appearing in the press referring to the "army's Cyprus policy" (Milliyet, 30 October 1997; Hürriyet, 4 November 1997).

During the Welfare—True Path coalition it became clear that the rapprochement between Turkey and Israel was being driven by the armed forces and particularly by the deputy chief of the General Staff, Gen. Çevik Bir. In the forming of policies relating to Greece, Cyprus, and the Kurdish question the influence of the army was also decisive. The process of extricating Abdullah Öcalan got underway when the commander of the land forces, Atilla Ateş, made a statement containing a stern warning to Syria, followed by the threat to use force.

In addition to these examples, the General Staff established a structure that replicated the various departments of the MFA. The General Staff started by setting up a Greece-Cyprus department, followed by a department dealing with human rights and others. In addition to the Western Working Group that dealt with "reactionary" activities, the General Staff had an eastern working group dealing with the Kurdish issue, a confidence working group dealing with Cyprus, and a Barbaros working group that dealt with the S-300 missile crisis (Bölügiray, pp. 150– 51). When Turkey became a candidate to join the EU at the Helsinki Summit, a European Union working group was established. Although the Ministry of Finance had a unit to monitor the flows of illicit funds (a matter that became very topical during the 1990s), the General Staff went ahead and established the Economic and Financial Monitoring Center (EMIM in its Turkish acronym). The military also undertook a leading role in some research centers established by civilian organizations. One such center is the National Committee for Strategic Research and Studies (SAEMK) set up within the structure of the Council for Higher Education (YÖK).

The armed forces also took part in the preparation of two important documents bearing on foreign policy. The first was the National Military Strategic Concept (MASK) paper, in which the General Staff determines the institutional, operational, and logistic requirements of the Turkish armed forces. This paper also sets out the potential threats to the country and, based on this, defines the concept of national security. It was revised in 1992, and separatism was identified as the major threat. In 1997 religious reactionary movements were added to the threat list.

The second document was the National Security Policy Paper (MGSB). This paper was prepared by the general secretariat of the MGK and was based on the MASK. The paper dates back to 1963, and the MFA and MİT were consulted at the preparatory stage. It is revised every year in December and redrafted every five years in the light of prevailing conditions and submitted to the cabinet for approval. Once it is approved, no law, regulation, or international agreement can run counter to its provisions. In November 1997 this document was leaked to the press. The greatest threats to the nation, according to the document, were reaction and separatism, followed by the alliance between the mafia and hit men belonging to the Nationalist Action Party (who are referred to as ülkücü in Turkish). In the eventuality of an armed conflict, the document warns of collaboration between Greece and Syria. It also mentions the need to develop relations with the Central Asian republics.

The center for crisis management, set up in January 1997, is nominally under the prime minister's control. It is designed to ensure coordination in crisis situations, both domestic and external. This center is located in the building of the general secretariat of the MGK. It can be assumed that in practice the center is under the MGK's control.

Thus, in addition to its basic function, the military has assumed the functions of decision-maker and executor with respect to a good number of other subjects.

Public opinion and the press: the advances in the field of communications registered in the 1990s and the huge increase in the number of television channels have made it possible for the public to be instantly informed about foreign developments. The public is now able to follow more closely both foreign policy and its appraisal by pundits. During this period both the press and public opinion (especially in Islamic circles) started exercising pressure on behalf of peoples with Turkish and/or Islamic roots who became victims of oppression in the Balkans and the Caucasus. Starting in the late 1980s, popular demonstrations were organized and declarations were read in front of foreign embassies in connection with developments in Azerbaijan, Bulgaria, Bosnia, China (the Sinkiang region), and Chechnya as well as Öcalan's sojourn in Italy.

The business world: having come to the fore in the 1980s, the business world appeared to be pushed into the background in this period. But it continued to press on with its "low-profile" efforts to exert its influence on the domestic and foreign policies of the country. Alongside the army, it was the chief source of alternative policies in the fields of domestic and foreign affairs.

Big business is organized under the umbrella of the Turkish Industrialists' and Businessmen's Association (TÜSİAD). Located in İstanbul, TÜSİAD is perceived as a club of the elite. The Union of Chambers and Commodity Exchanges of Turkey (TOBB) represents primarily the medium-sized businesses. Both organizations issued statements and prepared reports on issues such as education and democracy in Turkey, the Kurdish question, and current foreign policy developments. Through these means business made known its views and proposals on these subjects.

As in the case of senior officials who make public statements on foreign policy, business leaders were also propounding their views on sensitive issues regardless of the possible reactions from particular segments of the public. Some examples of this are Sakip Sabanci's statement that the "Basque model" should be examined in the context of finding a solution to the Kurdish question (Milliyet, 9 October 1995) and Rahmi Koç's view that the "Cyprus operation had cost Turkey dearly" (Hürriyet, 21 March 1997) and that, in the Özal tradition, "we must prevail in the struggle with Greece through expanded trade" (Uzgel 2004, p. 342). TÜSİAD issued a report in January 1997, one month before the 28 February decision of the MGK. This report, entitled "Turkey's Perspectives in the Middle Ages there were two models of the state: states like the Ottoman Empire fighting for terrestrial expansion and the "commercial state" model exemplified by the Italian city-states, especially Venice.

Box Intro-13. The Rise of the Commercial State and International Relations

The commercial states may be said to constitute a subsystem in the international order and are prototypes of the present-day major capitalist states. Some of the clues to the behavior of these modern states can be traced back to the medieval city-states.

The wealth of the oligarchy of the northern Italian city-states was derived mainly from shipping. They had total control of the state and looked upon defense matters and territorial conquest from a commercial, cost/benefit point of view.

These states had come together to reduce their defense costs to a minimum. They made sure that the territories that they conquered would be strategically located from the point of view of commercial traffic. Also, they carried out their conquests with the help of foreign mercenaries. The arms and consumer goods that they produced were then marketed to these mercenaries, which helped recoup their military expenses.

For this model to function effectively, the Italian city-states had to ensure the existence of the proper conditions: (1) being continuously aware of the objectives of their adversaries seeking territorial expansion in order to foresee their future actions and reduce defense expenditures; (2) being well informed about the regional markets as well as the actions of the countries of the region; and (3) monopolizing the information required to conduct trade with distant markets. To secure these conditions, they established a wide-ranging network of permanent and well-developed diplomatic missions at a time when diplomacy was resorted to only temporarily and was accorded a very low priority. It is for this reason that the first permanent diplomatic mission in Istanbul belonged to Venice. These city-states demonstrated during the Middle Ages, when value was created from the soil, that one could become prosperous and therefore powerful without possessing vast territories. They were instrumental in the transformation that took place after the sixteenth century in Europe, whereby the notion of "power" was gradually replaced by the notion of "affluence."

The semi-Keynesian model developed with the Marshall Plan by the U.S. in the early stages of the Cold War resembled the model of the city-states. The U.S. provided military assistance to its allies to ensure that they would fight for it (or at least with it) and then sold them the weapons and the goods that it produced so as to reap twice the value of the original assistance. Against this, the USSR, acting without commercial considerations, provided its military assistance in the form of grants, a policy that landed it in difficulties later on.

At present the notion of the commercial state is an important aspect of Anglo-Saxon strategic thinking. It holds the view that countries that trade with one another will sheath their swords and abandon military rivalries, thereby ensuring peace.

Since 1945 both systems have coexisted in the world. In reality, no country can be purely a "power" or a "commercial" state, but one of these characteristics tends to be dominant. In the international system, these types of states complement one another.

After 1990 a change occurred in the criteria for being considered powerful. Many new states came into being, and their possibilities for maintaining their independence were limited. It was held that countries having to trade with one another would establish regional economic groupings that would prevent them from waging war against their partners. The development of international trade would establish the primacy of the commercial state in the international system, thus contributing to world peace. This strategy of the major powers has its adversaries, however, who claim that the reason for creating small countries is to make it easier to dominate.

(H. KÖNI) (Sources: McNeil, part 3; Braudel)

of Democratization," contained radical proposals like the abolition of the MGK and the attachment of the General Staff to the Ministry of Defense rather than the prime minister's office. In another report ("Toward a New Strategy of Economic and Commercial Diplomacy in Turkey"), published in 1998, TÜSİAD proposed that a transition be made from a "national security" state to a "commercial" state model (Box Intro-13).

The business leaders did not confine themselves to making proposals. In the 1980s they started setting up Turkish-American, Turkish-Greek, and Turkish-Russian business councils through which they worked to solve problems and develop relations in areas going beyond strictly economic and commercial ties. TÜSİAD established a company in the U.S. to engage in lobbying. Prominent businessmen like Şarık Tara and Rahmi Koç were acting like "diplomats of the business world" and telling the Greek prime minister that they would take initiatives to secure his invitation to Turkey. TÜSİAD went even further and in 1994 established a Foreign Relations Committee and set up representative offices in Brussels and Washington, D.C.

BALLERAL REPORT AND REPORT OF THE PROPERTY OF

This situation was in keeping with international developments. After the Cold War economic competition and the technology race intensified, and the diplomats of important countries started concentrating their efforts on economic and commercial issues. A concept of economic diplomacy was gradually taking shape.

In the 1990s Turkey was confronted with two courses: the first gave priority to national security, as advocated by the military; and the second course, advocated by the business world, gave priority to trade and the economy. The first course was gaining greater weight in Turkey, largely due to the internal issues such as the conflict in the southeast and the rise of political Islam as well as regional conflicts and instability. The perception was that the problems with the Western countries were due to the Sèvres Peace Treaty (signed after World War I) being made a topical issue once again.

The Leadership

The instability of the 1990s witnessed the tenure of Tansu Ciller as minister of foreign affairs (who pushed matters relating to the ministry to the background), the very short tenure of Murat Karayalçın as minister, and Necmettin Erbakan's efforts to veer from Turkey's traditional foreign policy. Demirel, as president from 1993 to 2000, appeared more active in foreign affairs than when he himself had been prime minister. He developed a personal friendship with the leaders of the Central Asian and Caucasus republics, above all with Heydar Aliyev. He also had an affinity with the leaders of numerous Balkan, Middle Eastern, and Western countries that he had started in the past and developed during the 1990s. This gave him considerable scope for action in the field of foreign relations. Unlike Özal's foreign policy activities, which showed no regard for the positions of the army or the government or bypassed them, Demirel's activities were generally designed to support the government's policies.

In the 1990s new elements in Turkish foreign policy were the energy and pipeline contracts, which allowed new organizations to get involved in foreign policy, if only within a restricted field. In this context, the Ministry of Energy as well as Botaş (the state's pipeline operating company) and the Turkish Petroleum Company (TPAO) became active players, especially at the stage when pipeline contracts were being awarded and in connection with the transport of Caspian oil and gas. In some instances these organizations even clashed with the MFA over areas of responsibility.

B. The Legal Background of Turkish Foreign Policy

The process of elaborating Turkish foreign policy is regulated by the Constitution and relevant laws. In the legal dimension of this process a prominent place is accorded to the competent institutions and organs as well as to the arrangements regarding treaty making, treaty ratification, and declaration of war.

Among the principal organs responsible for elaborating foreign policy are the government and the MFA. The president and the TGNA also figure also among the responsible organs.

The government and the MFA: the government is the organ charged in the Constitution (article 112/1) with elaborating and executing the foreign policy of the country and bearing the legal and political responsibility for all decisions made. In carrying out foreign policy the government acts in accordance with its political tendency and within the framework of the party and government programs. Naturally, the government must conform with the Constitution and the regime in the decisions it makes and the policies it pursues.

In the field of execution, the most important organ is the MFA. This ministry's duties are specified in the following laws: Law No. 1173, dated 5 June 1969, entitled "Implementation and Coordination of International Relations"; Decree No. 206 (with the force of law), dated 8 June 1984, entitled "Organization and Duties of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs"; and Law No. 4009, dated 24 June 1994, entitled "Law on the Structure and Duties of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs." The MFA's competence and duties are described as follows: in article 2/a, "[e] xecute foreign policy in accordance with the principles set out by the government and conduct the Turkish Republic's relations with foreign countries and international organizations"; in article 2/b, "[c]arry out the preparatory work for the determination of the Turkish Republic's foreign policy, put forward proposals, conduct and coordinate the foreign policy to be determined"; in article 2/d, "conduct negotiations with foreign states and organizations"; in article 2/e, "ensure that the activities of other ministries and organizations are in conformity with foreign policy"; in article 2/f, "secure the conformity of financial, economic, and technical negotiations with foreign policy and, when necessary,...participate in the negotiations"; in article 2/h, "carry out the duties of representation, as the competent authority, at foreign states and international organizations"; and in article 2/i, "monitor developments in foreign states and international organizations and their interaction with one another."

The president of the Republic: the authority of the president in the field of foreign affairs is mostly of a formal kind and relates to ratification of treaties and declaration of war.

Under article 104 of the Constitution, the president has the power to ratify and proclaim treaties. Before the president can exercise this power, the TGNA must pass a law approving the treaty. Among the president's powers are "to send the representatives of the Turkish state to foreign states and to receive the representatives of foreign states to the Turkish Republic."

Under articles 92 and 104, the president also has the power to decide on the use of the Turkish armed forces.

Article 104, on the president's duties and powers, provides that "the president exercises the powers of commander-in-chief of the Turkish armed forces on behalf of the Turkish Grand National Assembly," while article 92 provides that "if the country suffers a sudden armed attack when the Turkish Grand National Assembly is on holiday or in recess and it becomes necessary to use armed force immediately, the president can make a decision on the use of the Turkish armed forces."

The TGNA: the role of the TGNA in the elaboration of foreign policy consists in the ratification of treaties, declaration of war and the use of force, the budgetary depates, and the activities of the parliamentary committee on foreign affairs.

As noted earlier, the TGNA passes a law approving an international treaty after it has been signed. Under the provisions of article 90/a of the Constitution, however, "[a]greements regulating economic, commercial, or technical relations of a duration of less than one year enter into force upon proclamation, provided they do not impose financial obligations on the state or bring changes to the personal status or the property rights of Turks in foreign countries." The following exceptions are foreseen in article 90/3 of the Constitution: "Implementation agreements based on an international treaty and economic, commercial, technical, or administrative treaties signed on the basis of powers granted by law need not be approved by the Turkish Grand National Assembly; however, economic and commercial treaties and those relating to the rights of private individuals entered into under this provision cannot come into force before promulgation." Under Law No. 244, the MFA has the duty to prepare the draft of the law on approving a treaty. The draft is adopted by the assembly without amendments (Tanör, pp. 324–26).

Under article 87 of the Constitution, the TGNA has the power, inter alia, to declare war. Article 92 provides that "[w]hen sanctioned by international law, the Turkish Grand National Assembly has the power to declare a state of war, to authorize the sending of Turkish armed forces to foreign countries in circumstances other than when alliances to which Turkey is a party or international courtesy require the sending of armed forces, and to authorize the stationing of foreign armed forces in Turkey."

In addition to the ratification of treaties, the TGNA's activities in the sphere of foreign policy include the government's briefing of the assembly on foreign policy developments and holding general debates from time to time on foreign policy. The main activity in this field consists of the foreign policy debates in the committees on foreign relations and the budget. The debates in the committee on foreign relations involve examining the texts of treaties, whereas the debates in the budget committee can get very heated, with governments having to defend their foreign policy and replying to criticism through the minister. Since the 1990s the committee on foreign relations has been following developments more closely and demanding more information from the government and the MFA.

Appraisal of the Period

THE INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENT AND DYNAMICS

As we shall see in the section on "The Domestic Environment and Dynamics" below, Anatolia was in terrible shape as the War of Liberation got underway. The Allies, however, who had imposed Sèvres on the Ottomans, were themselves not in such a good position to put further pressure on Anatolia after the cessation of hostilities.

First, Britain, France, and Italy had internal problems. Britain was facing difficulties in India, Egypt, and especially Ireland in the form of independence movements. It also had problems in the Middle East because of independence promises made to Arabs but not kept. (When Dr. Rıza Nur, one of the three representatives of the Ankara government in Lausanne, reminded Britain of Ireland at the Lausanne Conference, the Irish republicans sent him messages of appreciation [Nur, vol. 3, p. 1063].) At the same time, Britain was dealing with labor unrest. Furthermore, David Lloyd George, who gave unreserved backing to Greece, had serious differences with his foreign secretary, George Nathaniel Curzon. Lord Curzon feared that allowing Greece to expand unduly in Anatolia would hinder the restoration of peace, while his defense secretary, Winston Churchill, felt that a friendly Turkey could be useful as a shield against the Bolsheviks (Hale, p. 49). France was preoccupied with the general strike and the actions of both the Catholic and Communist trade unions. Italy was embroiled in the Fascist takeover of the country following the march on Rome of the Black Shirts on 28 October 1922.

Second, the Allies also had serious differences among themselves. Britain's attempt to appropriate the territories that had been promised to France and Italy in 1916 and 1917 alienated both countries. Italy was active in the Adriatic and in Antalya without consulting Britain, while Britain was punishing Italy by allowing Greece to grab İzmir, which had been promised to Italy. Meanwhile France was concerned about Britain's obstruction of French plans to tie down Germany with punitive terms. It also reacted sharply to Britain's occupation of Mosul and subsequently of Antep in 1918, both of which had been assigned to France in the Sykes-Picot partition plan. In the end both France and Italy were reduced to seeking nothing more than concession agreements and privileges in Anatolia and thus abandoning Britain in its confrontation with Ankara (Box 1-1). In this situation Greece was left to its own devices as it advanced in Anatolia.

Third, an antiwar atmosphere was building in all three countries. The people were tired of war and could see no justification for the Anatolia operation. Marshal Ferdinand Foch declared that it would take twenty-one divisions to subdue the Turks and that such a force was just not available. The soldiers had been told that they had won "the war that was to end all wars" and now looked forward to demobilization (Hale, p. 48).

Fourth, the Treaty of Sèvres took no account of the USSR. After 1920, however, the Bolsheviks had gained control of Russia. The Allies had tried to nip the revolution in the bud through armed intervention, fomenting civil war and imposing an embargo. Now the Bolsheviks were seeking a way to relieve the Allied pressure. When V.I. Lenin prevailed in his debate with M.N. Roy (Box 1-11 below), the theoretical hurdles preventing Soviet aid to Ankara had been cleared.

Another very important event that took place in the international environment was the proclamation of U.S. president Woodrow Wilson's Fourteen Points in 1919. This document upset the colonialist powers Britain and France, because it sought to prevent secret diplomacy and defended the principles of self-determination and nationality. These principles, and especially point 12, were used by Ankara to justify demands for full independence. When Gen. James Harbord came to Anatolia, he saw point 12 featured on placards that M. Kemal ordered displayed.

Seen from a regional rather than a continental perspective, the most important foreign factor was Britain's

Box 1-1. The Road Leading to Concessions

The first debt contracted by the Ottomans was to finance the Crimean War (1854). Because of a lack of discipline in the civil service and the attractiveness of borrowing the funds needed to cover public expenditures, the practice of contracting foreign debts became the financial policy of the state. From 1854 to 1874 fifteen separate loans were obtained. At the end of the period the total debt amounted to over 5,297,000 gold French francs, and the annual interest was approximately 300,000 francs.

To service its foreign debt, the Ottoman government now started borrowing from the Galata bankers. When it became incapable of even repaying the interest on these loans, it issued the Ramadan Decree in October 1875, declaring that only 50% of installments that came due would be paid. In the event, even this undertaking could be met for only three months.

In March 1876 all foreign debt repayments came to an end. This was followed by suspension of repayments of domestic loans. That default signified the bankruptcy of the state, and the Galata bankers were allowed to appropriate the tax income for six important items (stamp duty and taxes levied on spirits, silk, fish, salt, and tobacco) for ten years. In 1876 the Rüsum-i Sitte administration was set up to administer this tax operation.

When repayments of foreign debts were delayed after Rüsum-ı Sitte came into operation, foreign creditors pressed the government to issue the Muharrem Decree in December 1881. This decree set up the Ottoman Public Debt Administration. The Galata bankers received bonds and relinquished the receipts of the Rüsum-ı Sitte to the Düyun-ı Umumiye. The Düyun-ı Umumiye set about collecting taxes and started repaying the creditors of the Ottoman Empire. In order to increase the yield of tobacco taxes, which were the easiest to collect, a monopoly known as the Régle Administration was established in 1884 to take over the production of tobacco goods.

In this situation the Ottomans were deprived of funds to carry out public services. The solution was to grant concessions. A private firm was granted a concession to carry out a public service for a given period, usually as a monopoly. The distribution of water or electricity and the operation of tramways and shipping can be cited as examples.

The next step of this Ottoman bankruptcy process was article 232 of the Treaty of Sevres. Today these concessions come in the form of build, operate, transfer (BOT) agreements.

determination to prevent any other country from gaining supremacy in the Middle East, a region that was becoming important because of its oil reserves. That is why Britain amended the Sykes-Picot Agreement and incurred the wrath of France. It also conducted its policy toward Ankara with Mosul in mind. In fact one view, not to be taken lightly, is that Britain encouraged Greece to invade Anatolia solely to create a diversion for the Turks. (M. Kemal, the master tactician, sent a Turkish unit under the command of "Özdemir Bey" [a remarkable Teşkilat-ı Mahsusa member, real name: Ali Şefik el Mısri] to Revanduz in northern Iraq to harass the British. This unit scored an unexpected success by opening the road to Suleymaniyah on 12 August 1922. It took no less than the Royal Air Force to check the progress of this unit.) It should not be seen as an accident that the treaty establishing a mandate signed by Britain with Iraq's King Faisal I on 10 October 1922 coincided with the armistice agreement signed in Mudanya on 11 October 1922 (Picard et al., pp. 29-30).

II. THE DOMESTIC ENVIRONMENT AND DYNAMICS

When the War of Liberation started in 1919, Turkey had practically no resources to carry out such a struggle. All of its rudimentary industry and most of its trade were concentrated in a few coastal centers then under foreign occupation. It took twenty-two hours to go by train from Ankara to Eskişehir, a distance covered in three and a half hours by regular train today. The country was not even producing nails, so used nails had to be straightened and reused.

Alongside the dire economic situation, Anatolia was the scene of constant warfare and insurgency. Because Ankara was unable to deal with this, it had to seek the help of friendly guerrillas. Meanwhile the Anatolian peasants were under the negative influence of a fatwa by the Sheikh-ul-Islam (chief religious authority) condemning the War of Liberation. M. Kemal was compelled to seek counter-fatwas from Anatolian muftis, who declared that the struggle was to save the caliph-sultan and Islam.

Above all, the Anatolian peasants were completely exhausted and war weary after having had to fight without interruption since 1911. Furthermore, Anatolia was not an integrated market, so feelings of national solidarity were not able to draw on shared economic interest. (Even a basic commodity like wheat, which should have been coming from Konya, a town in central Anatolia, was being imported from the Crimea.) As a result, even those soldiers who had not deserted would disperse after a skirmish and return to their villages in the belief that the war had been won (Selek, p. 120). The independence tribunals had been set up during the war to combat desertions. The people were more likely to join insurrections than to join the War of Liberation (Selek, p. 65).

As for the notables (rich and influential landowners/ traders in rural cities and towns), their loyalty belonged to their locality rather than to the nation. Associations such as the Redd-i Ilhak, which they had set up with the help of Union and Progress officers, were striving for the liberation of their region or locality. They were unable to think on a national scale or to entertain the national vision of the intelligentsia as represented by M. Kemal. Nor did they have the administrative skills (such as the use of the telegraph) to realize such a vision. As a matter of fact, this was to render the task of the intelligentsia easier and was to provide them with "relative internal autonomy" both during the War of Liberation and subsequently (Box Intro-6 above).

In addition to its political will, two events pushed Ankara into engaging in a struggle for independence in these difficult circumstances: the occupation of İzmir by Greece in May 1919 and the establishment of Armenia in the eastern provinces under the Treaty of Sèvres in 1920.

The exports of all Anatolia, not just the western part, were channeled through the port of İzmir. Its closure would be extremely harmful for Turkey. Furthermore, the occupier was Greece, a "former subject" with a different religion. After the occupation the local Greek population engaged in jubilant demonstrations, which aroused anxiety among the notables. The lack of response by the sultan to the occupation was an eye opener to the public. In these circumstances it became easier for M. Kemal to influence the clerics and the public who followed them. The message was that "the sultan is a prisoner and action must be taken on his behalf." Throughout the War of Liberation, M. Kemal was to refer constantly to liberation and salvation (kurtuluş) but never to restructuring (kuruluş) or the reforms he was contemplating (these two terms are borrowed from Bülent Tanör). M. Kemal achieved victory in the War of Liberation through shrewd coalitions that he entered into with the notables, Islam, Communists, alternative military leaders, Unionists (the Union and Progress Party members), Kurds, Circassians, and others. He was to break with all of these groups when the time came, with the exception of the notables.

The issue of Armenia was even more important in triggering the War of Liberation. First, the establishment of Armenia, next to Russia and with access to the Black Sea, was a source of major concern. Second, the property of the Armenians who had been deported in 1915 (Box 1-2) had been appropriated by the local notables, who did not want to give up this property (article 144 of the Treaty of Sèvres made detailed provisions for the restitution of this property). It should be noted that no problems arose when the British occupied Antep from 17 December 1918 to September 1919, but there was stubborn resistance to the French occupation on 5 November 1919. This resistance, known as the "heroic defense of Antep," was the result of the French using Armenian units in their occupation. Third, many Unionists who were involved in the Armenian deportation had fled İstanbul to join the Anatolian resistance. Fourth and most importantly, the creation of an Armenian state had greatly upset the Kurds. The Kurdish tribal leaders were among the people who had appropriated Armenian properties. There was also bad blood between the two peoples going back to the time of the Hamidiye Regiments of 1890 (Box 7-33 in Section 7).

In addition, the Kurdish elite could see that the benefits envisaged for them in articles 62–64 of the Treaty of Sèvres would be curtailed because of Armenia. The autonomous Kurdistan was described in article 62 as being south of the southern border of Armenia. In other words, in all the provinces of eastern Anatolia (with the exception of Van) the Kurds, who were much more numerous than the Armenians, would live under the administration of Christian Armenians, who had been their vassals

Box 1-2. The Deportation of the Armenians

In the heat of World War I, in 1915, the Ottoman administration ordered its Armenians to leave their homes to be deported to Syria, then an Ottoman province. The reason cited was the support that they had provided to advancing Russian armies in the northeast.

The situation had deeper roots, actually, The Armenian popylation, once called the "Loyal Nation," had become the "Armenian Question" of the Ottoman Empire at least since the 1878 Berlin Treaty. Living under ever-increasing pressure from the Muslim population in eastern Anatolia from 1860s on (see Box 7-33 in Section 7), the Anatolian Armenians had demanded reforms, but the disintegrating empire was unable to comply. This permitted the Great Powers to exploit the situation to intervene in the domestic affairs of the Ottomans, which turned the Armenians into a Trojan Horse in the eyes of the Muslim people and the administration. The question had eventually become the very "Eastern Question" itself: the struggle among European powers and Russia over who would get the best portion of the spoils of the empire. As a rule, the Armenians (actually, non-Muslims) of the empire endured discrimination; but by the 1890s some Western-educated Armenians had organized secret societies and began opposing Ottoman authorities. This included attacking neighboring Muslim communities, partly for self-defense and partly in an effort to simulate the "Bulgarian model": to attract first the reaction of the empire and then the attention of the European powers, which would help to make the community first autonomous and then independent.

Preparations for the deportation were carried out by Union and Progress leaders during the war without informing the government, at a time when the Ottoman parliament was also dissolved on 1 March 1915. Right after the Armenian rebellion in Van (eastern Anatolia, 20 April 1915), and during the Gallipoli crisis in the northwest (the Dardanelles battle of 19 February-18 March to the Gallipoli landing of 25 April-20 December), the Union and Progress government issued the decree of 24 April 1915, ordering the arrest of Armenian leaders in Istanbul and the closing down of their organizations. This was followed on 27 May by a "provisional deportation law" authorizing the army "to deport and resettle the inhabitants of villages and towns who contravene military regulations, engage in espionage, or commit treason."

Deportation, especially in time of war, is hardly exceptional, particularly in a Middle Eastern historical setting. But the fact that the deportation included not only Armenian armed bands but innocent Armenian families from all over and the deplorable manner in which it was carried out by the secret Special Organization (Teşkilat-i Mahsusa) controlled by the party nucleus led by Dr. Bahaettiri Şakir raise important debates centering on three main points: numbers, intent and name, and compensations.

The first point relates to the number of victims. There is general agreement that 1 million Armenians survived the war. The disagreement is over how many Armenians were in Anatolia when World War I broke out. Turkish sources claim that there were 1.3 million, while Armenian sources claim up to 2.5 million; foreign sources cite figures ranging from 1.5 million to 1.8 million. As a result, the Turkish side reaches the sum of 300,000 victims, while the other side claims around 1.5 million. In the ultimatum handed to the Ottoman government prior to the Treaty of Sèvres, the number of Armenian victims in the years 1915–19 is given as 800,000 (see "The Peace Treaty of Sèvres" below). Even in time of war this number was enormous. It is true that between 1.5 million and 2 million Muslims also lost their lives, but these casualties were not the result of the action of their own state.

The second point relates to the thornier question of intent. Was the Ottoman state in particular responsible for the deaths of this very large number of Armenians, and, further, did it intend to exterminate them? One party claims that there was a plan to liquidate the Armenians for reasons of state. The deportation was part of the Union and Progress policy of Turkification: it was ideologically motivated, planned, and methodical. It was carried out not just in the war zones in the east but throughout Anatolia and even in Thrace and was not confined to men but included women and children. Killings occurred en route and in some places took the form of organized massacres. In any event, travel on foot from Anatolia to Syria was likely to result in death, especially for the elderly and the children.

Those who hold the contrary view recall the crucial role played by the lamentable circumstances of the war and the prevailing social psychology that the empire was coming apart. They claim that the responsibility cannot be ascribed to an already dissolved parliament or to a government that was dragged into the war, without even being informed, by this hypernationalist nucleus within the central committee of Union and Progress. Those who hold this view remind us that the actual implementation of the law greatly changed from region to region and person to person, depending on the effectiveness of the control by this nucleus. They add that Izmir and Istanbul Armenians were exempted and assert that the aim was to relocate those Armenians who had, as the popular expression goes, "stabbed the army in the back" in wartime to a location where they could not harm the war effort, Consequently, it was neither planned nor ideologically motivated. They argue that killings were exceptional, with most fatalities resulting from diseases, and that these unavoidable measures taken in wartime had nothing to do with an intent to exterminate.

This question of Intent became all the more important because of the Armenian diaspora's insistence on calling the whole affair a "genocide." This term was coined by Polish lawyer R. Lemkin in 1943. Genocide was finally penalized by the UN in December 1948, which defined it as requiring "intent." As a matter of fact, article 2 of 1948 UN Convention stipulated that "genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such."

Whatever the outcome of these debates, the deportation resulted in an undeniable human tragedy, taking the lives of hundreds of thousands of innocent Anatolian Armenians, and its bitter memorles created a vicious circle in the polarized present-day situation. The Turkish state refrained from discussing the issue even within Its own circle and denied its very existence, as If the massacres had taken place not in Ottoman times but in the Republican era. In turn, this greatly upset the Armenian diaspora, who, in an effort to commemorate and revenge their innocent ancestors, underlined this term to pressure/punish Turkey. Genocide also became a "Chosen Trauma" to symbolize Armenian unity as well as serving to foster national consciousness in order to delay or prevent assimilation in their host country. This very term "genocide," nowever, facilitated the denial in Turkey, because it referred to the Nazis, who, unlike the panic situation of the Ottomans, coldbloodedly planned and executed the massacres in an atmosphere totally lacking any threat from the Jews. In short, the two radical and opposed stances fed each other, particularly the hypernationalist circles.

This situation would bring Turkey under Intense International pressure, make the Republic of Armenia economically dependent on Iran and militarily dependent on Russia, and leave the Armenian community of Turkey in a quandary. The host countries where the Armenian diaspora lived were to profit from this situation. Their politicians used the Armenian votes for electoral gains; their business leaders used the issue to pressure Turkey and to obtain contracts in exchange for lobbying against anti-Turkish resolutions in their parliaments.

As to the third point, the diaspora is insistent on what we might call the "2 + 1 Rs": Recognition of the "genocide," Reparations for lost Armenian property, and, for the most radical wing, Restitution of Armenian lands in eastern Anatolia.

for centuries. As Armenia grew larger, it would be at the expense of their autonomous region, which had the potential to become fully independent. This secured firm Kurdish support for the War of Liberation, given that Turks and Kurds had the sultan-caliph as their common denominator. The only major exception is the Koçgiri insurrection of 1921, brought about by the Kürdistan Teali Cemiyeti (a Kurdish association in İstanbul). As a matter of fact, the War of Liberation, with its congresses and hostilities with the adversaries, started in the east. Its first military victories and diplomatic successes would be over Armenia (the Gümrü Treaty of 2 December 1920).

III. THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE PERIOD

This was an extraordinary period, when a struggle was being conducted for survival. Consequently, there was only one foreign policy objective: ensuring independence.

Nevertheless, the concept of independence was reflected in the foreign policy with great care and realism. An effort was made to minimize friction with the major Western powers and to present the situation as one of resistance to the Greek army's occupation of Turkey. In this we can detect the influence of the basic philosophy of Turkey's Westernized elite as well as the realism and tactical skills of M. Kemal, which resulted in maximum use of international balances in the War of Liberation.

A. Independence Based on Realism

The first thing to note about the foreign policy of the War of Liberation is that it was a revisionist policy.

This revisionism did not conform to the standards of the period, however. First, the Turkish revisionists knew where and when to stop; the borders they aspired to attain were rational and realistic. That is why the order achieved at Lausanne is the only one that has survived to this day. Second, the revisionism of the Anatolian movement turned to the maintenance of the status quo immediately after Lausanne. This was reflected in general satisfaction with the gains and policies aiming at domestic consolidation. Third, this was not an "anti-system" type of revisionism, a very important feature from the viewpoint of international relations. It did not challenge the political supremacy of the West (like Nazi Germany) or capitalism (like the Soviet Union). This secured it freedom from the opposition of the major powers. The National Pact reflected this different approach. This text underpinning the Republic of Turkey has six articles. Articles 1 and 6 represented revisionism, and the rest reflected the different nature of this revisionism.

Revisionism and the Status Quo in the National Pact

The National Pact (MM in the Turkish acronym) was the first official document revealing the distinguishing features of the revisionism of the Anatolian revolution. This document was adopted and signed at a closed sitting of the nationalist Felah-1 Vatan group of the Ottoman parliament on 28 January 1920 and was adopted on 17 February by the parliament (Meclis-i Mebusan; Chamber of Deputies) and released to the press (Turan, pp. 86–89). The MM, also referred to as the National Oath, based the integrity and the independence of the country on the principles set out at the Erzurum and Sivas congresses of 1919:

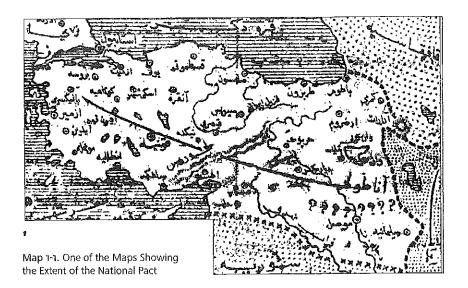

Article 1: The fate of the territories of the Ottoman state and especially the places with an Arab majority and those occupied by enemy forces at the time of the 30 October 1918 armistice agreement shall be decided by a free vote of the inhabitants of these territories. All of the lands within and outside the 1918 armistice lines, inhabited by people attached to one another on the basis of religion, custom, and aspirations, harboring mutual feelings of respect and sacrifice, and representing the Ottoman-Muslim majority respectful of their racial and social rights and the condition of their districts, represent a whole that can under no pretext be separated from one another in practice or in law.

Article 2: When the inhabitants of the three districts [Kars, Ardahan, Batum] that chose to return to the fatherland by popular vote achieve their freedom, we can accept that, if necessary, they resort to the vote once again.

Article 3: The legal status of Western Thrace, which is to be settled at the Turkish peace treaty, shall be decided by the free vote of its inhabitants.

Article 4: The security of the seat of the Islamic Caliphate and the Sultanate and the capital of the Ottoman government, Istanbul, as well as the Sea of Marmara shall be free from any threat. With this proviso, the unanimous decision of all states, including ours, to ensure access to world trade and transit through the Straits will be considered valid.

Article 5: We shall respect and guarantee the rights of minorities based on the principles contained in the treaties concluded between the Allies and their adversaries, on condition that the Muslim minorities in neighboring countries will enjoy the same rights.

Article 6: To achieve our national and economic development, and to manage our affairs in a contemporary and orderly way, we must enjoy, like all states, unfettered independence and freedom as the basis of our present and future existence. Consequently, we are against all limitations that would hinder our political, judiciary, and financial development. The conditions for the repayment of our debts shall not violate these principles.

(Actually, the National Pact consists of seven articles after the preamble. Article 7 was the "Punitory Pact," which was approved for the purpose of punishing those involved in war crimes. The article called for "an investigation of those members of the cabinet and their associates who, starting from the crises that led to the Great War up to the convening of parliament, were responsible for entering the war and, by their actions in directing the war effort and their general conduct of domestic and foreign policy, brought harm to the state and the nation." This article, also known as the "separate article," was subsequently allowed to lapse because it dealt with an internal issue [Turan, p. 86], while MM's main thrust was directed abroad, and also because it was considered ill-advised to allude to the issue of the Armenian deportation at a time when the question of creating a "Greater Armenia" was being mooted.)

It will be seen that articles 1 and 6 dealt with the country's independence and territorial integrity. That was the foundation of the MM, and it was thoroughly revisionist. In the 1960s certain commentators claimed that the War of Liberation was not launched against the occupiers but rather against the minorities and that it was a strictly Turkish-Greek war. At the Sivas Congress, however, M. Kemal amended the third resolution of the Erzurum Congress, which stated: "All occupations and interventions will be interpreted as an attempt to establish a Greek and an Armenian state," revealing his intention to oppose all occupiers. The comprehensive nature of the War of Liberation also became apparent when the name of the Association for the Defense of the Rights of the Eastern Provinces established at Erzurum was changed to the Association for the Defense of the Rights of Anatolia and Rumeli (signifying European Turkey) at Sivas.

M. Kemal gave a very restrictive interpretation of the first article of the MM, however, signifying his intention to pull back the frontiers rather than to push them outward. As we have seen, article 1 used the phrase "within and outside of the 1918 armistice lines." M. Kemal discarded the "and outside of" portion. After a certain date all MM texts read "within the armistice line" (Tunçay, p. 12). M. Kemal went even further in interpreting the armistice line: "Is there such a line? No. When we met at the Erzurum Congress, we felt such a line should exist, thinking of the fatherland. At that time, we said, the line we control will be our border" (TBMM, p. 354). This restrictive interpretation was due to M. Kemal's concern about being accused in the future of failing to attain the MM's objectives. It was also a reflection of his uncompromising realism.

The other articles of the MM demonstrate the will to abide by the basic principles of the international system. In articles 2 and 3 the then-fashionable method of holding a plebiscite is accepted, even though there were Turkish majorities in those districts. In article 4 freedom of navigation in the Straits is upheld, which was an important issue for international capitalism. Finally, article 5 includes a pledge to respect minority rights. In fact, by accepting "the principles contained in the treaties concluded between the Allies and their adversaries," article 5 accepts the standard for defining a minority: racial, linguistic, and religious. This article was to cause considerable difficulty for the Turkish delegation at the Lausanne Conference in its efforts to confine the concept of a minority exclusively to non-Muslims.

B. Westernism Based on Balance

In conformity with the traditional Ottoman line, Turkey's War of Liberation, though waged against the West, did not lead to a split with the West. The goal of Westernization was manifest among the intellectuals (aydınlar) even as the war was being waged against the West. Turkey continuously sought contacts with the West while the war with Greece was raging on. Not even the West beyond the Atlantic was neglected. A cable was sent from Sivas to the U.S. inviting it to send in a delegation. The message went to all the West, and in particular to Britain, that the new Turkey would shun communism and remain in the capitalist camp. This was done at the İzmir Economy Congress in February and March 1923, at a time when the Lausanne Conference was deadlocked. This message was received with huge satisfaction in the West, where the trauma of the Bolshevik revolution of 1917 was still fresh and the fear of its spread pervasive.

The Westernism of the War of Liberation was used with great tactical skill and in full awareness of the prevailing balances. M. Kemal accomplished this in two basic ways: using the West against the West and the Soviets against the West.

The West versus the West

M. Kemal took maximum advantage of the rivalries within the Western camp and played one Western country against another. When France's Syrian commissioner Georges Picot called in Ankara on his way to Paris on 5-6 December 1920, M. Kemal informed him that he was willing "to accept a French economic mandate encompassing all of Anatolia." Meanwhile Gen. James Harbord's delegation, which had been sent to Anatolia by U.S. president Wilson in the fall of 1919 to explore the question of an Armenian mandate, reported after a meeting that M. Kemal "expressed a preference for an American mandate" and that, "if possible, he was ready to accept American aid" (Helmreich, pp. 139 and 151). In similar fashion Ankara representative Bekir Sami had distributed economic concessions at the London Conference in March 1921. M. Kemal himself proposed to Henri Franklin-Bouillon when they met in Ankara in October 1921 that France be granted 99-year concessions to extract chromium, iron, and silver. In addition, the well-known Chester concession was granted to an American company while the Lausanne negotiations were going on (Box 1-3).

Box 1-3. The Chester Project

Retired U.S. admiral Colby M. Chester sought a railroad concession in 1911 for a main line linking Sivas and Van and extending to the port of Yumurtalik, with branch lines to Mosul and Kirkuk. This request was rejected by the Ottoman parliament. Colby's son renewed the request as the Lausanne Conference got underway, and an agreement was signed. Under its terms, all investments in the form of railroads, bridges, and ports would become the property of the Turkish government in ninety-nine years, but in the interim all mines within twenty kilometers of the railroad on both sides would be exploited exclusively by the concession holder. In addition, the company would be given the right to build and operate other railroads.

Although the TGNA approved this concession on 9 April 1922, it was never implemented. The company's main focus was on the oil fields of Mosul and Kirkuk, and at Lausanne it became clear that these districts would be detached from Turkey. On 18 December 1923 the TGNA rescinded the concession.

> (B. ORAN) (Source: Erhan, pp. 377–83; Ana Britannica, 1987, vol. 5, p. 571)

In the 1960s some commentators came to the conclusion that "the War of Liberation was not anti-imperialist," based on the granting of concessions. In reality, however, all of these concessions remained on paper and were designed to split France and Italy from Britain and the U.S. from all three, to prevent the formation of a united Western front. As a matter of fact, the Italians evacuated Antalya in July 1921, and the French left Cilicia on 20 October 1921, leaving the British alone in Anatolia. This was a tremendous relief for Ankara.

The Soviets versus the West

The Anatolia movement also used the Soviets as a balancing factor to counter the Western occupation.

The arms and financial assistance coming from the Soviets constituted an important material resource underpinning the War of Liberation. As the first state to recognize the National Pact, the Soviet Union gave Ankara a big diplomatic boost. But the greatest benefit of Soviet friendship during the war was that it kept the West from pushing Turkey too hard out of fear of the spread of communism.

Although each side needed the other, it was not easy to establish this relationship. Ankara was wary of Moscow for historical and ideological reasons. Moscow knew that tight relations with Ankara would delay the normalization of its own relations with the West. It was well aware that M. Kemal's movement had nothing to do with socialism and that phrases that he frequently uttered such as "imperialism will destroy us," "capitalism will devour us," and "the downtrodden nations will one day obliterate the oppressors" were pure rhetoric. Moscow was hoping that M. Kemal could be bypassed and that it would become influential in Anatolia through the Turkish Communist Party.

The Soviets only signed the March 1921 treaty with Ankara after they had succeeded in reaching a trade agreement with Britain and after coming to the conclusion that Kemal's movement would be able to cope with leftist elements in Anatolia and also with Greece. As a matter of fact, this treaty was signed after Mustafa Suphi (the Communist leader) and his friends were murdered in January 1921, after Ethem the Circassian was beaten (Box 1-15 below), and after the first Battle of İnönü had been fought and won (Hale, pp. 50–51).

The Turkish policy during the War of Liberation can be summarized as saying "no to communism, yes to the Soviets." Through this policy the West was both checked and reassured. The London Conference was convened on 21 February. The delegation of the TGNA reached Moscow on 17 February and signed the treaty with the Soviets on 16 March. On 14 April Britain notified Greece of its neutrality in the war and subsequently banned the sale of weapons to the Greeks.

The Armistice of Mudros

Signed on 30 October 1918, the Armistice of Mudros signaled the end of the war for the Ottoman Empire.

No conditions were set for the negotiation of a peace treaty, so the document signified the unconditional surrender of the Ottoman Empire. The British commander in the Aegean, S. A. G. Calthorpe, had received orders to conduct the negotiation of the armistice document without reference to his French counterpart, Admiral Jean Amet. Consequently, the negotiations at Mudros were an exclusively British-Ottoman affair. In the final document the British made changes from what had been envisaged earlier. For example, Cilicia (Mersin, Adana, and areas farther to the east that were in the French sphere of influence) was originally supposed to have been evacuated by the Ottomans right away, but it was now accepted that some forces would be kept there to ensure law and order. Similarly, the Allies were originally supposed to have had the right immediately to occupy all important strategic locations, whereas the signed document provided for such occupation only when "a situation arose that would pose a danger to the security of the Allies" (Helmreich, pp. 1-2). Mudros represented the first clash of interests among the Allies.

The armistice document consisted of twenty-five articles covering the following subjects.

1. Subjects dealing with the surrender of the army and evacuation: "Aside from the units required to control the borders and maintain law and order," the army would immediately be demobilized (article 5). "All warships in Turkish waters or in waters under Turkish control" would be surrendered (article 6). All troops in the Hijaz, Asir, Yemen, Syria, and Iraq would surrender (article 16) along with the officers in Tripoli and Bengazi (article 17), and all the equipment, weapons, and munitions of the demobilized army would be disposed of according to the orders issued (article 20).

The withdrawal of troops from "northwestern Iran," "a part of trans-Caucasus" (article 11), and "Cilicia, aside from the forces needed to maintain law and order" (article 16), was also foreseen.

2. Facilities to be accorded to the Allies: the Allies would have free access to all Turkish ports (article 8) and all repair facilities therein (article 9). "[A] part from those serving the communications of the Turkish government, all wireless telegraph and cable stations" would come under Allied control (article 12). "After local requirements have been satisfied, the procurement from Turkish sources of coal, petroleum products, and vessels shall be facilitated" and their export banned (article 14). In addition, "Allied control officers will take charge of all railroads" (article 15).

3. Diplomatic subjects: the Ottoman Empire was to sever "all relations with the Central Powers" (article 23). The treaty called for "the unconditional surrender to the Allies in İstanbul of all prisoners of war as well as all detained or imprisoned Armenians" (article 4) and "the eviction, within one month, of all German and Austrian soldiers, sailors, and civilians from Turkish territory" (article 19), with "Turkish prisoners to be held at the disposal of the Allied powers" (article 22).

4. Places to be occupied by the Allies: the fortifications of the Straits (article 1); the railroad tunnels in the Taurus Mountains (article 10); Batumi and Baku (article 15); and all the ports in Tripoli and Bengazi (article 18).

5. Places liable to be occupied: this was the core of the armistice document. The other articles contained provisions that would appear in any armistice agreement. But the real intention of the Allies became manifest in two articles.

Article 24: "If disturbances occur in the six Armenian provinces ['Vilayat-1 Sitte' in the Ottoman Turkish text, meaning the six provinces in the east], the Allies reserve the right to occupy any portion of these provinces."

The notorious article 7 extended this right to all of the Ottoman territories: "the occupation of any strategic points in the event of a situation arising that threatens the security of the Allies."

Thus Mudros went beyond the terms of an armistice and became a document that enabled the Allies to occupy any locality in which they chose to trigger incidents. In particular, article 7 rendered all the other provisions meaningless and implied "unconditional surrender."

The preamble of the armistice declared:

The British government, in agreement with its allies, has authorized Admiral Sir Somerset Arthur Gough Calthorpe, British commander-inchief of the Mediterranean region, and the Turkish [Ottoman] Government has authorized the Turkish Minister of the Navy, His Excellency Rauf Bey, the Undersecretary of the Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs Reşad Hikmet Bey, and Lieutenant Colonel Sadullah Bey of the Turkish General Staff to decide and to agree on the terms of armistice.

The document then ended with article 25:

All hostilities between the Allies and Turkey [the Ottoman Empire] shall cease as of noon, local time, on Thursday, 31 October 1918.

Done in two copies and signed on 30 October 1918 on board HMS Agamemnon at the Port of Mudros in Limnos.

Signed: Arthur Calthorpe, Signed: Hüseyin Rauf, Reşad Hikmet, Sadullah

Post-Mudros, Pre-Sèvres

Although hostilities were meant to cease on 31 October 1918, the Allies failed to comply and did not wait for Sèvres to land troops. Using the rationale of article 7, they occupied various parts of the empire:

1. The three navies arrived in İstanbul on 13 November 1918 and established themselves there.

- 2. The British occupied Mosul on 15 November 1918, fifteen days after the armistice.
- 3. In the spring of 1919 the Italians occupied Antalya and Kuşadası while France occupied Adana, Urfa, Maraş, Antakya, and İskenderun (Alexandretta). To collect weapons and control the transportation system, Britain sent troops to İzmit, Eskişehir, and Samsun; France to Zonguldak; and Italy to Konya.
- 4. On 15 May 1919 Greece occupied İzmir, encouraged by the U.S., Britain, and France.
- 5. Finally, on 16 March 1920 Britain, France, and Italy formally occupied İstanbul and secured the dissolution of the parliament two days later through pressure on the sultan, whereupon some deputies caught by the Allies were exiled to Malta.

The main reason for the occupation was the rise of local liberation associations in places likely to be occupied, starting in November 1918 (Turan 1991, pp. 124-34). These associations were getting ready to fight against the occupiers with armed groups known as National Forces (Kuva-yı Milliye). The congresses of Erzurum (23 July-7 August 1919) and Sivas (4-12 September 1919) had been convened under M. Kemal's leadership. The minister of the navy in the Ali Rıza Paşa government, Salih Paşa, had contacts with Ankara (the Amasya meeting of 20-22 October 1919). The parliament convened in İstanbul on 12 January 1920 and adopted the National Pact (28 January 1920), based on the principles enunciated at the Sivas Congress. The eviction of the French from Antep, Urfa, and Maraş (8-11 February 1920) helped boost national morale. The occupation of İstanbul, though temporary, was meant to balance this situation (Turan 1992, p. 98).

The occupation of İzmir, following the occupation of İstanbul, would have an action-reaction effect and hasten the split between Greece and Italy while adding momentum to Turkey's struggle for liberation.

The Peace Treaty of Sèvres

The Allies signed their first peace treaty with their main adversary, Germany, at Versailles (near Paris), on 28 June 1919. The last peace treaty was to be signed with the Ottoman Empire about thirteen and a half months later, again near Paris: Sèvres.

I. THE ROAD LEADING FROM THE SHIFT IN THE TRADE ROUTES TO SÈVRES

The Treaty of Sèvres marks the lowest point of the Ottoman Empire. Naturally, an empire that held Europe in its sway from the early fifteenth to the late sixteenth century did not reach its nadir in one stroke. Two mutually reinforcing processes were at work, relating to internal and external dynamics.

A. The Rise of Europe

The feudal structure that developed as of the ninth century in Europe led to constant strife among the aristocratic dominant class (the feudal lords) and to the exploitation and pauperization of the peasants.

During this period the main factor of productionland—was owned by the feudal lords, with the church owning the biggest share. The peasants were allowed to hold only enough of the yield to keep them alive, with the rest going to the feudal lord. It was not just the land and its yield that belonged to the lords. The peasants who lived on the land and produced the crops were also considered the private property of the feudal lord. This notion of private property was so powerful that peasant women had to spend the first night of their marriage with the lord in certain periods and regions. At that time, the Ottoman Empire, with its inns, caravansaries, and soup kitchens, provided the common folk with a proper and orderly life relatively free of exploitation at a time when Europe's peasants endured penury, exploitation, and incessant wars.

This exploitation also accelerated the accumulation of capital, however. The bourgeoisie developing in the burghs allowed the feudal society to evolve into trade capitalism. With time, the bourgeoisie reached an agreement with one of the feudal lords, acknowledged him as king, and thereby eliminated the influence of the other feudal lords as well as the church and enabled the country to unite around its king. In this way, absolute monarchy with a uniform legal system replaced the "manor." Law and order was easier to maintain in this united and relatively large land, so it became easier to engage in large-scale trading.

After this the European bourgeoisie opened up to the world. Intracontinental trade was too confining, and international trade was becoming difficult in the East as the Ottoman Empire gained in strength. The eastern trade had been important for Europe from the time of feudalism (the Middle Ages) because spices, which kept food from spoiling, were obtained in the East. In these circumstances navigation made great strides. At the end of the fifteenth century members of the bourgeoisie equipped their ships and set sail. Their ships discovered America (Christopher Columbus, 1492) while searching for India; Vasco da Gama found the eastern passage in 1497. At this point the Mediterranean had been transformed into an internal sea, confined to serving regional trade.

The economic doctrine of the age was mercantilism. In Spain and Portugal (where the bourgeoisie was weak) the pioneers of mercantilism were the kings, while in Britain, the Netherlands, and France it was the trading bourgeoisie that led mercantilism. As a consequence, Europeans colonized the Americas and the Far East and diverted their resources to Europe.

Within this process, Europe put an end to wars of religion with the Treaty of Westphalia, signed in 1648. By the eighteenth century the industrial revolution had begun, leading in turn to imperialism in the second half of the nineteenth century.

B. The Decline of the Ottoman Empire

While these developments (external dynamics) were taking place, the Ottoman Empire had reached the limits of its expansion; as the distance from Istanbul to the borders increased, problems of supply set in. The Ottoman expansion was bound to be effectively checked as Europe developed and as absolute monarchies emerged, based on national states (not yet nation-states) with a rational political and economic basis, and as expansion got underway in colonial empires, providing new resources that helped underpin the production of more advanced weapons.

The Ottoman Empire was based on the need to conquer new territories continuously. Both the sultan's share and the treasury's income expanded as new lands were incorporated into the empire, while the proceeds from individual plunder allowed the people (especially the janissaries) to live in prosperity. The Ottoman Empire was a typical "territorial state" (see Box Intro-13 in the Introduction).

As we have already seen, however, it was necessary to keep on expanding in Europe to relieve the internal pressure of the Turkmen/Alevi tribes. The Turkmen tribes of the Bektashi sect (Alevis of big towns) were being settled in the Balkans. When the expansion of the empire came to a halt, this resettling was no longer possible, leading to increased tension between the nomadic and settled populations.

In this period the unrest in Anatolia grew beyond İstanbul's ability to keep it under control. This came about because the public ownership of land, known as the timar system (prefeudal or "Asian mode of production"), was gradually giving way to private ownership and beginning to resemble European feudalism, which meant that it was losing its basic logic. That led to exploitation of the populace, which in turn led to unrest. As the exploitation of the Anatolian peasants, mainly Alevi Turkmens, increased, they started getting closer to Shah İsmail of Iran, who was still an Alevi at that time (he later became a Shiite). This naturally endangered the security of the eastern regions of the Ottoman Empire. Sultan Selim I probably undertook the expedition to Egypt and acquired the religious title of caliph in order to neutralize the efforts of Shah İsmail, who was trying to acquire a spiritual advantage by identifying himself with the revered "Lost Twelfth Imam" of the Shia.

When the external dynamics were superimposed on these internal developments, the Ottomans went into decline in two distinct areas.

First, European mercantilism melted down the golden objects of the great Inca and Aztec civilizations and put the currency thus obtained into circulation. This led to inflation in the Ottoman Empire, because it was not possible to increase the production of the raw materials now in greater demand by Europeans. That led to a scarcity of these commodities. The Ottomans tried to deal with the problem by banning the export of commodities in short supply. The result was increased smuggling and the loss of export taxes, at a time when the capitulations were also preventing the imposition of taxes.

Second, the shifting of world trade routes deprived the empire of income derived from the transit trade. True, the Ottomans sought to dig a canal through Suez and sought to capture the eastern trade route by dispatching the navy. But it was already too late to change matters. To compensate for the shortfall in income, a renewed effort was made to increase the capitulations (Box 1-4) and to base them on agreements, although to no avail. On the contrary, the capitulations did more harm than good to the Ottomans in the long run. The Ottoman economy was not designed to evolve into capitalism; if people succeeded in accumulating some capital, the sultan would have them eliminated on some pretext and confiscate their property. There was no room for potential rivals or contenders. Because of this fear of rivals, after Halil Paşa of Candar, the Turkmens were replaced by the recruitment of the devsirme (Islamicized Christian boys), who had no tribal affiliation. When the capitulations were added to this situation, it became impossible for the Ottomans, who were only starting to own their land, to make the jump to actual capitalism. Furthermore, Europe had entered the stage of imperialism. It was impossible by then for the Ottomans to develop autonomously in a world where cities like Manchester and Leeds were able to produce better-quality textiles more cheaply.

In short, while the West went from feudalism to capitalism to imperialism, the Ottomans went from the prefeudal timar system to the feudal system but were never able to evolve to capitalism.

Parallel to the social, economic, military, and political decline of the Ottomans, a growing exploitation fed the nationalistic currents in the western and eastern regions of the empire after 1789. The first stirrings were in the western regions, which were closest to Europe and to capitalism and therefore most open to nationalism. The eastern regions were to follow later. By the time the Unionists dragged the country into World War I and sealed the fate of the empire, the state had ceased to exist outside Anatolia.

To summarize, the situation at the time of Sèvres was as follows:

Box 1-4. The Capitulations

Capitulations are the economic, judicial, administrative, and other rights and privileges granted unilaterally or through agreements to foreign nationals by the Ottomans. The word is derived from the Latin word caput, meaning head, and signifies bowing the head or entering into a surrender agreement. Some examples are the right to set up associations in Ottoman cities, the judicial right granted to foreign consulates to settle legal disputes between foreign nationals, freedom to travel and engage in transportation and trade activities in Ottoman territories, the right to operate shipping in Ottoman waters, and so forth.

The origin of the capitulations was the wish of foreigners to enjoy the same rights and guarantees in the host country that they had in their own country. The Ottoman legal system was based on Sharia law, which also helps to explain the reason for the capitulations.

The first capitulations were granted by the Byzantines, the Selçuks, and the Arab countries on the Mediterranean rim. In this first phase the purpose was to attract trade.

The second phase started in the sixteenth century, with the discovery of the sea route to India. With time, these capitulations became an instrument of the European mercantilist policy. In 1740 they became a permanent fixture with the signing of an interstate trade accord between Mahmut I and Louis XV. At this time the Ottoman Empire was still a self-sufficient economic entity.

The third phase started With the "unequal exchange." The industrial revolution of the nineteenth century was to change everything, resulting in a qualitative difference between Western ar en 1900 en 1966, de decembra Establista en 1960, de la California de la California de California

Europe and the Ottoman Empire. The 1838 trade agreement that opened up Ottoman territories as a single market to European products was also a capitulation agreement. Export bans and state monopolies were ended. British traders acquired the same rights as local traders. The Ottomans began to sell cotton or wool instead of yarn and yarn instead of cloth (Sosyalizm ve Toplumsal Mücadeleler Ansiklopedisi, vol. 6, p. 1793).

The privileges of foreigners were gradually extended to non-Muslim Ottomans. The growing Ottoman debt combined with the capitulations resulted in the submission of the state to the Ottoman Public Debt Administration (Düyun-i Umumiye in Turkish), the granting of concessions to foreign companies (Box 1-1), and article 232 of the Treaty of Sèvres, establishing the Financial Commission.

Although a promise to abolish the capitulations had been made in 1856 following the Crimean War, the admission to the European Concert (the post-Napoleonic European status quo scheme of the victorious monarchies, planned at the Vienna Congress of 1815) did not suffice to eliminate them. They were abolished by Union and Progress in 1914, only to have them reinstated in a more extreme form in the Treaty of Sevres. The capitulations were declared "null and void" in article 7 of the treaty signed with the Soviets on 16 March 1921 during the War of Liberation. They were abolished once and for all in article 28 of the Treaty of Lausanne.

- 1. The world was under the control of European imperialism.
- Nation-states were coming into being, under the tight control of imperialism. Many of these nationstates were at one time under Ottoman rule and consequently antagonistic to their former rulers.
- In this process the Ottoman Empire saw its salvation in the preservation of the frontiers and administration of a multinational, multireligious semifeudal empire.

The Anatolia movement, however, which came about in these circumstances, saw its salvation in turn in eliminating this empire and replacing it with a thoroughly Western model.

II. THE STORY OF THE SIGNING OF THE SEVRES TREATY

After the Armistice of Mudros the first contact of Istanbul with the Allies occurred on 17 June 1919, when an Ottoman delegation was allowed to join the Council of Ten at the Paris Peace Conference even though there was as yet no draft of a peace treaty with Turkey. The head of the delegation at the council was the grand vizier (sadrazam/prime minister) Damat Ferit Paşa, the brother-in-law of Sultan Vahideddin. He made a tough speech in which he appealed for the preservation of the integrity of the empire and then read out a memorandum drafted in the same tone, calling for the restoration of the 1878 frontiers in the west and demanding the territory of Mosul and all the other territories to the Iranian and Russian borders. The Allies were astonished and furious over these demands (Helmreich, pp. 80–81).

After this the Allies held a series of meetings (starting with London on 12 February 1920 and ending with Spa in Belgium on 11 July 1920) in which they set out the terms of the peace treaty and then invited the Ottoman delegation to Sèvres on 10 May 1920.

The delegation was headed by the Speaker of the Senate and former grand vizier Ahmet Tevfik Paşa and included Fahreddin Bey (the minister of education) and Cemil Paşa (the minister of public works).

The terms of the Allies were communicated to the delegation on 11 May 1920 without any previous negotiation. Tevfik Paşa found the terms extremely harsh and declared that they were unacceptable, ending the deliberations. The Greek forces thereupon took the offensive in western Anatolia and occupied Balıkesir, Bursa, and Uşak.

Damat Ferit replaced Tevfik Paşa as head of the delegation. On Friday, 25 June, Ferit Paşa submitted the Ottoman response to the Allies' terms to Alexandre Millerand, president of the peace conference and prime minister of France (this response is summarized below).

When no response was forthcoming, the delegation returned to Istanbul on 14 July. The Allies' response, formulated at the Spa meeting, was in the form of an ultimatum.

Sultan Mehmed VI Vahideddin called a meeting of the Şura-yı Saltanat (Crown Council) at Yıldız palace, with the participation of all the leading dignitaries of the state. This council, presided over by the sultan, decided to accept the peace terms and sign the treaty.

A new delegation was sent to Sèvres, headed by Hadi Paşa (a member of the senate) and consisting of Rıza Tevfik Bey (also from the senate) and Reşad Halis Bey (the Ottoman minister plenipotentiary at Bern). The Peace Treaty of Sèvres was signed on 10 August 1920.

The Ottoman Government's Counterproposals to the Draft Peace Treaty

The Turkish Republic has always been severely critical of the Ottoman government and Ministry of Foreign Affairs for signing the Treaty of Sèvres and viewed this action as tantamount to treason.

The counterproposals of the Ottoman Ministry of Foreign Affairs dated 25 June 1920 (which originally appeared in the newspapers Peyam-ı Sabah and Vakit and were transcribed and published in Latin alphabet in 1977 by Seha Meray and Osman Olcay), however, demonstrate that in the difficult circumstances of that day the ministry gave a good account of itself and delivered an honorable reply.

It is well worth examining this reply, because it constitutes a brave episode in Turkey's past and also because it is an excellent analysis and appraisal of Sèvres, which helps in understanding the terms of the treaty.

The 34-page reply has two distinctive features.

First, in style the document displays no sense of abasement, submission, or pleading. On the contrary, the tone is dignified and at times defiant. The Turkish delegation used the same style at Lausanne. This style must have irritated the Allies, because their counterreply was in the form of an ultimatum replete with insults.

Second, in substance the document was truly noteworthy. The authors were obviously thoroughly familiar with the international events and developments of the time. The document was based on sound logic and solidly embedded in international law. All arguments in the document were supported by references to well-known Western authors, scientists, politicians, legal institutions, and principles. The intention was to produce an irrefutable document. (The same tactic was employed by İsmet Paşa at Lausanne: at the meeting of 12 December 1922 he produced long historical arguments laced with references to numerous Western sources, including Encyclopaedia Britannica [Meray, pp. 187-200].) The analyses in the Ottoman response were sharp, and the examples provided were striking. The document's approach was completely realistic. A clear distinction was made between what the Allies could and could not forgo. That is why there was no insistence on certain points, such as giving up claims to remote territories or the Financial Commission. But on matters like Armenia, Kurdistan, and İzmir the document proposed alternatives that would be least onerous to the Ottomans. Finally, the response contained certain specific arguments that were precursors to the Lausanne negotiations.

Introduction: The Fundamental Contradiction of Sèvres

In the introductory part of the reply, the fundamental inconsistency of the situation was explained by noting that "in the final analysis, the Ottoman Empire would be almost completely deprived of the elements of its internal and external sovereignty but would still be held responsible for fulfilling the international obligations imposed by the peace treaty."

The document described this situation as being in breach of the principles of right and justice, logically inconsistent, and legally abnormal and went on to say: "In fact, one cannot make provisions for the continued existence of the state and, at the same time, forcibly deprive it of the fundamental legal condition of its existence [its independence]. On the other hand, one cannot impose responsibilities while denying freedom."

A defiant assertion followed: "Either the Allies hold the view that Turkey [in the terminology of Sèvres, the terms 'Ottoman Empire,' 'Turkish Empire,' and 'Turkey' are used interchangeably] should continue its existence, in which case they must treat it as a free and responsible country disposing of the means to carry out its responsibilities; or they want Turkey to disappear, in which case they will carry out the terms of the treaty themselves without expecting that the party whose defense has not been heard will sign the document or cooperate with them in its implementation."

However, this latter course would definitely negate the lofty statement made by the Allies in the beginning of the draft, where they express the wish to see "war replaced with a deep-rooted and permanent peace." Nobody should imagine that a nation of 12 million people determined to defend its rights and its independence can be quickly eliminated in conditions of peace. To condemn a whole nation to bondage would be in complete disregard of the feelings of countries whose policies are inspired by exalted thoughts and freedom-loving principles.

The introductory part of the reply ended with a reference to the "right of nations to self-determination" and a description of its views on the responsibilities of the state and its "most fundamental rights." According to the reply, the Ottomans had to enjoy two preconditions to be able to meet the obligations that would be imposed by the draft treaty: (1) the right to exist and (2) equality. The document based the Ottomans' right to enjoy these two conditions on well-known Western sources.

Political Provisions

The reply cited the example of Istanbul to demonstrate how Ottoman sovereignty was being trampled upon. The capital city has eight different sources of authority (an absurd situation that the Allies themselves were perhaps unaware of): (1) the sultan; (2) the Straits Commission; (3) the military administration of the occupation forces; (4) the political commissioners of Britain, France, and Italy; (5) the interallied military committees of inspection and organization; (6) the Financial Commission; (7) the assembly of the Ottoman debt; and (8) the consular courts.

The reply did not fail to mention such oddities. For example, some states would have two votes in the Straits Commission, whereas the riparian power (Turkey) would not even be represented. With its own flag, budget, organization, and legislative and executive organs, this commission would have a sort of international personality but—not being a state—would not have to carry out the duties imposed on states by the covenant of the League of Nations, which would not be in keeping with its spirit. "Turkey's international status would be inferior to the status of the governments established in territories detached from the Ottoman Empire, because these countries would come under the mandate of a specific power designated by the LoN, and this power would periodically be answerable to the Council of the League for its responsibilities vis-à-vis the mandated territory. Turkey would not even have this possibility."

İzmir

The massacres and atrocities committed by the Greek occupiers in İzmir and adjacent territories were bound to embarrass Greece, so the reply gave a prominent place to these events. Long passages were quoted from the reports by the representatives of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, dated May 1919. There were also quotations from Greek commander Nikos Zafiriou's order of the day dated 16 May 1919 and his declaration of 4 June 1919. It was also explained that those who survived in the Menemen massacre perpetrated by the Greek occupying forces did so thanks to the intervention of British and French officers, who were identified by name and rank. Everything demonstrated that the Ottoman Ministry of Foreign Affairs was closely following events.

The reply also pointed out with convincing examples that the long-term objective of the Greek landing in İzmir (bearing in mind that Greece had also occupied all of Eastern Thrace except İstanbul) was to complete the pincer movement that would threaten İstanbul and the Straits. This was probably done to warn Britain of Greece's intentions.

Armenia

The arguments concerning Armenia were also based on international law and logic and supported with numerous quotations and footnotes. The Allies were reminded that if Ottoman interests were disregarded in drawing the as yet untraced southern boundaries of Armenia the result would be an Armenia with Turkish and Kurdish majorities. This argument was backed with statistics. In this way President Wilson's principle of nationalities was invoked, Armenia was threatened, and the Kurds were given a subtle indirect message. If we recall that the main reason for the Kurds' participation in the War of Liberation was the envisaged Armenian state, we must conclude that the message was not lost on them.

The Capitulations

Under the heading "Financial Provisions," the reply document contained elements concerning the economic capitulations that would startle many a Turkish reader today.

"The Ottoman government cannot accept the reinstatement of the capitulations, which would create unfair inequalities between the subjects of the state and foreign nationals and would constitute an important obstacle to the efforts to improve the condition of the state treasury." In other words, the reply rejected the economic capitulations.

On the judiciary capitulations, however, it said: "The Ottoman government accepts the establishment of a committee that would be charged with preparing draft judiciary reform legislation to replace the existing capitulations pertaining to judiciary affairs, with the understanding that it would also be represented in this committee. If any points of disagreement emerge between this committee and the Ottoman government, the council of the LoN will be called upon to give a binding opinion."

Thus, unlike its stance concerning economic capitulations, the reply did not call for the abolition of the judiciary capitulations but proposed judiciary reforms instead. From this it can be deduced that the Ottoman leadership understood that so long as the anachronistic legal system was based on Sharia laws, European meddling could not be prevented. The surest way to get rid of capitulations was through legal reforms in which Western legislation would be adopted. This is an important lesson for those in Turkey who opposed (beginning at the end of 2004) legal reforms made for EU membership.

B. The Counterreply of the Allies: An Ultimatum

Aside from a minor amendment according to which a Turkish member would be allowed to sit on the Straits Commission, the Allies were adamant. The Ottoman Empire was compelled to sign the Peace Treaty of Sèvres as it had been drafted. In those circumstances it had no other choice. The Allied counterproposal document of 16 July 1920 contained these abusive passages (Meray and Olcay, pp. 31–34):

The Great Powers are of the opinion that [by entering the war] Turkey has committed an act of deliberate treachery against the states that have repeatedly given proof of their friendship for more than half a century... By closing the Dardenelles, Turkey has prolonged the war by at least two years and has caused the Allies to suffer millions of casualties and material losses measured in hundreds of billions... Since 1914 the Ottoman government...has massacred eight hundred thousand Armenians and displaced from their homes two hundred thousand Greeks and two hundred thousand Armenians... When they rearrange the administration of the Straits, the Allies will not refrain from adopting whatever measures may be necessary to prevent any future Turkish government from committing new acts of treachery against civilization.

At the end of the counterreply came the ultimatum:

If the Ottoman government refrains from signing the treaty or, following signature, finds itself powerless to restore its authority in Anatolia and to enforce the terms of the treaty, the Allies, in conformity with the treaty, will review their decision and perhaps find themselves in the position of expelling the Turks from Europe permanently. By this counterreply, the allied Powers notify the Ottoman representative delegation that the Ottoman state has 10 days to indicate its final acceptance of the terms of the treaty and its intention to sign it. This period shall expire on the 27th day of July at midnight.

The Ottoman Government's Decision to Sign

As indicated earlier, the sultan called a meeting of the Crown Council (Şura-yı Saltanat) on 22 July 1920 to consider the situation. The first order of business was a reading of the minutes of the cabinet's meeting held two days earlier, which described the situation as follows:

Either the treaty will be accepted with all its harsh and dreadful terms or it will be rejected. If accepted, a diminished state within clear frontiers will survive in Anatolia with İstanbul as the capital of the Ottoman sultanate and the caliphate of Islam... If the treaty is rejected, the present strife in Anatolia would spread to the Marmara region, the Ottoman sultanate and Ottoman government would be brought to an end, and the Allies would take over the administration of the government. In those regions of Anatolia where insurgencies appear, the Allies would, as in the case of İzmir and Bursa, suppress the insurgency and transform their zone of influence into outright occupation, bringing about the final partition of the state.

The minutes also recorded that the treaty would have to be approved by the sultan, since the parliament (Meclis-i Mebusan) could not be convened.

After the reading of the minutes, the grand vizier, Damat Ferit Paşa, took the floor and declared:

Istanbul will be retained and the Ottoman state will survive thanks to the wise comportment of the sultan and the respect and trust toward his person entertained both by Islam and by the civilized world. If it were not so, the Ottoman Empire would run the risk of meeting the same fate as the Austrian Empire, whose existence came to an end. If there are any who would prefer extinction to survival, I will ask them to make known their views verbally or in written form and to sign the minutes. Those who do not take the floor will be considered to have expressed their preference for the survival and continuation of the state rather than its extinction.

Those who spoke after him voiced their understanding of the helplessness of the government and agreed that the extinction of the Ottoman Empire would be tantamount to suicide, which was the gravest of sins. The Ottoman Empire was compared to a tree: "as long as its roots held the ground, it would of course find fresh vitality." It can be said that this was the main logic of the opposition to the National Struggle.

In response to a question about what would happen if the treaty was not implemented in Anatolia, the grand vizier replied that it was imperative to put down the insurrections with all available means. Otherwise the Greeks would overrun Anatolia, and to allow this to happen would completely shatter the national honor.

Finally, the sultan asked those who approved the signing of the treaty to stand up. The whole council stood up except for major-general Rıza Paşa, who declared that he was abstaining. The meeting of the council had lasted an hour and a half.

We can now proceed to the examination of the articles, of the treaty signed at Sèvres on 10 August 1920.

III. EXAMINATION OF THE TREATY

The Treaty of Sèvres was signed almost two years after the Armistice of Mudros and over a year after Versailles. The reason for the delay was the disagreement among the Allies. In the first quarter of the twentieth century the West was attempting to solve the great issue of nineteenth-century imperialism, the "Eastern Question." But clashes of interests in the new circumstances were the cause of the delays.

The signing ceremony took place in one of the exhibition halls of the famous porcelain factory at Sèvres. The document bore the title "Peace Treaty between the Allied and Associated Powers and Turkey, signed at Sèvres on 10 August 1920." The signatories were enumerated thus: "On the one part...the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan... Armenia, Belgium, Greece, Hejaz, Poland, Romania, Serb-Croat-Slovene State, and Czechoslovakia; and Turkey on the other part."

Like all documents that aim to tie down the weaker party, the Sèvres Treaty is a long text with 433 articles (the Lausanne Treaty has 143 articles). The first part consists of the Covenant of the League of Nations, as in the case of all the treaties ending World War I except Lausanne. In addition, there are twelve other parts. We shall examine the principal ones.

A. The Frontiers

The Ottoman frontiers were defined in article 27 and the relevant provisions were contained in articles 27 to 35 (see Map 1-2).

Map 1-2. Frontiers of the Peace Treaty of Sèvres

The European Frontier

The frontier of the Ottoman territories in Thrace was considerably south of the presentday border, starting from Kıyıköy on the Black Sea coast and reaching the Marmara Sea immediately west of Büyük Çekmece, with even Silivri left out. In other words, the Ottoman territory in Thrace would be confined to just a portion of the European part of the province of Istanbul. Gökçeada (Imbros) and Bozcaada (Tenedos) were ceded to Greece (article 84), and the Dodecanese Islands were left to Italy (article 122).

Aside from this small Ottoman territory, Thrace was awarded to Greece all the way to the Marmara Sea, with the proviso that the Marmara coast (starting from a point west of İstanbul and including the Gulf of Saros in the west) would be considered the "Region of the Straits" and placed under the administration of the Commission of the Straits. Similarly, the southern shore of the Marmara Sea (west and north of a line starting on the Black Sea at a point between Şile and Kandıra through İzmit, passing north of Bursa, and all the way to the Aegean Sea and including the Gulf of Edremit in the west) would be under the administration of this commission.

The Asian Frontier

Under the treaty, the Anatolian peninsula appeared to remain Ottoman.

The southern border separating Turkey from Syria and Iraq was drawn somewhat north of the present line and reached the Mediterranean Sea at Cape Karataş in eastern Cilicia. Mardin, Urfa, Gaziantep, Osmaniye, and the entire Gulf of İskenderun were left on the Syrian side of the line.

The frontier with Iran remained unaltered. The frontier with Russia would revert to the pre-1918 border, with Kars, Ardahan, Artvin, Sarıkamış, and Iğdır once again detached from Turkey (article 3 of the Brest-Litovsk Treaty of 1918 had restored these cities to the Ottomans).

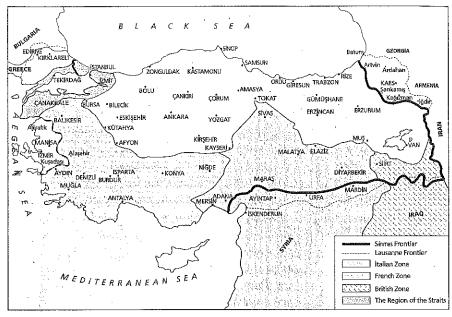

The small islands in the Marmara Sea and the islands within three miles of the Anatolian coastline—except for the islands ceded to Greece and Italy—were left to the Ottomans.

Map 1-3. Regions to Be Detached from the Ottoman Empire after Sèvres

But all this was far from reflecting the final disposition of Anatolia. Only on paper was Anatolia left to the Ottomans. Aside from a large swath of territory being put under the administration of the Commission of the Straits, Ottoman sovereignty in Anatolia was being compromised in three important areas (see Map 1-3).

- 1. Armenia: as we shall see when we examine article 89, the "greater" Armenia that was being contemplated would encompass a large part of eastern and northeastern Anatolia. The southern border of Armenia was to be fixed later by U.S. president Woodrow Wilson, while it would probably have access to the Black Sea at Trabzon in the north. That is why the eastern and northeastern frontiers were defined with the addition of the phrase "subject to the provisions of Article 89."
- 2. İzmir and vicinity: as we shall see later, the ownership of this territory was apparently left for the time being to the Ottomans. In fact, however, it had been awarded to Greece, and all the necessary groundwork had been laid to allow it to become Greek de jure in five years. (Actually, the secret Sykes-Picot Agreement had designated this territory as an Italian zone of influence. But, as already stated, Britain gave the Greeks preference, because Italy had ignored British and French interests in the Adriatic and the British would rather have an important region like İzmir in the possession of a weaker power.)
- 3. Autonomous Kurdistan: provisions were included that granted the Kurds living in territories east of the Euphrates River local/territorial autonomy, with eventual independence.

Map 1-4. Economic Zones under the Tripartite Pact of 10 August 1920

One Treaty, Three Maps

While on the subject of frontiers, reference should be made to popular maps published in Turkey showing the Sèvres territorial dispositions. In addition to the region of the Straits, Italian, French, and British zones of influence are shown in different colors in these maps.

The Italian zone includes (counterclockwise) Silifke, Niğde, Aksaray, Akşehir, Afyon, Balıkesir, Aydın, Muğla, and Antalya. The French zone includes Diyarbakır, Elazığ, Divriği, Sivas, Tokat, Mersin, Adana, and Maraş.

These maps published in Turkey are misleading, because they show the British zone as including the envisaged Armenia, reaching to the Black Sea. In reality, there was no such British zone of influence in Anatolia. As a matter of fact, Armenia was being set up in this territory and would naturally be under British influence. The same can be said about the planned Kurdistan. The Turkish-Iraqi border had not been defined at this point, however; since the British had not yet determined how far north the oil fields extended, it can be assumed that the British zone would extend a little to the north of the present Turkish-Iraqi border, to include areas south of Lake Van.

With the inclusion of the British zone of influence, these maps convey the wrong impression that in Asia the Ottomans would be left with only central Anatolia and the central and western Black Sea regions. This requires some clarification.

The Sèvres Peace Treaty contains no provisions regarding zones of influence. These zones are the subject of a tripartite pact signed at Sèvres on the same day as the treaty at Britain's behest. Britain wanted this pact because it was trying to repair its relations with France, which felt cheated over Mosul. It had been assigned to France by the Sykes-Picot Agreement of 1916 but was now being appropriated by Britain. Similarly, by the St. Jean-de-Maurienne Agreement of 1917, Italy had been promised Izmir, which was now under Greek control (Helmreich, pp. 193ff.; Olcay, pp. 543ff.; see Map 1-4).

According to the tripartite pact, none of the three signatories would seek to compete for investments in the zone allocated to another signatory. Furthermore, all agreed to support one another in any claim lodged against the Ottoman government. Each signatory would be responsible for the rights of minorities in its zone.

The Anatolian territories that the Ottomans were allowed to retain included the zones of influence from a formal and technical point of view. These zones were not formally ceded to Italy and France; they were, as their name implied, just economic zones of influence.

The existence of such zones, however, precluded the coming into being of a fully independent Ottoman state in these territories. The presence of zones of influence was proof that the Sèvres Treaty was not the final word but was being seen as a transition stage for yet another partition.

B. Political Clauses

1. İstanbul

The rights and title over Istanbul were to be retained by the Ottoman government under article 36, but the second sentence added this proviso: "Nevertheless, in the event of Turkey failing to observe faithfully the provisions of the present Treaty, or of any treaties or conventions supplementary thereto, particularly as regards the protection of the rights of racial, religious, and linguistic minorities, the Allied Powers expressly reserve the right to modify the above provisions, and Turkey hereby agrees to accept any dispositions which may be taken in this connection."

This phrase "Turkey hereby agrees to accept," which is tantamount to signing a blank check, is a special feature of Sèvres that we shall see recurring throughout the treaty.

2. The Straits and the Commission

Articles 37 to 61 cover the subject of the Straits. It was provided that navigation of the Straits would "be open, both in peace and war, to every vessel of commerce or of war and to military and commercial aircraft, without distinction of flag" (article 37).

A Commission of the Straits was to be established "to ensure the freedom of navigation." The authority of the commission would extend "to all the waters between the Mediterranean mouth of the Dardanelles and the Black Sea mouth of the Bosphorus, and to the waters within three miles of each of these mouths." When necessary, this "authority may be exercised on shore" (article 39).

Voting rights in the commission were not equal. The U.S. (if it was willing to participate), Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and Russia (if it became a member of the LoN) would have two votes each; Greece, Bulgaria, and Turkey would each have a single vote (article 40).

The commissioners would enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities (article 41), while the commission would have its own flag, budget, and separate organization and would exercise its powers "in complete independence of the local authority" (article 42). This would make it a state within a state.

In addition, the zone of the Straits would be demilitarized (article 178). The limits of the demilitarized zone were described in article 179.

On paper, sovereignty north of the Marmara Sea belonged to Greece and south of the Marmara to the Ottomans, but the zone could be used for military purposes solely by Britain, France, and Italy (article 178, paragraph 3). This meant that the zone of the Straits, including Istanbul itself, was in fact an Anglo-Franco-Italian zone of occupation.

3. Kurdistan

The Three Related Articles

Iraq, including the Kurdish-inhabited areas in the north, was placed under British mandate after World War I. The Kurds living in the territories retained by the Ottomans were given local autonomy under the Sèvres Treaty (articles 62–64), but the phraseology used left the door open to eventual full independence.

Article 62: "A Commission...composed of three members [British, French, and Italian]...within six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, will prepare a scheme of local autonomy for the predominantly Kurdish areas lying east of the Euphrates, south of the southern borders of Armenia...and north of the frontier of Turkey with Syria and Mesopotamia."

Article 63 is typical: "The Turkish government hereby agrees to accept and execute the decisions of both the Commissions mentioned in article 62 within three months from their communication to the said government."

Article 64:

If within one year from the coming into force of the present Treaty the Kurdish peoples within the areas defined in Article 62 shall address themselves to the Council of the League of Nations in such a manner as to show that a majority of the population of these areas desires independence from Turkey, and if the Council then considers that these people are capable of such independence and recommends that it should be granted to them, Turkey hereby agrees to execute such a recommendation, and to renounce all rights and title over these areas.

If and when such renunciation takes place, no objection will be raised by the Principal Allied Powers [Britain, France, and Italy] to the voluntary adhesion to such an independent Kurdish State of the Kurds inhabiting the part of Kurdistan which has hitherto been included in the Mosul Vilayet [under British mandate].

The Subject of the Independence of Kurdistan

As will be noted, the Kurds within the Ottoman frontiers were being granted local autonomy. Although the southern frontier of this autonomous territory was fixed, the northern frontier was indeterminate. Being the southern frontier of Greater Armenia, it was going to be fixed by the president of the U.S. under the provision of article 89. (As we shall see below, President Wilson would submit his arbitration to the Allies on 22 November 1920, granting Armenia access to the Black Sea.)

It was this unclear situation brought on by article 89 that prompted the Kurds to lend their powerful support to Ankara's liberation struggle, notwithstanding the granting of local autonomy and the added possibility of eventual independence.

Article 64 was noteworthy, because at first sight it could be interpreted as providing broad possibilities for the Ottoman Kurds. But the text was imprecise, and the granting of independence to the Kurds within Ottoman frontiers was contingent on two conditions being met.

First, the Kurds had to address themselves to the LoN and show that a majority wanted independence from the Ottomans. It was not made clear how this was to be done. The region had no experience with plebiscites in this region. If a plebiscite was to be held, it was unclear who would decide on its results. (When Ankara demanded a plebiscite in northern Iraq during the Mosul negotiations at Lausanne, Lord Curzon remarked that "the Kurds would take a ballot box for a bomb.") There was no doubt that any determination in this respect would be made by Britain.

Second, the council had to consider the Kurdish peoples to be capable of independence and call on the Ottoman government to grant them independence. Article 64 gave no indication as to what the criteria were for reaching such a decision. Bearing in mind that the U.S. had refused to become a member of the LoN and that Britain was in a position of great influence in the council, Britain would be making the decisions here too. Consequently, the fate of the Kurds was in Britain's hands. Whether independence for the Kurds was in Britain's national interest was a crucial question. For a country like Britain that had "no permanent friends or enemies, but only permanent interests" (Henry John Temple, Lord Palmerston, 1856), it was easy to switch alliances and adopt new positions. As a matter of fact, rather than facing the possibility of an independent Kurdistan coming under the influence of the French installed next door in Syria or seeing the Kurds under its mandate in Iraq uniting with Kurdistan and turning it into a stronger country, the British might well have preferred to see the Ottoman Empire, enfeebled by Sèvres, in charge in this region.

The phrase "no objection will be raised" in the last paragraph of article 64 is difficult to interpret but probably had the following function. For Britain, the real prize was the oil-bearing regions of the south (Mosul) inhabited by Kurds. It was assumed that the northern region (fractured by mountains, canyons, and plateaus) would not contain oil reserves. Furthermore, the topography of the area would make it difficult to keep the Kurdish tribes under effective control. For these reasons Britain changed its mind and decided not to attempt to bring these lands within its mandated territories. If oil was ever discovered in the northern Kurdish regions, Britain could not dominate these areas by having the independent Kurdistan of the north join the British mandate of the south. The British mandate of the south joining the independent Kurdistan of the north was plausible, however. By using the phrase in the last paragraph of article 64, Britain was probably trying to forestall its rival France from a possible objection to such a union.

In fact Lord Curzon himself defended this clause at the 19 April 1920 sitting of the preparatory conference at San Remo, while Prime Minister Millerand of France expressed his reservations on this issue (Olcay, pp. 465–67). Britain wanted to grant Kurdistan outright independence but was opposed by France, which felt that it had already made too many concessions to Britain over Mosul. So the compromise formula of autonomy was devised, which allowed for this region to remain within the Ottoman Empire (Helmreich, p. 22).

In these circumstances Kurdistan's independence was dependent on its being a British satellite. The Kurds had to be completely subservient to a major power as a precondition for becoming independent. This situation still applies today, with the U.S. having supplanted Britain.

4. İzmir

The subject of İzmir is dealt with in articles 65 to 83. The borders of the region with İzmir at its center started at Kuşadası in the south, running east to include Ödemiş but leaving out Alaşehir and Salihli, then north, passing to the west of Kırkağaç, then turning west to reach the coast south of Ayvalık. In other words, it included all of the province of İzmir and the western third of the province of Manisa (article 66).

Article 68: "[These territories] will be assimilated... to territory detached from Turkey." This clause revealed the ultimate intention of the Allies with regard to this region.

Article 69: "[These territories] remain under Turkish sovereignty. Turkey, however, transfers to the Greek government the exercise of her rights of sovereignty over... the said territory. In witness of such sovereignty the Turkish flag shall remain permanently hoisted over an outer fort in the town of Smyrna. The fort will be designated by the Principal Allied Powers."

Article 71: "The Greek government shall be entitled to maintain in the city of Smyrna and the [adjacent] territory...the military forces required for the maintenance of order and public security."

Article 72: "A local parliament shall be set up with an electoral system calculated to ensure proportional representation of all sections of the population, including racial, linguistic, and religious minorities. Within six months of the coming into force of the present Treaty the Greek Government shall submit to the Council of the League of Nations a scheme for an electoral system complying with the above requirements."

Article 76: "The Greek Government may establish a customs boundary...and may incorporate...the territory...in the Greek customs system."

Box 1-5. The Reasons for the Greater Armenia Project

The secret Sykes-Picot Agreement of 1916 made no provision for a Greater Armenia consisting of territory to be detached from the Ottoman Empire in eastern Anatolia and added to the existing Armenia. This enlarged entity never came into being, because of the successful conclusion of the Turkish War of Liberation (see Map 1-6).

By the Treaty of Sèvres and the subsequent dispensation of Woodrow Wilson, a Greater Armenia was created in the territories that were to be allocated to Russia according to Sykes-Picot.

Contrary to certain claims, the decision to create this Greater Armenia was not the Allied reaction to the Armenian deportations of 1915. If that had been the case, it would have been created under the Sykes-Picot Agreement of 1916, when the bitter memory of the deportations was still fresh. In this agreement the big three were concerned only with their own shares. The reason for creating Greater Armenia in 1920 was the Allies' wish to establish a buffer state against the possible spread of the Communist revolution that had taken place in Russia in 1917.

(B. ORAN)

Article 79: "[I]nhabitants of the...territory...shall be treated on exactly the same footing as Greek nationals. Greece shall provide for their diplomatic and consular protection abroad."

Article 83 of the treaty made the following provision for the de jure incorporation of İzmir and its adjacent territory in Greece. "When five years shall have elapsed, the local parliament...may, by a majority of votes, ask the Council of the League of Nations for the definitive incorporation in...Greece of the...territory... In the event of such incorporation...Turkey hereby renounces...in favor of Greece all rights and title over...the territory."

5. Armenia

The subject of Armenia is dealt with in articles 88 to 93.

Article 88 declares that "Turkey...hereby recognizes Armenia as a free and independent State." Article 89 (as previously mentioned) provides that "Turkey and Armenia as well as the other High Contracting Parties agree to submit to the arbitration of the President of the U.S. of America the question of the frontier to be fixed between Turkey and Armenia in the Vilayets of Erzerum, Trebizond, Van, and Bitlis and to accept his decision thereupon, as well as any stipulations he may prescribe as to access for Armenia to the sea, and as to the demilitarization of any portion of Turkish territory adjacent to the said frontier." Although the Allies left the decision regarding the fixing of frontiers to President Wilson, they were already giv-

Box 1-6. Negative Right-Positive Right

In human rights terminology, "negative rights" refers to the nonintervention of the state. "Positive rights" refers to state intervention necessary for implementation of these rights.

In minority rights terminology, negative rights are given to all, while positive rights are "plus" rights given only to disadvantaged groups in order to put them on an equal footing with the majority. Minority protection treaties contain both.

ing hints to him to make provisions for allowing Armenia access to the Black Sea as well as for the demilitarization of the frontier regions. Article 90 had the usual provision whereby "Turkey...renounces...all rights and title over the territory."

As stated above, President Wilson made his decision regarding the frontiers of the Greater Armenia on 22 November 1920, providing it with access to the Black Sea but considering it unnecessary to call for demilitarization. Thus Armenia would emerge as a creation of the major powers (Box 1-5).

c. Protection of Minorities

This question was the subject of a separate "part" (articles 140 to 151) in the Treaty of Sèvres, unlike the Treaty of Lausanne. This demonstrates the importance that the Allies attached to this question.

Article 140 provided that the stipulations contained in articles 141, 145, and 147 were fundamental and could not be altered by any law or regulation.

Article 141 was designed to ensure negative rights to all inhabitants of Turkey (Box 1-6).

Article 142 stipulates that "conversions to Islam... of persons who were non-Moslems before November 1, 1914," will not be recognized. This provision was designed to allow Armenians who converted to avoid the deportation order to resume their original religion. Like all the other provisions related to the return of Armenians, this provision is absent from the Treaty of Lausanne.

Article 143 relates to a special arrangement between Greece and Turkey regarding the "reciprocal and voluntary emigration of the populations of Turkish and Greek race." As we shall see below, at Lausanne this emigration was made mandatory.

Article 144: "The Turkish Government...undertakes...to facilitate the return to their homes...of Turkish subjects of non-Turkish race...forcibly driven from their homes...since January 1, 1914." Their abandoned movable or immovable properties "must be restored to them as soon as possible, in whatever hands it may be found." The "property shall be restored...without compensation... to the present owners." All acts of sale or any acts creating rights over property concluded after January 1, 1914, would be canceled.

These provisions regarding the rights of Armenians who had been deported or forced to flee to return and reclaim their properties rang alarm bells among the notables and especially the Kurdish tribal leaders who now held these properties. This provision is absent from the Treaty of Lausanne.

Article 145: "Within a period of two years from the coming into force of the present Treaty, the Turkish Government will submit to the Allied Powers a scheme for the organization of an electoral system based on the principle of proportional representation of racial minorities." Such a provision is absent from the Lausanne Treaty.

"No restrictions shall be imposed on the free use by any Turkish national of any language in private intercourse, in commerce, religion, in the press or in publications of any kind, or at public meetings. Adequate facilities shall be given to Turkish nationals of non-Turkish speech for the use of their language, either orally or in writing, before the courts." This provision was derived from the first postwar treaty for the protection of minorities, which was the Polish Treaty. It was also incorporated in the Lausanne Treaty in article 39/4 and 5 with one difference. Minorities may use their language before the courts only orally. Therefore all written materials in all public offices must be exclusively in the Turkish language.

Under article 146 the Ottoman government undertook to recognize diplomas granted by foreign universities and schools and to allow the holders of these diplomas to exercise their corresponding professions. This provision is absent from the Lausanne Treaty.

Article 147: "Turkish nationals who belong to racial, religious or linguistic minorities shall...have an equal right to establish, manage and control at their own expense, and independently of and without interference by the Turkish authorities, any charitable, religious and social institutions, schools." The same provision exists in the Lausanne Treaty, but the phrase "without interference" is removed and the adjectives "racial, religious or linguistic" are replaced by "non-Muslim."

Article 149 is a provision regarding the recognition of and respect for the ecclesiastic and scholastic autonomy of racial minorities, which is absent from the Lausanne Treaty.

Article 151: "The Principal Allied Powers, in consultation with the Council of the League of Nations, will decide what measures are necessary to guarantee the execution of the provisions of this Pact. The Turkish Government hereby accepts all decisions which may be taken on this subject." This provision is very significant, because it enables the major powers to interfere easily in the affairs of the Ottoman state. The Ottoman government agrees to leave the execution of this part of the treaty to the discretion of foreign powers. Important changes would be introduced on this subject at Lausanne, and in case of disagreement the International Court of Justice would be the competent organ to decide.

D. Military Clauses Clauses Relating to the Army According to article 152:

The armed forces at the disposal of Turkey shall only consist of:

1) The Sultan's bodyguard [under article 154, their number was not to exceed 700]; 2) Troops of Gendarmerie, intended to maintain order and security in the interior and to ensure the protection of minorities [under article 156, their number was not to exceed 35,000]; 3) Special elements intended for the reinforcement of the troops of gendarmerie in case of serious trouble, and eventually to ensure the control of the frontiers [under article 157, their number was not to exceed 15,000].

Article 153: "Within six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, the military forces other than that provided for in Article 152 shall be demobilized and disbanded."

Article 155: "The strength of the forces enumerated in paragraphs (2) and (3) of Article 152 shall not exceed 50,000 men." With the sultan's bodyguard, the total strength of the land forces would amount to 50,700 men. The armament and munitions that would be at the disposal of these forces were fixed in tables (article 171) and the importation of arms, munitions, and war materials was forbidden (article 175).

Clauses Relating to the Navy and the Air Force

Under article 181 all of the Ottoman warships were to be surrendered to the Allied powers. Turkey would "retain the right to maintain along her coasts for police and fishery duties a number of vessels which shall not exceed: 7 gun boats, 6 torpedo boats." The weapons that these vessels would be allowed to carry were clearly specified. Article 182 forbade the acquisition of other warships; and article 186 forbade the construction or acquisition of submarines.

Article 191 provided that "Turkish armed forces must not include any military or naval air forces...[or] dirigibles," while article 194 forbade their import or export.

E. Financial Clauses

Article 231 declares that the Ottoman state has to make complete reparation for the losses of the Allies but—recognizing that the country's resources were insufficient—waives the payment of reparations. (This humiliating phraseology would be used by Turkey vis-à-vis Greece in the Lausanne Treaty.) The last paragraph provides that "[t]he Allied Powers, desiring to afford some measure of relief and assistance to Turkey, agree with the Turkish Government that a Financial Commission shall be appointed consisting of one representative of...France, the British Empire and Italy, with whom there shall be associated a Turkish Commissioner in a consultative capacity."

The most important provisions of the Treaty of Sèvres, especially from today's point of view, are those relating to this Financial Commission. The responsibilities of this commission, which would hold the financial resources of the Ottoman state under its control, are enumerated in the following articles.

Article 232 states:

The budget to be presented annually by the Minister of Finance to the Turkish Parliament shall be submitted, in the first instance, to the Financial Commission, and shall be presented to Parliament in the form approved by the Commission. No modification introduced by Parliament shall be operative without the approval of the Financial Commission.

The Financial Commission shall supervise the execution of the Budget and the financial laws and regulations of Turkey.

A parliament's main function is the approval and supervision of the budget, so the Financial Commission was in a sense replacing the parliament (Meclis-i Mebusan) by the provisions of this article.

It will be noted that the budget was to go to the commission at the preparatory stage before it was submitted to the parliament. The same situation was restored in the Republic of Turkey some eighty years later, in June 2000. When the budget for 2001 provided for the payment of an additional sum to civil servants to compensate for inflation, the IMF announced that henceforth it would inspect the budget not at its "draft" stage but at its "preparatory" stage (Milliyet, 6 June 2000).

Article 233: "The Financial Commission shall...undertake...the regulation and improvement of the Turkish currency." This meant that it would be empowered to act as the Central Bank.

Article 234: "The Turkish Government undertakes not to contract any internal and external loan without the consent of the Financial Commission." In this provision the commission was encroaching on the government's responsibilities.

Article 236: "All resources of Turkey, except revenues conceded...to the service of the Ottoman Public Debt, shall be placed at the disposal of the Financial Commission." By this provision the Financial Commission took charge of all the state's financial resources, other than the sums set aside to service the debts to foreign creditors. The commission would determine the amount of the annuities of the Ottoman Public Debt (article 244), supervise the collection of revenues related to it, and appoint and dismiss the director-general of the Customs Administration. The schedule of the customs charges could only be changed with the commission's approval (article 246).

Article 239: "No new concessions shall be granted by the Turkish Government either to a Turkish subject or otherwise without the consent of the Financial Commission." In this way the commission was empowered to protect the privileged position of the current concession holders.

Article 247: "The Commission has authority to propose...the substitution for the pledges at present granted to bondholders...of other adequate pledges, or of a charge on the general revenues of Turkey."

Article 264: "[T]he Financial Commission shall also be entitled to authorize the application...to the nationals of the Allied Powers of any prohibitions on import or export."

Article 421: "The Turkish Government will, within 12 months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, abrogate the existing law on antiquities and take the necessary steps to enact a new law of antiquities which will be based on the rules contained in the Annex hereto, and must be submitted to the Financial Commission for approval before being submitted to the Turkish Parliament. The Turkish Government undertakes to ensure the execution of this law on a basis of equality between all nations." In this manner all nations acquired the right to forage the Ottoman territories for antiquities "on a basis of perfect equality" and to share out the findings in accordance with the rules contained in the Annex.

Provision for the repayment of the Ottoman Public Debt is made in article 241: "States in whose favor territory has been detached from Turkey, either as a result of the Balkan Wars in 1913, or under the present Treaty, shall participate in the annual charge for the service of the Ottoman Public Debt contracted before November 1, 1914." A similar clause was included in the Lausanne Treaty.

F. Economic Clauses

The Capitulations and Concessions

Article 261 restores the capitulations that had been abrogated by the Union and Progress Party at the beginning of the war. "The capitulatory regime resulting from treaties, conventions or usage shall be re-established in favor of the Allied Powers which directly or indirectly enjoyed the benefit thereof before August 1, 1914, and shall be extended to the Allied Powers which did not enjoy the benefit thereof on that date."

As we have already seen, the Financial Commission was in control of matters relating to customs.

Article 310: "Allied nationals and companies controlled by Allied groups...holding concessions granted before October 29, 1914,...in territory remaining Turkish under the present Treaty" would have their rights and concessions extended, but "all concessions and all agreements subsequent to October 29, 1914, and prejudicial to the rights referred to in the preceding paragraph shall be declared null and void." By this provision all concessions granted prior to the date when the Ottomans joined the war were restored and concessions subsequently granted to the Germans were canceled.

This is a summary of the main provisions of the Peace Treaty of Sèvres. As already noted, Sèvres was never ratified and therefore did not come into force. The competent organ for ratifying the treaty, the Ottoman parliament (Meclis-i Mebusan), had been dissolved on 18 March 1920 upon the occupation of Istanbul. Other than Greece, none of the Allied Powers completed the ratification procedure, because events were moving so fast at the time.

The most noteworthy aspects of the treaty were the recurring formulation "Turkey undertakes hereby" and the provisions regarding the Financial Commission. Two other aspects of Sèvres should not be overlooked either. The Allies dictated the terms of Sèvres without any regard for the great changes that had occurred during the two years between the Armistice of Mudros and Sèvres, and they also took no notice of the Turkish liberation struggle triggered by the occupation.

In addition, the Treaty of Sèvres, unlike the other treaties ending World War I, bore the appearance of a document designed to force the Ottomans out of Europe. There could be no other explanation for the harsh terms that were being imposed. The intention of the Allies (as emphasized in their counterreply) to "drive the Turks out of Europe forever" could not be completely carried out due to the rivalries among the Allies.

It was the harshness of the terms of Sèvres that made possible the War of Liberation in the difficult circumstances prevailing at the time and prepared the ground for the Treaty of Sèvres to remain a dead letter. This situation provided a vivid example of a thesis and antithesis relationship.

Relations with Western Europe

I. RELATIONS WITH BRITAIN

A. Basic Factors Determining Relations

Turkish diplomatic relations with Britain stretch back to the sixteenth century. The first British ambassador to İstanbul was appointed in 1583. But the Ottomans, in line with their usual practice, waited until 1793 to send their first ambassador to London.

The Ottoman Empire started losing ground to the West in the eighteenth century and had to rely for its survival on the major powers within the complicated European balance of power. One of these major powers was Britain. Until the last quarter of the nineteenth century the Ottoman state sought to preserve its existence by relying on Britain.

Britain's policy of preserving the territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire was based on the fear that its disintegration would allow Russia to expand to the Mediterranean and the Balkans and strengthen Russia. This was the essence of the "Eastern Question." This fear grew after the Treaty of Hünkar İskelesi in 1833, concluded between the Ottoman Empire and Russia. When the Ottoman-Russian war of 1877–78 ended in a Russian victory, Britain abandoned its old policy, because it realized that Russia had become so preponderant that its traditional policy could no longer preserve the territorial integrity or indeed the existence of the Ottoman Empire. Since the process of disintegration was now fully underway, Britain would try to apportion the major share and strive to preempt Russia. As a consequence Cyprus and Egypt were detached from the Ottoman state in the first instance. Britain also started getting involved with the Armenians. As a result of this parting of ways the two countries found themselves in opposing alliances and camps during World War I.

After World War I Britain wanted to keep the Middle East under its control, because it was strategically located on the route to India and because petroleum was becoming an important source of energy. Britain was conscious of not being able to do this all by itself, however, and did not feel it had to do so. According to its master plan, a weak and diminished Ottoman sultan in Istanbul who was dependent on Britain to survive, the presence of Greece in western Anatolia, the Armenian and Kurdish states in Anatolia, and the Arab sheikhdoms that would be established farther south would all ensure British preeminence and control in the region. In this way a barrier would be set up against Russia. Through the system of mandates, control would be maintained without assuming the responsibilities of direct rule.

The British Viewpoint

Britain wanted to control the Middle East, but it was running into difficulties. The first problem was the rivalry with France. The second was the promise of a single Arab Kingdom made to the Arabs when they were being encouraged to rebel against the Ottomans. In 1916 Britain agreed to share its control in this region with France under the Sykes-Picot Agreement. There was a second share-out agreement with France at San Remo in 1920. Finally, three factors caused bitter disappointment among the peoples of the region and made British control of the Middle East difficult to secure: (1) the failure to set up a single large Arab Kingdom; (2) the failure to carry out the promises to establish the Armenian and Kurdish states; and (3) the advent of the Balfour Declaration (see Box 1-25 below).

During this period Britain was also struggling with other questions. The first priority was to bring stability to Europe. This required the restoration of the balance that had been upset during the war. France wanted the vanquished Germans to remain weak, whereas Britain was not in favor of France becoming predominant on the continent. Its task was to rein in the French without confronting them.

Britain also faced problems in its far-flung empire, with freedom movements in India and Egypt. While labor unrest was intensifying in Britain, rebellion broke out in Ireland.

In these circumstances, with a government in Istanbul headed by Damat Ferit, who had declared that "his hopes rested, after God, on the British Government" (FO 371/4141, 40280, cited by Akşin 2004, p. 237). The outbreak of the nationalist movement in Anatolia had a profoundly disturbing effect on Britain. Both public opinion and the British leaders were blaming Turkey for having extended the war and made the Bolshevik revolution possible by closing the Straits. To this was added the aggravation of a nationalist movement that refused to recognize Sèvres. At first Britain failed to understand the nature of the Anatolia movement, assuming it to be a pro-Soviet political movement because of its contacts with the Soviets and the red bands that some in Anatolia pinned on their fur caps.

In the period from 1919 to 1923 an "indirect" war was being waged against Britain in Anatolia. Greece was the connecting element in this. Britain tried to use Greece, a country that had not fought the Ottomans during World War I, for its own purposes after the armistice agreement at Mudros by turning it into a tool to carry out its imperialistic aims. In this way Britain intended to replace Italy with Greece in western Anatolia, because Greece would be more compliant. But these plans were doomed to fail. When Greece—a former province of the Ottoman Empire—occupied İzmir, it aroused deep anger and brought on a violent reaction in Anatolia. Britain had unwittingly given an impetus to the Anatolia movement.

Although an armistice was in effect, legally Turkey was in a state of war with Britain. But as the Anatolia movement started to assert itself, Britain felt compelled to deal with this movement.

The Turkish Viewpoint

The Islamic factor was one of the factors influencing Turkish–British relations, especially during the National Struggle and all the way up to 1924, when the caliphate was abolished. At first the Anatolia movement claimed that it was striving to protect the sultanate and caliphate, in order to gain the support of the masses. Although M. Kemal was fully aware that Islam had not been able to prevent the collapse of the Ottoman Empire, he knew that the caliph-sultan had a special place among the public and therefore felt the need to use the religious factor for internal as well as external considerations.

This factor had a certain place in relations with Britain. After the war Britain claimed to be the largest Muslim country. In fact, a quarter of the population of the British Empire consisted of Muslims (the bulk being Indian Muslims).

Britain feared that an Anatolia movement with a religious bias might influence the Indian Muslims. Consequently, it wanted to take the caliphate away from the Turks. Meanwhile the Indian Muslims were persuaded that the struggle in Anatolia was being carried out on behalf of Islam, and they established an Indian Caliphate Committee to support the struggle. This committee engaged in fundraising to support the cause and also sent a delegation to London in March 1920 to inform Lloyd George of its support for the sultan-caliph and M. Kemal. Britain felt great concern over these developments, because a movement with Islamic overtones might well trigger anti-British unrest among Muslim subjects. As the Anatolia movement gathered momentum, however, the importance of the Islamic factor steadily diminished and its influence waned. Important milestones in this process were the abolition of the sultanate on 1 November 1922 and the caliphate on 3 March 1924. Religion ceased to be a factor affecting bilateral relations.

Turco-British relations in the years of the National Struggle were also under the influence of the Soviet factor. Whenever there was a rapprochement between Turkey and Russia in the past, Britain had been drawn into it. A rapprochement between Turkey and Britain had the opposite effect and resulted in Russia's distancing itself from the Ottoman Empire/Turkey.

Although the Anatolia movement had no ideological affinity with Bolshevism, both sides felt the need to cooperate for pragmatic reasons. Both Turkey and Russia were under the direct or indirect occupation of the West. For this reason, the Anatolia movement was compelled to make the fullest use of the Soviet factor in its struggle with the West and primarily with Britain. The frequent allusions to the anti-imperialist character of the struggle in M. Kemal's speeches and declarations are an example of this. Another example is the establishment of a Communist Party by M. Kemal's close friends in October 1920.

While engaging in contacts with the Soviets and using anti-imperialist rhetoric, M. Kemal did not fail to convey to the Western countries that the chief beneficiary of a partitioned Turkey would be the new Soviet administration. M. Kemal was striving to demonstrate that a strong Turkey in Thrace and Anatolia was to the advantage of the West. It is interesting to note that, just as the Bolshevik administration saw Turkey as a buffer against the West and was prepared to back Turkey in its confrontation with the West, Ankara was using the same argument to develop relations with the West, both at Lausanne and afterward.

The cooperation between the Anatolia movement and the Soviets was a source of concern for the British. Nevertheless, when the Turkish-Soviet Treaty was signed on 16 March 1921, London too was signing a trade agreement with the Soviets on that day. On that same day an agreement was signed between Bekir Sami Bey and the British authorities for the repatriation of Turkish prisoners in Malta.

As the Anatolia movement gained in strength, the Soviet factor started to wane. In fact, in subsequent years Ankara worried that the Soviet connection might prove to be an obstacle to developing better relations with the West and particularly Britain.

A general factor influencing Turkish-British relations was Turkey's efforts to Westernize. The difficulty was to establish a Western political—social—economic system while carrying out a struggle against Western imperialism. Westernization was also perceived as necessary for ensuring security. The Ottoman state was being pushed out of Europe because it was different from the West. Consequently, to become Western was not only a means to attain "the standard of contemporary civilization" (M. Kemal) but also a means to ensure security vis-à-vis the West.

B. Main Developments

1. The Occupation of Parliament

The heads of state/government of the Entente countries met in London on 10 February 1920 to discuss the Eastern Question and reached the decision to occupy Istanbul. The ostensible reasons were the unrest in Cilicia and the resistance of the Anatolia movement to the Western countries. But the real reason was that this occupation was deemed necessary to enforce the Sèvres Treaty that was being prepared at the time. The decision to occupy Istanbul was also based on the desire in some quarters in the West to eject the Turks from that city. At the London Conference, they also demanded that the Turkish government dismiss M. Kemal.

As a result of all this, the Allied forces, led by the British, occupied Istanbul on 20 March 1920. Following the earlier Greek occupation of İzmir, this event gave a new boost to the Anatolia movement. The communiqué released on this occasion declared that the occupation was temporary and designed to strengthen the authority of the sultan. This led the sultan to view the occupation favorably, but the raid on the parliament and the arrest of deputies by a country that had a high regard for democracy created an outcry among the public. M. Kemal also reacted strongly from Ankara and sent notes of protest to the occupying countries. He went further and issued an anti-British proclamation to the Islamic world and ordered the arrest of some British nationals in Anatolia. Ultimately, however, this event proved beneficial to his cause because he was opposed to the parliament meeting in İstanbul in any case. This gave him a chance to seize the initiative and convene the Turkish Grand National Assembly (TGNA) in Ankara.

The British removed the government headed by Salih Paşa, who was regarded as a sympathizer of the movement in Anatolia, and replaced him on 5 April 1920 with Damat Ferit Paşa. Although the British started making plans with the Damat Ferit government to crush the Anatolia movement, M. Kemal avoided a total break with Britain. Through his friends and interviews with journalists, he was sending messages to the British. In this way Britain was being kept informed about the nature of the movement in Anatolia and the significance of the National Pact. M. Kemal went further and sent the message that he was ready to abandon the struggle and cease cooperation with the Bolsheviks if an agreement could be reached. But it was difficult to persuade the British, because the messages did not go through official channels and the cooperation with the Bolsheviks went on.

2. The London Conference (February 1921)

From 1921 on, Turkish-British relations started to thaw, because of a reaction to Britain's policies within the British government. In addition, the Anatolia movement was gaining momentum. In the regions of İzmit and Gemlik the nationalists were beginning to challenge Britain's presence, which was causing concern in London. Furthermore, the successes on the eastern front resulted in the signing of the Gümrü Treaty in December 1920. This increased the prestige of the Anatolia movement and strengthened Ankara's hand vis-à-vis Britain. Finally, mention must be made of the first Battle of İnönü in January 1921, which constituted a turning point in Turkish-British relations. For the first time the Greek army had been checked. This event marked the failure of the British policy of using the Greeks without itself getting directly involved in the conflict. It was also understood that the Anatolia movement had passed from the phase of localized resistance to the phase of fielding a regular army.

At the end of this phase of indirect war with Britain the Allies met in Paris and decided to convene a conference in London with the participation of the representatives of the TGNA. M. Kemal gave a positive response to Britain's policy of easing relations with Ankara.

The conference was being arranged to make changes in the Sèvres Treaty. The invitation, which included the name of M. Kemal, was conveyed to Ankara through the Istanbul government. M. Kemal refused to accept an invitation that was made through intermediaries. Prime minister Tevfik Paşa sent telegrams to Ankara, proposing the incorporation of Ankara's representatives within the İstanbul government's delegation. M. Kemal also rejected this formula. Consequently, a delegation headed by the minister of foreign affairs, Bekir Sami, left for Rome via Antalya on 1 February 1921. Upon the invitation of the Italian minister of foreign affairs, Count Carlo Sforza, the Ankara delegation proceeded to London.

The London Conference opened on 21 February 1921 with the participation of Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and Greece. As previously agreed, the İstanbul and Ankara delegations acted in unison, to the frustration of the Western states, which were planning to play the two Turkish delegations against one another. When it was Tevfik Paşa's turn to make a statement, he ceded the floor to Ankara's representative, Bekir Sami. This was significant, because it indicated the strength of the Anatolia movement. But the İstanbul delegation also had an ulterior motive. In the event of a deadlock or the Ankara delegation's being forced to make concessions, the intention was to lay full responsibility on the Ankara government (Selek, p. 171).

During the deliberations the Turkish side called for Western Thrace's return to Turkey, the evacuation of İstanbul by foreign troops, the ending of the occupation of İzmir, and the restoration of Turkish sovereignty over the Straits. The Allies submitted to the Turkish and Greek sides a package of minor changes to the Treaty of Sèvres, including granting Turkey two votes instead of one at the Commission of the Straits and raising the ceiling on the Gendarmerie. But when the Turkish side rejected these proposals, which were far from satisfying the principles of the National Pact, the conference ended as a failure. As the Turkish delegation was returning home, the Greek army launched a new offensive in Anatolia.

Although no concrete results were achieved at the London Conference, it was nevertheless a success for the Anatolia movement, because Ankara had been acknowledged as an interlocutor and international public opinion had become more familiar with the principles of the National Pact. Furthermore, the differences among the Entente states had come into the open.

While the conference was going on, Bekir Sami signed agreements with Britain, France, and Italy. The drawback of the agreement with Britain was that, although Turkey undertook to release all British prisoners, the Turkish prisoners held in Malta would be released on condition that they had not mistreated Armenian and British prisoners. Moreover, it had been agreed that some of the Turkish prisoners in Malta would be tried outside of Turkey.

Bekir Sami had signed these agreements by exceeding his authority and without specific instructions. This provoked sharp reactions and drew criticism in the Ankara assembly, which resulted in Bekir Sami's resignation on 8 May 1921. He was replaced by Yusuf Kemal [Tengirşenk], who had successfully conducted the negotiations at Moscow.

An agreement similar to the one signed by Bekir Sami was signed with France, once again, in October 1921. At the time, the government of the TGNA was striving to get the National Pact accepted and was in no position to secure the TGNA's agreement to any concessions. The disagreement with Britain over the prisoners continued for a while. Although both sides tried to use this question for their own purposes, they proceeded with caution. Eventually all prisoners were released on 23 October 1921.

3. The Effects of the Turkish-French Agreement on Relations with Britain

As the administration in Ankara consolidated its position, its influence in the West, and especially in Britain, started rising. This was a consequence of the military successes registered at the second Battle of İnönü in April 1921 and the Battle of Sakarya in September 1921, when the Greek army's advance was halted. The diplomatic success achieved in March 1921 with the signing of the Treaty of Friendship and Fraternity with the Soviets also contributed to this development. In April 1921 Britain declared its neutrality in the Turco-Greek conflict, with France and Italy following suit one month later.

The military and diplomatic successes of the Anatolia movement were now leading to new proposals for a settlement from the West. The release of the Malta exiles and the signing of the treaty with the Soviets occurred on the same day. As the Anatolia movement scored new successes at the front, it became more receptive to the conciliatory gestures emanating from the West. In these circumstances the importance of the Soviet factor was diminishing. The signing by the Soviets of a trade agreement with Britain on 16 March 1921 also helped in lessening Turkey's importance to the Soviet Union.

The Battle of Sakarya clearly demonstrated the futility of trying to suppress the nationalist awakening in Anatolia through the instrumentality of Greece. For economic reasons and because of popular opposition, the Western countries were in no condition to wage war. That is why they were seeking a peaceful settlement with Turkey without getting directly involved in hostilities. In fact, even before the Battle of Sakarya the British had sought direct contacts with M. Kemal, although these contacts never materialized owing to interdepartmental disputes in London. But the fact that such contacts were contemplated demonstrates that Britain was beginning to take Ankara seriously. Furthermore, the British began to worry about their situation in Mosul and elsewhere. It should not be forgotten that between 1919 and 1930 the Kurds in northern Iraq revolted on three different occasions under the leadership of Sheikh Mahmut Berzenci, causing great difficulties for Britain.

One of the main political results of the victory at Sakarya was the agreement between the French representative, H. Franklin-Bouillon, and Yusuf Kemal signed on 20 October 1921. At the time, the Frenchman was in Ankara for talks with M. Kemal. During that period France was unhappy over Britain's European policies, which it considered unhelpful; there were serious differences over how to handle Germany. When France perceived that the Anatolia movement was making headway, it hastened to conclude its own deal with Ankara. The resistance that France met in southern Anatolia also contributed to this decision. This Turco-French agreement caught Britain off guard and demonstrated the success of Ankara's policy of playing the two powers against each other.

The British were surprised by the Turco-French agreement, but they were quick to draw the appropriate lessons and softened their stance toward Ankara. When the Italians evacuated the Antalya region in June 1921, the solid Allied front was shattered, and the British found themselves isolated.

4. From the Çanakkale Crisis to Mudanya

The government of the TGNA did not want to sever all ties with Britain, so in February 1922 it sent its foreign minister, Yusuf Kemal, to London and Paris to probe British intentions regarding an eventual settlement. The government wanted to explore the diplomatic option before unleashing full-scale military action against Greece in Anatolia. In London Yusuf Kemal tried but failed to persuade Lord Curzon to agree to the National Pact.

Subsequently the representatives of Britain, France, and Italy met in Paris in March 1922 and proposed a cease-fire and amendments to the Treaty of Sèvres. But Ankara insisted that Anatolia must be evacuated along with a cease-fire. The British did not meet Ankara's expectations, and no agreement was reached. In addition, there was a feeling in Ankara that the proposed cease-fire was a ruse to weaken the army's resolve and divert Ankara from its purpose of launching a clean-up operation.

After this came a standstill in Turco-British relations lasting a full year. During this period the minister of the interior, Fethi Bey [Okyar], made a private trip to London and Paris and conveyed conciliatory messages to the British. Although he was received by prime minister Raymond Poincaré in Paris, he failed to get the expected attention in London. He could meet neither Lloyd George nor Lord Curzon. It now became clear that the road to a peaceful settlement was blocked, and the decision was made to launch the general offensive. By that point the army was ready to undertake such a large-scale operation.

The success of the general offensive (26–30 August 1922) dashed the hopes that had been pinned on the Greeks and stirred anxiety among the British. The Greek buffer was no more: the Allied and Turkish armies were now in direct confrontation. With the victory over the Greeks, people in Ankara started debating the merits of pressing on with the advance and removing the occupation forces from Istanbul and then pushing into Western Thrace. The Turkish army that had liberated Izmir turned northward and arrived at Çanakkale, which led to the socalled Chanak crisis with Britain. At the instigation of the British, who feared that the Turkish Army would invade Thrace, the Allies landed some troops on the Asian shore of the Dardanelles. Lloyd George made a statement in which he hinted that Britain would not refrain from getting involved in the war if the Turks were to move into Thrace. The crisis did not lead to war, because the Soviets supported Ankara and the French and the Italians, not willing to confront Ankara, pulled back. Furthermore, British public opinion was not in favor of war. Another important factor was M. Kemal's decision to proceed with prudence in order not to jeopardize the newly won victory. The government of the TGNA agreed to enter into armistice negotiations at Mudanya on condition that the region reaching to the west of Edirne and the Meric River would be evacuated.

On 3 October 1922 İsmet Paşa met the commanders of the Allied Powers at Mudanya to negotiate the armistice. Under its terms, Eastern Thrace would be evacuated, while the Turkish army would agree not to enter Çanakkale, İzmit, and İstanbul before the inauguration of the peace conference. Thus, for the first time since World War I, the Turks entered into an agreement with the Western states on a basis of equality. They were also regaining a foothold in Europe.

One of the political consequences of this development was the resignation of prime minister David Lloyd George, whose Middle East policy had collapsed with the political and military supremacy of the Turks in Anatolia.

Britain's scheme of using Greece to throw the Turks out of Europe and to confine them within a diminished and easily controlled Turkey under the sultan had failed. The Ankara government had managed to assert its presence thanks to the differences among the Allies and the support of the Soviets but above all through victory over the Greek army on the battlefield. Thus ended the period of a de jure state of war with Britain and a de facto war by proxy. From now on, the struggle would be confined to diplomacy.

II. RELATIONS WITH FRANCE

The salient feature of relations with the French during this period was that France was the first Western state to enter into contacts and reach an agreement with the Ankara government. Unable to achieve its objectives in the territories it occupied in Anatolia as part of the imperialist partition, France decided to reach an understanding with Ankara for reasons that are examined below. This greatly facilitated Ankara's task.

A. The Bekir Sami-Briand Agreement and Its Rejection

By the terms of the Mudros Armistice of 30 October 1918, France and Britain occupied the southern part of Anatolia. When the British evacuated Adana, Mersin, Urfa, and Antep in November 1919, France extended its zone of occupation to include these regions. This caused a bitter reaction against France in Anatolia and led to Mustafa Kemal's protest against this action to the Allies. In response, the French high commissioner in Syria, Georges Picot, came to Sivas in December 1919 to meet with M. Kemal.

At the "unofficial" talks the French offered to return Urfa, Antep, and Adana if France would be granted economic privileges. Although no agreement was reached at these talks, the meetings demonstrated that the Anatolia movement was being taken seriously even at its very early stages.

When armed resistance broke out against the French occupation in January 1920, a French delegation came to Ankara and signed a twenty-day cease-fire on 30 May 1920. By signing this cease-fire agreement, France had recognized the TGNA government as a valid interlocutor. But when French troops landed in Zonguldak (on the western Black Sea shore) on 18 June 1920, relations soured once again. France sought to appease Ankara by claiming that the cease-fire applied only on the southern front. The French had their eye on the Ergani mines (in southeastern Anatolia) and pressed for economic privileges over them in all subsequent negotiations prime minister in January 1921. As explained earlier, the new French government had persuaded the British to arrange the London Conference in February 1921. After the London Conference, Bekir Sami Bey signed an agreement with Briand on 11 March 1921. Under article A of the agreement, hostilities would cease and prisoners would be exchanged. Article B provided that the "gangs" and the populace would be disarmed, by an agreement between the Turkish and French commanders. Article C dealt with the establishment of a police force under Turkish command with the participation of gendarmes and French officers, to be placed at the disposal of the Turkish government. Article F provided for the protection of ethnic minorities and the securing of their rights under full equality. This article also called for a fair distribution among ethnic groups of posts in the gendarmerie and in municipalities in districts with mixed populations. Article G assured that precedence would be given to Turco-French economic cooperation in the award of concessions in Cilicia and other regions evacuated by French troops. The Ergani mines would be exploited by a French company, and maximum scope would be afforded for French and Ottoman capital to work together. Article I provided for the preservation of French hospitals and schools. Article K stipulated that the portion of the Baghdad railway between Cilician ports and the Syrian border would be transferred to a French company (Kurtuluş Savaşımız, pp. 101–3).

It will be noted that the agreement not only granted economic concessions but also provided for French officers to remain in the region with police powers and for proportional representation of non-Muslims in the gendarmerie and the municipal administrations. In addition to these political concessions, the fighters who resisted the occupations were referred to as "gangs." Because of all this, the criticism of the agreement started even before Bekir Sami Bey returned to Ankara. Like the other agreements signed by him, this one too was rejected by the TGNA. At this critical phase, however, M. Kemal did not want to confront France. The Paris representative of the Ankara government, Nihat Reşat [Belger], issued a statement clarifying that the objections were not to the agreement as such but only to certain provisions and that new proposals would be forthcoming. At this stage Bekir Sami Bey was sent to France and Italy to ensure the continuation of the negotiating process (Tamkoç, p. 157).

Despite the rejection of this agreement, France continued to seek an accord with Ankara for the following reasons. First, the stiff resistance to the French occupation in the south (especially in the districts of Antep and Maraş) as well as the gains made by Ankara after the successes at the second Battle of İnönü and Battle of Sakarya led the French administration to conclude that it would be difficult to hang onto Anatolia. Second, France was faced with budgetary deficits, which were being made worse by clashes and hostilities in Anatolia. Furthermore, after the carnage of 1914–18 French public opinion was in no mood to accept further casualties in distant Anatolia. Third, France also sought an agreement with Ankara on account of its strained relations with Britain. At that time Britain was holding the Damat Ferit government under tight control, while pursuing its objectives in Anatolia through its Greek proxy. France, however, was directly involved in the conflict in Anatolia and was seeing its resources drained. France's main concern was Germany, and it was anxious to ensure its security against its eastern neighbor. In the prevailing atmosphere the French set up the Friends of France Association to rival the Friends of Britain Association.

Like the Italians, the French concluded that the best course to follow in these circumstances was to reach a deal with Ankara to gain economic concessions and privileges. By seeking a rapprochement rather than confrontation with the Turks, it would be easier for France to counter Britain's growing influence in the Middle East.

B. The Turco-French Agreement of 1921

Motivated by these concerns, France dispatched the chairman of the senate foreign relations committee, Henri Franklin-Bouillon, to Ankara on 9 June 1921. During his sojourn of two weeks in Ankara and his conversations with M. Kemal, it was possible to explain the objectives of the Anatolia movement and the principles of the National Pact. Franklin-Bouillon wanted to conclude an agreement based on the Sèvres Treaty and the previous agreement with Bekir Sami Bey, while M. Kemal indicated that no agreement could be signed that was not based on the National Pact. After the Battle of Sakarya, France became fully aware of the strength of the nationalist movement. On 20 October 1921 Franklin-Bouillon and Yusuf Kemal signed an agreement that had been negotiated by M. Kemal himself.

The agreement had nine annexes. The first article stated that "the Parties declare that the state of war between them is ended," while the second article provided that each party would withdraw to its side of the demarcated line within two months. Articles 7, 8, and 10 would be significant because of the Hatay question that would emerge subsequently. Article 7 provided that "[a] special regime would be set up in the Iskenderun region. The region's population of Turkish origin shall enjoy every facility for the development of their culture. The Turkish language will have an official status in the region." Article 8 fixed the Turkish-Syrian frontier, with the line reaching the Gulf of Iskenderun south of Payas, thus leaving the Sanjak of Iskenderun (Alexandrette) to France. This article also determined that the railroad from Çobanbey to Nusaybin would remain within Turkey but provided that both countries would enjoy equal access to this facility. Although Hatay was being left to Syria, a special regime was provided for the region, thus leaving a door open for Turkey. Compared to the frontier drawn at Sèvres, the new line left more territory under Turkish control.

According to article 9, "the grave of Süleyman Şah in the Castle of Caber...would remain Turkish property and Turkey would have the right to maintain guards and hoist its flag there." In accordance with this provision Turkey continues to maintain a platoon of soldiers and hoist its flag at this spot. Article 10 provides that "the government of the TGNA agrees to transfer the concession for the exploitation of the portion of the Baghdad Railroad from Pozanti to Nüsaybin to a French firm to be designated by the French government. Turkey will have the right to use the portion of the railroad within Syrian territory from Meydani Ekbez to Çobanbey for military transport purposes." Turkey took advantage of this provision to move soldiers through Syrian territory during the Sheikh Said uprising in 1925.

The annexed letters (which were later numbered by Ismail Soysal) provided more detail on some of the provisions of the agreement. Annex 1 stipulated that the government of the TGNA "is ready to grant the concession to exploit the iron, chromate, and silver deposits in the Harşit valley for 99 years to a French group that will establish a company in accordance with Turkish legislation. This company shall be set up in partnership with a Turkish company that will own 50% of the shares." It also expressed the hope that "the French government would authorize French capital to establish economic and financial relations with the government of the TGNA."

The second annexed letter states that "Yusuf Kemal Bey declares the need to allow the population of Iskenderun and Antakya to select a special flag that would embody the Turkish flag." The French representative promised to bring this to the attention of his government. The same letter provides that "Turkish nationals, Turkish cargoes, and Turkish-flag vessels shall enjoy full freedom to use the port of Iskenderun."

The third annexed letter drafted by the French representative states: "I consider it useful to indicate that, in the special regime to be applied in the region of İskenderun, those areas with Turkish majorities will be administered in general by officials of Turkish origin." The sixth letter provides that "French educational, health, and charitable institutions will continue their activities in Turkey without in any way or under any pretext engaging in propaganda or other action harmful to Turkey's interests or in violation of Turkish legislation."

The agreement and annexed letters did not mention the National Pact; nor was it possible to secure French consent to the abolition of the capitulations. Through this agreement the general outline of the Turkish-Syrian frontier was traced. This would be confirmed under article 3 of the Treaty of Lausanne and would be demarcated in a detailed way by the agreement with France dated 30 May 1926. The frontier would acquire its final form by the agreement of 23 June 1939. Starting in December 1921, France evacuated the Cilician region and transferred the administration to Ankara.

This agreement came into effect when France signed it on 28 October 1921. It is a very important document from the point of view of the foreign policy of the national struggle.

First, through the agreement reached by Bekir Sami in March 1921 Ankara had received de facto recognition. Now this agreement gave Ankara de jure recognition. This was the first time that a Western government had done so. Through this agreement the split among the Western countries also became fully apparent. The international standing of the government of the TGNA went up. Second, as France evacuated the southern region, it left behind some arms, which helped strengthen the army. Furthermore, a military delegation left for Paris toward the end of October 1921 to negotiate the purchase of arms. Third, the agreement would later have a direct effect on the outcome of the Hatay question. Fourth, after securing its eastern region with the Turkish-Soviet Treaty of 16 March 1921, Turkey was now securing its southern region too and gaining the use of the port of Mersin, which was linked by rail to the interior. After this Ankara's troops would be deployed to the main western front to attain superiority over the Greek forces. This agreement was to remain in effect after Lausanne.

III. RELATIONS WITH ITALY

Along with Germany, Italy was the last country in Europe to achieve its national unity. In the imperialist scramble of the early twentieth century, Italy had its sight on the Mediterranean basin. The driving philosophy of Italy's imperialist expansion was to regain the control of the sacred heritage of the Roman Empire, and its immediate objective was in the territory of the Ottoman Empire. At this time Italy was coveting North Africa, the Aegean islands, and especially Antalya and its surrounding region. To attain its objectives Italy attacked the Ottoman Empire and seized Tripolitania and the Dodecanese Islands in 1911. In the following year the Ottomans acquiesced to these land grabs.

After the outbreak of World War I, the Allies signed a secret agreement with Italy in London in 1915 to draw it into the war on their side and promised to give it a share in a partitioned Anatolia. When Britain and France divided the Ottoman territories in the Middle East between themselves, the Italians took exception to this. To appease the Italians, the Allies met at St.-Jean-de-Maurienne in January 1917 and promised Italy İzmir and its hinterland (see Box 1-23 below). When the İzmir region was given to Greece rather than to a major power like Italy at the Paris Peace Conference, however, the Italians were bitterly disappointed. Italy landed troops in Antalya in March 1919 and on the western Anatolian coast the following month, launching its short-lived Anatolian adventure. Still, its approach to the National Struggle was moderate, even going so far as providing it with direct and indirect support.

When Istanbul came under occupation, the Italians, along with the other Allies, had their high commissioner in this city. For a long time this post was held by Count Sforza, who was sympathetic toward Ankara. Even before the National Struggle was launched, Count Sforza had met with M. Kemal in Istanbul on several occasions. Thanks to these contacts, Italy was to understand the nature of the subsequent National Struggle. This give and take also enabled M. Kemal to be apprised of the intentions of the Allies. These contacts were facilitated by the existence of the Turco-Italian Friendship Society established in March 1920. Italy's Turkish policy developed under the influence of these factors and brought the following important gains for the Anatolia movement.

At the beginning of the National Struggle, Italy allowed the Nationalist Forces (Kuva-yı Milliye) to get organized in its zone of occupation and allowed the units retreating in the face of Greek advances to enter its zone. Italy was also helpful in procuring weapons for the Anatolia movement. The Italians sold their surplus weapons and permitted weapons and people to move from Istanbul to Anatolia. To this end, Italian ships were transporting weapons and munitions to Söke and to ports like Antalya. Italy also allowed the Anatolia movement to use Italian-controlled ports of Kuşadası and Antalya as links to the outside world. The British expressed their displeasure over this permissive Italian policy. The growing presence of the Italians in the southwest and especially Antalya, however, was becoming a source of concern (Soysal, p. 167; Çelebi, pp. 281–96).

With the convening of the TGNA in Ankara, contacts with Italy intensified. In September 1920 M. Kemal sent to Italy as representative of the Ankara government its first minister of the interior, Cami Bey [Baykurt]. The representative's office was ostensibly a press office, but it was also engaged in arms purchases. In addition, it was molding public opinion by publicizing the National Struggle in the Italian press (Tamkoç, pp. 155-56). During this period Count Sforza, the Italian high commissioner in İstanbul known for his sympathy to Turkey, became foreign minister. This appointment had a positive impact on relations. After this, Rome became Ankara's main channel to the West. As noted earlier, Count Sforza interceded to secure Ankara's invitation to the London Conference in January 1921. The Turkish delegation sailed from Antalya to Italy on an Italian ship and proceeded from Rome to London with a formal invitation from Italy.

After the London Conference, Bekir Sami Bey signed an agreement with Italy on 12 March 1921. M. Kemal alluded to this agreement in his Great Speech, but its text was never published. Only fragments of the agreement were published in Yusuf Hikmet Bayur's Türkiye Devletinin Dış Siyasası. From these fragments we know that in the agreement Italy promised to support the retention of İzmir and Thrace by Turkey. In return Turkey agreed to grant concessions to Italy in Antalya, Burdur, Muğla, Isparta, Afyonkarahisar, Kütahya, Aydın, Konya, and other regions to be determined later. Furthermore, the exploitation right to the Ereğli mine would be granted to an Italian-Turkish company, in which the Turkish share would be 50% (for the concessions promised to the French by B. Sami at the same conference, see "The Bekir Sami-Briand Agreement and Its Rejection" above). This agreement, similar to the one concluded with Britain and France, met with a negative reception at the TGNA. Its rejection by the assembly annoyed the Italians but had no other lasting effect. With the evacuation of Antalya in July 1921, Italy's occupation in Anatolia came to an end.

The war had inflicted heavy loss of life and brought economic hardship to Italy without providing any of the expected political or economic rewards. The postwar economic difficulties and the political instability, widespread labor unrest, and unemployment were feeding Communist and Fascist tendencies in the country.

In this political and economic environment the Fascist movement found fertile ground to develop in 1919 and resulted in the establishment of the Fascist Party (Partito Nazionale Fascista) in 1921. The adherents of this party, known as "Black Shirts," led a march from Naples to Rome in August 1922 and came to power in October. After this event Italy (now under the leadership of Mussolini) would pursue a foreign policy of acquiring the territories that it failed to acquire in World War I.

The first signs of change in Italy's attitude to Turkey appeared at the Lausanne Conference. Italy had agreed to pursue a common policy with Britain and France. At the conference Italy sought the demilitarization of the Straits, freedom of navigation, and the continuation of the capitulations under a different guise. But Turkey's real quarrel with Italy was over the ownership of the Dodecanese Islands and especially the island of Meis (Megisti). In the end all of these islands went to Italy.

Italy's policy toward Turkey was actually no different than the policies of Britain, France, and Greece. It sought to have a say and a share in the partition of Anatolia, obtain the right to exploit the coal mines at Ereğli, and acquire commercial concessions. The difference was that Italy sought to reach its objectives through cooperation with the government of the TGNA. It sought to gain its economic advantages from its evacuation of Anatolia.

IV. RELATIONS WITH GERMANY

The Ottoman state and Germany, allies during the war, followed different courses during the postwar era. In Anatolia there was resistance to Sèvres, and a new state replaced the Ottoman state. This new state followed a pro-Western, pro-status quo course. Germany submitted to Versailles but pursued a revisionist policy against the Western countries to free itself from the constraints that had been imposed.

In compliance with the peace treaties signed by Turkey and Germany in early 1920, their bilateral relations were at a low point. The Armistice of Mudros compelled Turkey to break off relations with the Central Powers under its twenty-third article. Article 275 of Sèvres read as follows: "Turkey recognizes that all the treaties, conventions, or agreements which she has concluded with Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, or Hungary since August 1, 1914, until the coming into force of the present Treaty, are and remain abrogated by the present Treaty." The Versailles Treaty signed by Germany contained a corresponding provision.

The only noteworthy events during the period from 1918 to 1923 were the effort of the Istanbul government to have Enver Paşa, Cemal Paşa, and Talat Paşa extradited—which Germany refused—and the attempt to purchase arms from Germany during the National Struggle.

During the National Struggle the main sources of arms were the USSR and Italy. The Turks also worked toward procuring arms from Germany, although this proved to be more difficult, because the Treaty of Versailles had placed Germany under strict controls and supervision. Nevertheless, twenty-six aircraft and other war materials were clandestinely bought from Germany using the 1,760,000 gold rubles obtained from the USSR in March 1921. The Turkish ambassador in Moscow, Ali Fuat Paşa [Cebesoy], wrote in his memoirs that because of the Allied controls and other impediments the aircraft and other equipment could not be delivered. But at the closed session of the TGNA it was revealed that these purchases were indeed shipped from Germany and arrived in Anatolia via the Russian port of Novorossiysk (Yaman, p. 147).

Relations with the Soviets

Until 31 December 1922 the official name of the country was the Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic (RSFSR). After that date it became the USSR (Box 1-7). The beginning of relations between the government of the TGNA and the RSFSR goes back to the restructuring of Europe following World War I.

In this process, tsarist Russia was replaced by a Bolshevik government that advocated a new system to replace the capitalist system (Box 1-8). In the summer of 1916 Russian troops had overrun Trabzon, Erzurum, Erzincan, and Van in eastern Anatolia. On 8 November 1917 the Bolshevik administration promulgated the peace law. On 5 December 1917 it signed an armistice agreement at Erzincan with the Ottoman Empire.

During the period of hostilities the Ankara government took advantage of all actors in the international arena. As a first step, in September 1919 Mustafa Kemal had contacts with American general James Harbord, who came to the Caucasus and Anatolia to appraise the situation. The conversations with the general related to the future of the Anatolia movement. This was the American dimension of the policy of the Representative Delegation (Heyet-i Temsiliye). The second move was the talks held with France and Italy, starting in 1921. Thanks to these talks, the clashes in the southern front were of limited scope and duration. Third, M. Kemal maintained close contacts with Talat Paşa in Berlin and Enver Paşa and Cemal Paşa in Moscow and Central Asia. These contacts, lasting until 1922, allowed him to keep abreast of developments in those places. The development of the Turkish-Islamic movement in Central Asia helped in determining the direction of the policies pursued in Anatolia. The most important partner of the Representative Delegation and subsequently the Ankara government, however, was Moscow. Before we look at the relations between the two administrations, let us examine developments in the RSFSR and the course of Soviet foreign policy.

Box 1-7. From the October Revolution to the USSR

The Bolsheviks overturned the tsarist regime and came to power on 8-9 November (26-27 October in the Julian calendar) 1917. In the Soviet of People's Commissars (Sovnarkom) they held the majority against the Mensheviks. V. I. Lenin was president, Leon Trotsky was commissar for foreign affairs, and Joseph Stalin was commissar for nationalities. The RSFSR was proclaimed on 23-31 January (10-18 January in the Julian calendar) 1918. The first Constitution of the RSFSR was adopted on 10 July 1918. On 30 December 1922 the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) was established with the accession of Russia, Ukraine, Belarus, and the Caucasus republics. Thus we should refer to relations with the RSFSR and other republics during the period 1919 to 1923. The first Constitution of the USSR was adopted on 26 January-2 February 1924. The Socialist Republics of Uzbekistan and Turkmenistan joined the USSR on 27 October 1924. On 5 December 1929 Talkistan attained the status of a republic.

Article 13 of the Constitution adopted on 5 December 1936 states that the USSR consists of twelve republics: the Soviet Socialist Republics of Russia, Ukraine, Belarus, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Georgia, Azerbaijan, Moldavia, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Armenia, and Turkmenistan.

I. THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE BOLSHEVIK GOVERNMENT

The foreign policy of the Bolshevik administration between 1917 and 1923 can be divided into two distinct periods: 1917–21 and 1921–23.

During the first period, when the RSFSR was trying to win the civil war, its main objective was to establish a window to the outside world. When the British occupied Baku in August 1918, Moscow found its southern outlet blocked.

At this time, many people were convinced that the revolution would spread to Europe. There were efforts to work with the eastern nations and especially those

Box 1-8. Bolshevik-Menshevik

The Bolsheviks were the group led by Lenin in the Russian Social Democratic Labor Party (RSDLP). At the second party congress, held in 1903, Lenin and his followers insisted that only professional revolutionaries should be admitted into the party. They won a majority of seats in the party's central committee and on the editorial board of the party publication Iskra (Spark) and became known as Bolsheviks, signifying majority. Their opponents who defended a social democratic party of the masses on the Western European model were known as Mensheviks, signifying minority.

After the 1903 congress the rift between the two groups grew, Lenin wanted to apply Karl Marx's: "permanent revolution in stages" thesis in Russia and claimed that the working class could lead such a revolution. The Mensheviks wanted to establish a liberal capitalist regime to develop productive forces and considered this an essential precondition for the establishment of socialism.

The Mensheviks sought to become a legal opposition after the revolution, but civil war and foreign intervention led to a sharp polarization. In 1922 the Menshevik opposition was suppressed, and many Mensheviks were exiled.

(F. KESKIN)

within the borders of tsarist Russia. The Soviet government launched an appeal to the workers of Russia and the Muslims of the East on 3 December 1917. It declared that it was repudiating the secret agreements aimed at seizing İstanbul entered into by the tsarist regime and endorsed by the Menshevik prime minister A. F. Kerensky after the bourgeois revolution of February 1917. The Bolsheviks promised to end the war, distribute land to the peasants, and grant self-determination to the different peoples of the country. They obtained the support of the masses with the slogan "Peace, bread, freedom." The failure of White Russian general A. I. Denikin in the south was due to his position on the issues of land ownership and nationality. Meanwhile the Bolsheviks were collaborating with national leaders like Mir Said Sultan Galiev (Box 1-9), Neriman Nerimanov, and Zeki Velidov [Velidi] and thereby gaining in strength.

The eastern policies of the Bolshevik administration had at least two dimensions. First, those regions within the borders of tsarist Russia were brought under Bolshevik control until 1923. This was done by cooperating with local leaders. Afterward the policy of cooperation gave way to a policy of Russification. The most significant reflection of this change in policy was the disgracing and subsequent arrest of Sultan Galiev at the twelfth congress of the Russian Communist (Bolshevik) Party (Box 1-10), held on 17–25 April 1923.

The second dimension is relations with the peoples

Box 1-9. Sultan Galiev and Islamic Socialism

In order to impose Soviet administration on all of tsarist Russia, including the Muslim peoples, the Bolsheviks cooperated with local Communists. The support obtained from the Muslims in the civil war against the White Army and the imperialist states was very important. Thanks to this support, the Soviet administration assumed control of a large swath of land stretching from the Caucasus to Central Asia.

The Islamic socialism idea propounded by Sulfan Gallev was based on nationalism. Because the colonialists exploited the colonials without regard to class, all colonial peoples were proletarians. Gallev substituted the Muslim nations for Marxism's proletariat and turned to Bolshevism to free "proletarian nations" from colonial exploitation and achieve equality. He was interpreting Bolshevism for national liberation just as Lenin had Interpreted Marxism for the Bolshevik revolution.

According to Gallev, the proletarian revolution expected in the West would only be possible with the success of the alliance of the eastern colonial peoples and the future Socialist State of Turan. This was one of the points on which he disagreed with the leaders of the revolution. While Lenin relied on the glad tidings of revolution in the West, Stalin (who was now in power) was bent on establishing a new state, expecting nothing from anywhere: He directed his full attention to building socialism in a single country—Russia. Under Stalin, all the Muslim leaders who had collaborated with the revolution, including Gallev, were liquidated.

Box 1-10. From RSDLP to CPRF

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU) was one of the forces that shaped the twentieth century. It was born on 1 March 1898 in Minsk as the Russian Social Democratic Labor Party (RSDLP). At the party's seventh congress, held on 6–8 March 1918, its name was changed to Russian Communist (Bolshevik) Party (RC[B]P). In 1925, it became the Communist Party (Bolshevik) of the Soviet Union (CP[B]SU). Finally, in 1952 it became the CPSU at the nineteenth party congress. In August 1991 its activities were suspended, and in November it was closed down. With the disintegration of the USSR, the Communists broke into numerous splinters but regrouped on 13–14 February 1993 as the Communist Party of the Russian Federation (CPRF). The CPRF is regarded as the successor of the CPSU.

outside the borders of tsarist Russia, most of whom were living in colonial territories. At the second congress of the Third International held in July 1920, the Bolsheviks secured the adoption of a decision to support all anti-imperialist movements without regard to whether they were pursuing proletarian revolution or not. There were two opposing theses at the congress. Lenin won the argument against Roy, and the decision was adopted to support non-Communist movements in eastern countries (Box 1-11). The first manifestation of this policy was the Baku Congress, held in September 1920 (Box 1-12).

The western policy of the Bolshevik administration from 1919 to 1923 was to profit from differences among its adversaries during the war and "peaceful coexistence" after 1921. The economic crisis confronting the Bolsheviks was the major factor that induced them to adopt the "peaceful coexistence" policy. The economy was in ruins. To this was added the 1921 drought in the Volga basin, which brought hunger and penury to the 25 to 30 million people living along the river. The Bolsheviks' hold on power was in danger unless something was done very quickly to redress the economy. To consolidate power and improve the economic situation, it was essential to trade with the West. In 1921 the war was at an end, and the situation was stabilized in the western border areas. The expected proletarian revolution in the West had not materialized. In this situation the Bolsheviks concentrated their attention on consolidating their hold on power. The construction of "socialism in one country" started in 1921.

As a consequence of this situation, the Bolsheviks issued a decree in December 1920 on foreign investments.

Box 1-11. The Lenin-Roy Argument

At the second congress of the Third International (Comintern), an argument broke out over the policy to follow in regard to the movements fighting imperialism in the eastern countries. The Indian Communist M. N. Roy argued that it would not be correct to support movements that were not pursuing proletarian revolution and that only Communist groupings should be supported. Lenin based his arguments on the absence of a significant proletariat among the Eastern peoples: consequently, all peoples and groups struggling against imperialism should be supported. In his defense of his thesis, Lenin enunciated the doctrine of the different stages of the struggle. In the first stage, power would be seized by an anti-imperialist movement that would change from being "bourgeois-democratic" to being "national-revolutionary." This would weaken imperialism and contribute to the revolution of the proletariat in these countries. In the second stage, the revolutionary forces in the country would join the government and share power. In the final stage, they would eliminate the nonrevolutionaries and seize power. It should be noted that this model corresponded to the revolutionary takeover in Russia.

In the end Lenin's argument prevailed, and Moscow supported the anti-imperialist movements in India, Iran, and Anatolia. In this manner the flow of raw materials from the colonies to the metropolises would be interrupted, an economic crisis would be induced in Western Europe, and this in turn would help return members of the "worker aristocracy" to their proletarian origins and help them to seize power.

By this decree they allowed foreigners to invest in Soviet territory. The New Economic Policy (NEP) was adopted at the tenth congress of the RC(B)P in March 1921.

Box 1-12. The Baku Congress of 1920 (First Assemblage of Eastern Peoples)

The First Assemblage of Eastern Peoples that was held in Baku on 1–7 September 1920 was an attempt by the Bolsheviks to intervene in the unsettled region stretching from Anatolia to Central Asia. The congress was organized and fully controlled by the Bolsheviks.

There are three views of the congress. The first view holds that the failure of Communist movements in the West induced the Bolsheviks to try to influence the Eastern peoples and bring about revolution among them. According to the second view, the purpose of the congress was to strengthen the position of the Bolsheviks among the Muslims and help bring them under Bolshevik control. The third view considers this congress to have been convened to influence the negotiations in progress with Britain to conclude a trade agreement. This third view appears to be the most plausible. After the conclusion of the agreement with Britain, the second congress was never convened. Nor were the decisions of the first congress ever implemented.

In addition to the independent delegations and Communists from Anatolia who participated, a delegation representing the government of the TGNA explained the goals of the Anatolia movement to the congress. Enver Paşa submitted a paper to the congress, which resulted in the following resolution on "The Turkish National Revolutionary Movements":

(i) The congress ... looks upon the Turkish fighters against world imperialism with sympathy... (2) However, the congress declares that the national revolutionary movement in Turkey is against foreign exploitation and that its success does not signify that the Turkish peasants and workers will be freed from all slavery and exploitation ... (3) The congress considers it necessary to warn against leaders who in the past allowed the toiling masses to be destroyed for the sake of a group of rich, high-ranking officers and permitted the farmers and toilers of Turkey to be massacred for the benefit of one of the imperialist groups ... The congress calls on all the toiling masses of Turkey and the east to support Turkey's national revolution and appeals to the Turkish peasants and workers to unite in independent organizations to block the intervention of foreign imperialists in liberation movements and to thwart them from exerting their influence over local rich bureaucrats, generals, pashas, feudal lords, and others... Only the defeat of all rich elements will prevent the governing clique from sacrificing the interests of Turkey's toilers in favor of this or that imperialist group. (Ataöv, p. 51)

Although the resolution was in the form of a reply to Enver Paşa, Mustafa Kemal looked askance at this congress and feared that it might attempt to direct his actions. The slogan of "overtaking America" came into current use. This slogan was to be revived in the 1950s. In his 14 April 1921 speech addressed to the Caucasus Republics, Lenin exhorted them "not to lose a single day in making trade with the capitalist countries the foundation of your economies."

The trade agreement concluded with Britain on 16 March 1921 was the first economic result of Russia's foreign policy. In addition to regulating trade and addressing the question of outstanding debts between the two countries, it signified that the two governments recognized one another. According to the agreement, the two sides would refrain from actions harmful to the other side and end all hostile propaganda. Furthermore, the RSFSR undertook not to engage in any military, diplomatic, or propaganda action aimed at instigating any activities on the part of Asian nations, and especially Indians and Afghans, that might be detrimental to British interests or to the British Empire. For its part, Britain agreed to refrain from similar actions among the countries that formed part of the tsarist empire that were independent at the time. In other words, the decision made in July to support national liber-

Box 1-13. Soviet Aid during the War of Liberation

An important dimension of the relations between Ankara and Moscow during the period from 1919 to 1923 was the assistance provided by the Bolshevik administration to the Anatolia movement in the form of military equipment and loans.

The breakdown of the assistance rendered during the War of Liberation was as follows: 39,275 rifles, 327 machineguns, 54 cannons, 63,000,000 rifle bullets, 150,000 cannon shells, gunpowder for 1,000 shots, 4,000 hand grenades, 4,000 shrapnel shells, 1,500 swords, and 20,000 gas masks:

Different sources are agreed that from 1920 to 1922 financial assistance amounted to 11,000,000 gold rubles and gold bullion worth 100,000 liras.

To get some idea of the scope of this assistance provided over this period, it should be compared with the size of the defense budget. In 1920 the assistance received amounted to 850,000 liras (converted to liras on the basis of 1 gold ruble equaling 750 kurus) while the defense budget amounted to 27,500,000 liras. In 1921, when the defense budget amounted to 54,000,000 liras, 4,897,500 liras were received. In 1922 the respective figures were 2,625,000 and 35,000,000.

In conclusion, the financial assistance never exceeded 10% of the defense budget. This assistance did not exceed the sums owed by Russia to Ottoman nationals: To understand the value of this aid, however, it should be recalled that the Russian economy was in dire straits during those years. It should also be emphasized that weapons and munitions were more important than financial aid. The assistance played the primary role in the development of bilateral relations.

(E. TELLAL) (Source: Müderrisoğlu, pp. 521–50; Yaman, pp. 138–49) ation struggles was being abandoned after seven months. Through this agreement the Bolsheviks gained time to consolidate their hold on power, while Britain was able to preserve the status quo by preventing the spread of revolution to the east. Accordingly the Bolsheviks ceased to support the Gilan revolutionaries in Iran as well as the groups struggling against Britain in Afghanistan and India.

II. COOPERATION: ITS REASONS AND AGENTS

Reasons

Ankara had the following reasons for cooperation:

- The principle "my enemy's enemy is my friend" was valid for both sides. Both were fighting imperialist occupation, and this was a powerful force impelling them to cooperate.
- Ankara did not have its own arms-production facilities, so Moscow was the chief supplier of arms and economic assistance (the exception is the arms left behind by France when it evacuated its forces in 1921) (Box 1-13).
- 3. By closing its eyes to Bolshevik administrations to be set up in the Caucasus, Ankara secured its eastern front, thus allowing it to concentrate all its forces on the western front. This was an important factor in ensuring ultimate victory.
- 4. The Bolsheviks were among the very first governments to establish contacts with Ankara. They recognized Turkey's independence and territorial integrity and by the agreement of 1921 rejected the capitulations, the first government to do so.
- At the London Conference, which met from 21 February to 12 March 1921, Ankara used Moscow as a ploy in its dealings with the Western countries.

Moscow's reasons for cooperating were the following.

- Moscow also adhered to the principle of "my enemy's enemy is my friend."
- A victory by the Ankara government over the Greeks, who were under Britain's protection, might trigger an awakening among the Muslims under Britain's exploitation.
- 3. A Turkish victory against imperialism would help secure Moscow's southern front. This would also ensure the establishment of Bolshevik administrations in the Caucasus, while bringing the Straits under the control of an independent Turkey rather than the Allies. Such a victory would also end Moscow's isolation.

- Good relations with Ankara would enhance Moscow's prestige among the Central Asian nations.
- 5. In the early stages of the relationship (at least up to the 1921 treaty), the hope that the Ankara government might follow a Bolshevik revolutionary course was also a contributing factor.
- Moscow realized that without resolving the Eastern Question the international system would not become stabilized, so it was ready to help solve it in Ankara's favor.

The Actors: Unionists and Communists

In the region stretching from Anatolia to central Asia the distinctions between communism, Turkism, and Islamism were not all that clear during this period. In the course of the power struggle that took place in Anatolia the Islamists used Bolshevism for their purposes, while the Turkists used Islamism and the various Communist factions used both Turkism and Islamism. The movement that prevailed in this power struggle was the one led by Mustafa Kemal, who made the best use of the opportunities in the proper historical context to achieve his objectives.

In the development of relations between the government of the TGNA and the RSFSR, there were two major actors: the Unionists and the Communists.

The influence of the leaders of the Union and Progress movement on relations between Ankara and Moscow can be evaluated from the points of view of Ankara, Moscow, and the Unionists.

From Ankara's point of view, the objective was to secure aid from the RSFSR by using the Unionists. At the early stages of the War of Liberation, Mustafa Kemal's links with the Unionist leaders had not been severed.

From Moscow's point of view, there were two goals. The first was to use the influence of these people in the Islamic world for the purpose of stirring up the Muslims of Central Asia and India against British imperialism in order to establish their own rule in these areas. The second goal was to use the Cossack cavalry intended to be sent to Anatolia to support the Turkish army and the Communist Party to bring about a power struggle between the Ankara government and Enver Paşa and thereby set up a Soviet government in Anatolia.

As to the viewpoint of the Unionists, their leaders, and especially Enver Paşa, were striving to gain the leadership of the anti-imperialist forces in Anatolia, but their vision was not confined to Anatolia. They were struggling for a Republic of Turan, encompassing the Turkic peoples of Central Asia (Box 1-14).

Box 1-14. The "Basmacı" Movement

It was difficult for Soviet power to become established in Central Asia, where the feudal structure and the Islamic faith were well entrenched. While some collaborated with the White Army, others started nationalist revolts against the Bolsheviks The biggest was the revolt that broke out in Turkmenistan. The word "Basmaci" was derived from basmak, meaning raid. According to the historian E. H. Carr (Bolsevik Devrimi [original title: The Bolshevik Revolution], vol. 1, trans. Orhan Suda, 2nd ed. [istanbul: Metis, 2002], p. 304), this label was applied by the people to brigands who lived outside the law in the hills. During the period from 1917 to 1922 the Basmacı terrorized the Fergana valley. They consisted of bands with little cohesion. The Soviets tried to suppress the Basmaci movement by using Enver Paşa, with whom they were in contact at the time. But, having sensed that the Anatolia movement was out of his grasp, Enver took up the leadership of the Young Buhara movement in September 1921. This movement was motivated by Pan-Turanian ambitions for Central Asia, and a big uprising occurred when it united with some of the Basmaci. Unity among the bands was lacking, however. The uprising was suppressed after several months of fighting, and Enver Paşa was killed on 4 August 1922. The Basmaci movement came to an end in 1934.

(E. TELLAL)

The strivings of the Unionists yielded no positive results, but they were used by both Ankara and Moscow for their own purposes and helped in the forging of closer relations.

As regards the Communists, it should be recalled that the October revolution had reverberations both in Anatolia and in İstanbul. From 1919 to 1921 the political movement with the highest prestige in Anatolia was Bolshevism. The members of the TGNA were attaching red bands to their fur caps. At first Moscow tried to transform the Anatolian movement into a Bolshevik one. On 12 September 1919 the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs issued an appeal to the "Laborers and Peasants of Turkey," which declared that the country's fate would be decided by the laborers and peasants fighting imperialism. In the utter confusion reigning in 1920 a "Green Army," part Islamic, part Bolshevik, was established in the TGNA (Box 1-15).

For its part, the Communist Party set up by Mustafa Suphi was making ready to transplant itself to Anatolia and operate from there. Ankara was aware of what was going on. İsmet Bey sent a telegram to Kazım Karabekir on 2 September 1920, advising him that the first official Soviet delegation to come to Anatolia to open an embassy in Ankara was more in the nature of a delegation coming to engage in propaganda and organizational matters. Mustafa Kemal, who was determined not to let his movement come under Soviet control, also took his measures.

Box 1-15. The Green Army

The Green Army is one of the organizations that appeared during the War of Liberation. Its program, consisting of thirty-two articles, was published in May 1920. In an atmosphere where nationalism, socialism, and Islamism were all intertwined, the Green Army was "established to prepare the ground for the inevitable cooperation with the Soviets by claiming that Bolshevism is nothing other than Islam put into practice" (Tunçay, p. 77). Among the basic principles of the program can be cited the need to fight imperialism and its local agents, land reform, and the democratization of the state structure. Its flag was the green banner. Among its supporters were eighty-five deputies in the TGNA who swore on the Quran and set up a group called Popular Caucus. Against Mustafa Kemal's thesis of "national sovereignty," the Popular Caucus defended the thesis of "popular sovereignty." A number of guerrilla groups, including 6,000 fighters of Cerkes Ethem (Ethem the Circassian), joined the Green Army. The Communist leanings of the Green Army also drew criticism, however. Although this criticism caused the minister of the interior, Hakki Behic Bey, to resign, he was replaced on 4 September by another adherent of the Green Army, Nazim Bey. As head of government Mustafa Kemal would not accept this appointment and designated Refet Bey [Bele] for this position. The Green Army then decided to disband itself. The members who refused to accept this joined the Turkish Popular Socialist Party (Türkiye Halk İştirakiyun Partisi), founded on the orders of M. Kemal to keep the Communist movement under control.

(E. TELLAL)

In a telegram dated 16 September 1920 sent to Ali Fuat Paşa [Cebesoy], he warned that "the local Communist movement would result in absolute Russian control and was contrary to the national interest. The secret Communist organization must be stopped and sent away." On 18 October 1920 M. Kemal established the Turkish Communist Party, under his control. After the killing of Mustafa Suphi in January 1921, he gained control of the political process. With Mustafa Suphi's death and the signing of the 1921 treaty, Moscow's attempt to bring Anatolia under Bolshevik control came to an end. In 1922 communism was declared illegal and the Communist Party closed down.

III. THE DEVELOPMENT OF RELATIONS

Political relations between the government of the TGNA and the RSFSR government were established on 3 June 1920. The negotiations undertaken by the TGNA delegations that went to Moscow in the summer of 1920 and the winter of 1921 resulted in the signing on 16 March 1921 of the Treaty of Friendship and Fraternity. Developments in the Caucasus until the end of 1921 played a major role in the establishment of relations.

After the October Revolution an armistice agreement was signed in Erzincan on 5 December 1917. This was followed by the Brest-Litovsk Peace Treaty, signed on 3 March 1918. Article 3 of the treaty provided that the Russian state shall evacuate the eastern provinces of Anatolia and secure their orderly return to the Ottoman government.

The Sancaks of Ardahan, Kars, and Batum will also be evacuated without delay. The Russian state will not interfere with their new status under international law and will allow the populations of these sancaks to determine their status by agreement with the neighboring states [at that time Armenia, Georgia, and Azerbaijan were being established] and especially with the Ottoman state.

In this manner the three provinces of Kars, Ardahan, and Batum were ceded to the Ottomans on condition that their populations agreed to this. The Russian armies in the Caucasus were demobilized, resulting in a huge power vacuum. The Mensheviks in Georgia, the Musavat (Egalitarian) movement in Azerbaijan, and the Tashnak Party in Armenia profited from the power vacuum and declared independent states in May 1918. The Ottomans pursued an expansionist policy in the region, but defeat and the Mudros Armistice brought this policy to an end. Starting in 1918, the struggle for power in the region led to various short-term alliances. These alliances depended on common interests, were not based on written agreements, and shifted according to circumstances and needs.

In the first group were the Unionist-Musavat alliance and the imperialist Tashnak-Menshevik alliance. Their common trait was that they were anti-Bolshevik. During the Ottoman period and afterward the Unionist Paşas acted in unison with the Musavat movement of Azerbaijan in order to establish Turkish-Islamic supremacy in the region, which would later embrace all of Turkistan. At times they had the support of the anti-Bolshevik Mensheviks and the imperialists. On some occasions the imperialist forces used the Tashnaks and the Mensheviks to establish a "Caucasus Wall" that would separate Moscow and Ankara (Box 1-16).

A second alliance was between Moscow and the Armenians. As in the case of their alliance with the imperialists, the Armenians were also after territorial gains in their alliance with Moscow. The expected territorial gains would be in eastern Anatolia. As for Moscow, it was intent on holding onto this vitally important region, rich in

Box 1-16. The Caucasus Wall

It was important for the governments of the RSFSR and the TGNA in their formative period to gain supremacy in the Caucasus region. After the Mudros armistice, British units established a presence in Baku and Batum in late 1918 and thereby took control of the Batum-Baku railroad. This meant that the British had established a corridor from the Black Sea to the Caspian Sea. With this "wall," they were able to check the advance of the forces under Karabekir into the Caucasus. They were also preventing the Bolsheviks' expansion by cutting off their energy supplies. With the occupation of the Straits, aid could be directed at the White Army, creating further difficulties for the Bolsheviks.

But the British were not able to prevent rifts among the regional states: Azerbaijan, Georgia, and Armenia. General Denikin's White Army was also seeking to bring the region under its control. In the face of growing domestic opposition the British concluded that they could not maintain their presence. Their evacuation started in March 1919, and by the end of the year only a small garrison remained in Batum.

After the British evacuation there were attempts to establish independent states under Allied protection. This was harmful to both the Bolsheviks and the Anatolia movement. The government of the TGNA gave the Bolsheviks the greenlight to establish control in the region, because it would not be possible to pursue the struggle in Anatolia without securing the eastern front. Furthermore, independent states would be obstacles to receiving military and financial assistance from the Bolsheviks.

With the convening of the TGNA on 23 April 1920 and the subsequent establishment of relations and cooperation with Moscow, the Caucasus Wall was in effect demolished. The first wall had been harmful to Ankara. But the establishment of the "Second Caucasus Wall" after the disintegration of the USSR in 1991 would bring Ankara great benefits by eliminating the common border with Russia and by allowing direct links with the Caucasus and Central Asia and access to the energy resources of these regions.

energy resources and industries, by imposing Bolshevik control.

The third alliance was between Moscow and Ankara. The parties in this alliance were struggling against imperialism while striving to demolish the Caucasus Wall.

A. The Establishment of Relations and the TGNA's First Delegation

Relations were established between Turkey and Russia when fighting broke out in Anatolia in 1919. The Bolsheviks followed the Anatolia movement from its very beginning and established relations with both the Unionists in Istanbul and the nationalist forces in Anatolia. A Soviet delegation headed by Col. S.M. Buduyeni met Mustafa Kemal when he was at Havza near Samsun (May 1919). As already noted, on 13 September 1919, two days after the congress of Sivas, the commissar for foreign affairs, G. V. Chicherin, issued an "Appeal to Turkish Laborers and Peasants," which declared that the fate of the country was in the hands of the workers and peasants fighting imperialism. Moscow dispatched the commander of the Bolshevik armies in the Caucasus to Istanbul to report on the state of the Ottoman Empire. The commander contacted the organization of the nationalist forces in Istanbul to inform it that Moscow would recognize Turkish national rights and provide support as well as material assistance.

After 23 April 1920 Ankara had an assembly and its government but no arms or financial means to pursue the struggle. The first decision of the TGNA in the field of foreign affairs, on 26 April, was to send a delegation to Moscow to seek aid and to preempt the efforts of the Unionist leaders, who were already in Moscow attempting to influence the Bolshevik government. The decision was entitled "First Proposal to the Moscow Government from the TGNA" and bore the signature of Mustafa Kemal. It consisted of the following text:

- We agree to work and act together with the Bolshevik Russians who are struggling against imperialist governments and striving for the liberation of the downtrodden people suffering under the domination and exploitation of these governments.
- 2. If the Bolsheviks move their forces into Georgia or secure the adhesion of Georgia to the Bolshevik union through political or other means and instigate Georgia to move against the British forces, the Turkish government commits itself to take military action against the imperialist Armenian government and secure the inclusion of Azerbaijan in the group of Bolshevik states.
- 3. The Russian Soviet Republic is requested to provide, as a first installment, five million gold rubles and ammunition, military equipment, and medical supplies in amounts sufficient to expel the imperialist powers occupying our national territory and subsequently to prepare our forces for the future common struggle against imperialism. Also requested are food supplies for the exclusive use of the army in its eastern campaigns. (Yerasimos, p. 232)

With this decision the TGNA agreed to cooperate with the Bolshevik Russians, undertook to secure the inclusion of Azerbaijan in the group of Bolshevik states, and, in return, requested 5 million gold rubles and military and food supplies.

Chicherin, the people's commissar for foreign affairs of the RSFSR, replied to this proposal on 2 June in these terms:

The Soviet Russian government is pleased to learn the basic principles of the foreign policy of the Turkish government of Ankara's Grand National Assembly. These principles are (1) The assertion of Turkey's independence. (2) The attachment of all incontestably Turkish territories to Turkey... (4) In accordance with the decision of the GNA, the recognition by Turkey of the right of self-determination of all the peoples of Turkish Armenia, Kurdistan, Lazistan, the Batum region, Eastern Thrace, and all territories where Turks and Arabs cohabit... (5)...[t]he recognition of all the rights of national minorities. (6) The submission of the question of the Straits to a conference of the Black Sea riparian states for its resolution. (7) The abolition of the financial control of foreign states along with the capitulations. (Yerasimos, pp. 238–39)

By his reply, Chicherin not only was agreeing to establish relations and to cooperate but also was stressing the right to self-determination of the inhabitants of Anatolia and the need to solve the question of the Straits at a conference of Black Sea states. This correspondence marks the beginning of political relations between the two new administrations.

After this decision of the TGNA the first government came into being on 3 May 1920. Bekir Sami Bey became minister of foreign affairs. The delegation that was to leave for Moscow on 8 May 1920 was given a brief that contained two important points:

(2) Turkey aspires to enjoy full internal and external independence within its present national borders and if this basic aspiration is supported, Turkey is ready to unite its destiny and future with Russia... (4) Navigation through the Straits will be free for all Black Sea states. To secure this, no fortifications would be built on the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles fortifications would be defended conjointly with Russia, on the understanding that the Russian navy comes to Istanbul at our discretion and request. To insist on the Russians' holding the Dardanelles fortifications by themselves or the Russian navy coming to Istanbul at its own discretion would negate the principle of Istanbul being under Turkish control. It is obviously preferable to secure freedom of navigation through the Straits for Russia exclusively through an agreement or to deal with the defense and control of the Straits as the common concern of all Black Sea countries. (Yerasimos, p. 233)

In other words, the brief states "the present national borders" instead of National Pact borders. This was a sign that Batum would be given up. It also accepts that the question of the Straits concerns all of the Black Sea states, with the defense of the Dardanelles being undertaken jointly in case of need. This position was abandoned at Lausanne. These two points reveal how claims and negotiating positions can change according to circumstances. Through this delegation, direct communication was being established with Moscow, and the influence of the Unionists on relations was being reduced. With the conclusion of an agreement, it was expected that the speedy flow of aid would start.

At that juncture a group of deputies in the TGNA came out against establishing relations with the Bolsheviks. At a closed session, Mustafa Kemal reassured them by declaring that "we must not confuse two different issues: to become Bolshevik and to enter an alliance with Bolsheviks. We the members of the government are talking about an alliance with Bolshevik Russia. We have no intention of becoming Bolsheviks" (Borak, p. 89). The delegation was headed by Bekir Sami Bey. Other members were the minister of economy, Yusuf Kemal Bey [Tengirşenk]; Col. Dr. İbrahim Tali Bey [Öngören]; the deputy from Lazistan, Osman Bey; and Staff Lt. Col. Seyfi Bey [Düzgören]. The delegation left for Moscow on 11 May 1920, the day when the Allies submitted the draft of the Sèvres Treaty to the Ottoman government.

The road through the Caucasus being closed, the delegation sailed from Trabzon and, after crossing the Black Sea, reached Moscow after an arduous journey of sixtynine days, on 19 July (Box 1-17).

The delegation was received by Chicherin and his Armenian deputy L. M. Karahan on 24 July. At this meeting a question of representation emerged. At the time, Cemal Paşa and Halil Paşa were in Moscow, and the necessary principles had been established with them. Bekir Sami Bey reminded the Russians that they were the first delegation to arrive in Moscow representing the TGNA government; consequently, these generals could only have spoken as private individuals. Either they had claimed to be representing the Anatolia movement and the Soviets had failed to understand who spoke for whom in those chaotic circumstances or the Russians were using them as a ploy to strengthen their hand in the negotiations. On the same day, a separate meeting was held with Karahan, at which the Turkish side asked that the direct road, which had been closed by the Armenians, be reopened to allow the flow of aid. Turkey was seeking to eliminate the "Caucasus Wall."

The RSFSR was actually seeking the same objective, but without letting Turkey acquire a foothold in this region. Russia wanted to accomplish this through the destruction of the Menshevik administrations in the Caucasus. It succeeded when the Red Army entered Azerbaijan on 28 April and the Bolsheviks took over. At the meeting Karahan reported that the Armenian road would be opened without resorting to force. He also indicated that a ton of gold had been sent to Ankara by courier. This gold was confiscated by Armenia, and its fate remains unknown to this day.

The delegation had another meeting with Karahan on 4 August and with Chicherin on 13 August. The delegation was received by Lenin the next day, and on 24 August a friendship agreement was initialed. But the negotiations kept dragging on for three reasons.

First, the RSFSR was gradually imposing itself in the Caucasus. Azerbaijan had already become Bolshevik. In May and June of 1920 Bolshevik revolts took place in Armenia; and while the Turkish delegation was in Moscow the Red Army crossed the Armenian border and forced Erivan to sign a treaty on 10 August. Meanwhile the situation of the TGNA government was growing more precarious. The future of the Anatolia movement was quite uncertain. Greece was advancing in Anatolia, having captured Bursa on 8 July and Uşak on 29 August. (It would be necessary to wait until 9 January 1921 for the Greek advance to be checked at the first Battle of İnönü.) Ankara's hand was weakening vis-à-vis Moscow.

Second, on 30 May 1920 a Turkish-French Armistice of twenty days had been signed, and Moscow was still not sure that the weapons and supplies procured under the deal would not be used against it. This was because the Allies were inciting Ankara, and others too, against the Bolsheviks.

Third, because the Russians were sure that they would eventually have Armenia under their control, they were hardly eager to put pressure on that country for Turkey's benefit. In fact, by the terms of the above-mentioned Soviet-Armenian Treaty of 10 August they allowed Ar-

Box 1-17. The Failure of the First TGNA Delegation

The first TGNA delegation was unsuccessful in the negotiations that got underway in Moscow on 24 July 1920. From the moment of its arrival in Moscow on 19 July the Bolsheviks snubbed the delegation. There was no official to greet the delegation members upon their arrival at the railroad station. An individual who had befriended them on the train agreed to telephone the Russian foreign ministry, and a car was dispatched after one hour. The delegation was so neglected during its stay in Moscow that the members were frequently hungry; some Tatars provided them with food ($\frac{1}{2}\text{in sign}, pp. 29-33).

At the end of the negotiations, the delegation failed to sign a treaty. The return journey to Turkey was equally eventful. Although Ismail Soysal (p. 28) wrote that the other members of the delegation continued with the negotiations when Bekir Sami Bey returned, what Bekir Sami really did is not very clear. On 11 September he left Moscow and disappeared from the scene for three months. Rumors were floating around Moscow that he was in Chechnya and Daghestan, agitating among the counterrevolutionaries (Yerasimos, p. 185).

Bekir Sami Bey returned to Ankara on 31 January 1921 and submitted his report to the TGNA on I February. He received his full powers on 5 February and left Ankara. On 19 February, when he was in Brindisi, he got an invitation to attend the London Conference.

menia to remain in control of the road linking Russia to Anatolia and recognized Armenian sovereignty on some Turkish territories. At the meeting held on 13 August, Chicherin demanded that Bitlis, Van, and Muş be ceded to Armenia and made this a condition for providing aid. Needless to say, the demand was rejected.

In these circumstances the negotiations reached a deadlock. When the negotiations broke off, Bekir Sami Bey left Moscow on 11 September and presumably proceeded to the southern Caucasus, where he originated. As an "Ossetian Prince," Bekir Sami was, if rumors are to be believed, seeking to establish an administration under his leadership in Ossetia (see Box 1-17 above).

B. A Provisional Solution to the Armenian Question: The Treaty of Gümrü

On 19 June 1920 Armenian bands attacked the Muslim population of the border areas. When reports on these attacks reached Ankara on 9 July, a protest note was delivered to Erivan by Ankara. This attack coincided with the Greek offensive that was launched on 22 June on the western front. The Ankara administration decided to ignore the Armenian attack. To fight on two fronts could result in total annihilation in the event of a reverse. There was also the possibility of British intervention in support of the Armenians. Finally, the Bolsheviks, who had reached an agreement with the Armenians on 10 August, might have intervened or might have reconsidered their decision to provide assistance to Ankara.

By September the circumstances had changed. One of the reasons for the deadlock in the negotiations at the end of August was the Russian demand for territorial concessions in favor of Armenia. As the Armenians kept up their attacks, Karabekir Paşa launched a counterattack on 28 September 1920. The next day Sarıkamış was recovered. This was to be the initial move, with more to follow.

On 21 October 1920 the Tevfik Paşa cabinet, consisting of supporters of the nationalist forces, was sworn in at the capital. The new cabinet in Istanbul suited the government of the TGNA in two ways. First, on 22 October Ahmet Muhtar Bey, the "commissar of foreign affairs of the Ankara Government," wrote a letter to Chicherin in which he indicated that the new cabinet in Istanbul was bent on drawing the Anatolia movement to Britain's side, away from the Bolsheviks and Muslim groups. This gave Ankara room for maneuver in the negotiations with Moscow. If the Bolshevik government wanted the Turkish nation to continue its struggle against imperialism, it had to abandon its claims on behalf of the Armenians.

Second, Britain's move to establish contacts with the Anatolia movement also gave the TGNA some leeway. These British soundings, made through the new government, helped persuade the government of the TGNA that Britain would not intervene in the Caucasus. This allowed Ankara to undertake its second push on the eastern front on 27 October. Kars fell on 30 October and Gümrü on 7 November. Peace negotiations between the victorious Karabekir Paşa and the Tashnaks, who were losing their grip on power, were undertaken on 26 November, resulting in the signing of the Gümrü (Alexandropol) treaty on 2 December 1920.

This was the first treaty between the TGNA government and a foreign state. Although it became invalid only a short time later, it is worth looking at some of its terms.

Article 4: "The Yerevan [Armenian] Republic undertakes not to maintain forces other than sufficient gendarmes armed with light weapons to maintain internal order and a force consisting of no more than 1,500 professional soldiers armed with 8 mountain or field cannons and 20 machine guns to defend the country. There shall be no conscription in Armenia."

Article 5: "After peace is attained, the Yerevan government agrees to allow Turkey's political representative or Ambassador in Yerevan to undertake at any time inspections and investigations with regard to the aforementioned subject."

Article 10: "The Yerevan government considers the Sèvres Treaty, rejected by the TGNA, null and void, agrees to recall its representative delegations in Europe and America, who are acting as instruments of incitement, and undertakes not to let into its government grasping and militaristic individuals."

Article 12: "The Turkish state shall keep railroads and other roads in the Yerevan Republic under control and observation pending the achievement of general peace."

Article 14: "The Yerevan Republic agrees and undertakes to consider null and void all provisions relating to Turkey or harmful to Turkey's interests in treaties entered into by the Yerevan Republic with any other state."

This could be described as a colonial treaty. With it the Ankara administration was compelling Armenia to give up its claims on all of the territories that had been promised to it under the Sèvres Treaty. At the same time, it was imposing its own Sèvres on Armenia: Ankara was tracing the border, Armenia's armed forces were being limited, Turkey was being granted the right to intervene, and the country's transport network was being placed under Ankara's control.

Three days earlier, however, the revolutionary committee set up at Icevan (Karavansaray) had proclaimed a Bolshevik administration in Armenia on 29 November. On 2 December (the day the Treaty of Gümrü was signed) the interim government of the Armenian Soviet Socialist Republic entered Yerevan with the help of the Red Army and signed an agreement with the RSFSR. By this agreement the RSFSR undertook to defend Armenia and declared that it would not recognize the Treaty of Gümrü. In other words, the government that signed the treaty with Ankara lost power on that day. Nevertheless, the Gümrü treaty helped stabilize the situation at the border until the Kars Treaty, which would settle all the region's outstanding questions, was signed.

The Second TGNA Delegation

The coming to power on 21 October 1920 of the Tevfik Paşa government, which was sympathetic to the nationalist forces, raised the possibility of a rapprochement between Ankara and Britain. This was a setback for Moscow.

The nonimplementation of the Gümrü Treaty, however, was a setback for Ankara. It was necessary for both sides, cut off from the West, to establish permanent diplomatic relations and resume the negotiations.

In October Moscow assigned Budu Mdivani to Ankara as its representative. He arrived in Ankara on 21 February 1921 and presented his credentials on 5 March. He happened to be the brother of Simeon Mdivani, the representative of Menshevik Georgia in Ankara. His counterpart was the commander of the western front, Ali Fuat [Cebesoy], who was appointed ambassador to Moscow on 21 November after his reverses at Eskişehir and Kütahya.

The second TGNA delegation to go to Moscow was headed by the minister of economy, Yusuf Kemal Bey [Tengirşenk], and consisted of the minister of education, Dr. Rıza Nur Bey, and Ali Fuat Paşa, who was already on his way to Moscow. In addition, the delegation included secretaries and cipher clerks. The delegation's brief was to sign a treaty. After a long journey the delegates arrived in Moscow on 19 February 1921 (Box 1-18).

Unlike the first delegation, the second was received with fanfare. The first meeting took place on 21 February 1921 with Chicherin and his deputy Karahan. At the meeting Chicherin requested the abrogation of the Treaty of Gümrü, the evacuation of Gümrü, and an end to the assistance to the Tashnaks. He also complained about the persecution of Communists in Anatolia and indicated that Russia could not sign a treaty of alliance with Turkey but was prepared to sign a treaty of friendship (Cebesoy, p. 138). The Turkish objectives were to avoid discussing Armenia, draw the border at Kars and thereby avoid territorial concessions, secure de jure recognition of the government of the TGNA, cancel the Turkish debts to tsarist Russia, and, above all, secure financial aid, weapons, and ammunition (Nur, pp. 764–65).

When Chicherin got tough and raised the Armenian question, the delegation obtained an appointment with Stalin on the night of 22-23 February. Stalin explained that they could not sign a treaty of alliance because of the trade agreement they were about to sign with Britain, but he indicated their readiness to provide all kinds of assistance. The meeting helped clear the obstacles. This was due to the negotiating tactic of the Russians and had nothing to do with the personalities of Stalin or Chicherin. Stalin was probably taking into account two recent developments: (1) at that time Bekir Sami Bey was in London negotiating with the Western powers on behalf of the government of the TGNA; (2) at the first Battle of İnönü the Greek armies had been checked for the first time. When the official negotiations started on 26 February, Chicherin was joined by Celal Korkmazov, a member of the Pan-Russian Central Committee. Chicherin was polite and forthcoming, but this time the Batum issue constituted an obstacle.

The two parties agreed to sign the treaty on 16 March. This was the date of the British occupation of Istanbul, and the Soviet side wanted to mark it by signing the Moscow treaty exactly one year later (Nur, p. 795). The Anglo-

Box 1-18. Notes on the Second TGNA Delegation

The memoirs of Dr. Riza Nur, which describe the adventures of the delegation (pp. 679–815), give a good idea of the conditions under which the Anatolia movement operated.

The members of the delegation left on 14 December 1920. The delegates did not use the Black Sea route for fear of the Allied fleet. They proceeded by unheated train from Ankara to Ulukisla via Eskişehir and Konya. From there they went to Kayseri by carriage, where they procured a case of pastirma (cured meat) to consume in Moscow. The pastirma proved to be inedible. From Kayseri they proceeded to Sivas by car, by carriage, on horseback, and on foot. The next stops were Erzurum, Sarikamış, Kars, Gümrü, Tbilisi, Baku, and finally (by train) Moscow.

As the train passed through the tunnels, it had to move slowly, stopping and reversing from time to time to break glant icides. When they asked why the train was running backward, they were informed that the female leader of a band was raiding trains and killing Jews, who were identified as such because they were circumcised. The driver of the train had been tipped off about an imminent raid.

In Kars the delegation caught up with Ali Fuat Paşa, who had left on a December. The delegation also ran into Mustafa Suphi, the Turkish Communist leader, who was returning from Moscow with thirteen followers. M. Suphi and his companions were to proceed to Trabzon via Erzurum, when they were embarking in Trabzon to proceed to Ankara, the boatman murdered them all and dumped their bodies into the sea. It was bizarre that, as the delegation seeking Russian ald was en route to Moscow, the Communists sent to Ankara by the Comintern were being eliminated. At Kars the delegation also ran into Budu Mdivani on his way to Ankara. He advised the Turks to see Stalin to clear up any difficulties they might run into in Moscow. At the railroad station in Moscow they were greeted by a ceremonial military guard.

Soviet trade agreement had also been signed on 16 March, however, and it is quite likely that the Soviets might have wanted to guarantee this agreement before signing with Turkey (Gürün, p. 68).

The Turkish delegation also signed a treaty of friendship on 1 March 1921 with the representative of Afghanistan, Mehmet Velihan, who was in Moscow to conclude an agreement with the Soviets. After Gümrü, this was the second treaty signed by Ankara. The third would be signed with the RSFSR.

D. The Moscow Treaty of 1921

era e di Cabilla di Perè

The Treaty of Friendship and Fraternity is the first treaty signed by the government of the TGNA with a major power and contains many important provisions.

Article 1: "The contracting parties agree in principle not to recognize any peace treaty or other international agreement imposed upon one of them. The term 'Turkey' in this treaty will be understood to mean the territories included within the National Pact that was adopted by the parliament in Istanbul on 28 January 1920." A major power was acknowledging the National Pact for the first time.

Article 2: "Turkey agrees to relinquish its sovereignty over the district of Batum and its port to Georgia under the following conditions. First, the inhabitants of these localities will enjoy far-reaching administrative autonomy. Second, Turkey will have full access to the port of Batum and enjoy free transit rights without payment of any taxes or duties." With this treaty, Turkey's eastern border had been fixed and the eastern front secured. Batum, which had been included in the National Pact, was the sole concession made by Ankara to secure the signing of the treaty.

Article 3: "The contracting parties have agreed that Nakhechevan will become an autonomous region under the protection of Azerbaijan and never be placed under the protection of a third state."

Article 4: "Having observed the closeness between the national liberation movements of the eastern nations and the struggle of Russian workers for a new social order, the contracting parties openly declare the right of these nations to freedom and independence and their right to be governed by the regime of their choice."

Article 5: "In order to secure the opening of the Straits to the commerce of all nations as well as freedom of navigation, the contracting parties agree to leave the question of the final regime of the Black Sea and the Straits to a decision of the riparian states, who will convene a conference for this purpose. The decisions taken at the conference will in no way encroach on the sovereignty of Turkey or endanger its security or the security of its capital, Istanbul." Ankara had agreed that the regime of the Straits was a matter for the Black Sea countries to determine. This principle was not upheld at Lausanne, however.

Article 6: "The contracting parties agree that all the covenants entered into by the two nations do not always conform to their interest. They agree that such covenants have lost their validity and are null and void. The government of the RSFSR declares that Turkey is freed from all financial and other obligations arising from international treaties between Turkey and tsarist Russia." With this provision, Turkey was being freed of its debts to tsarist Russia.

Article 7: "The government of the RSFSR agrees that the regime of the capitulations is incompatible with a country's right freely to pursue its national development and the full exercise of its sovereignty. It therefore considers invalid and abolishes all rights and privileges associated with this regime." The Moscow Treaty was the first international document prior to the Lausanne Treaty that declared the capitulations in Turkey to be incompatible with the concept of national sovereignty.

Article 8: "The contracting parties undertake not to allow at any time the establishment on their territories of organizations or groups claiming to represent the government of the other party or of groups hostile to the other party. Turkey and Russia undertake identical commitments, on condition of reciprocity, in relation to the Caucasus Soviet Republics." This meant that Turkey would no longer harbor the remnants of the White Army or the Musavat movement, while the RSFSR would not harbor either the Turkish Communists or the Unionists.

Article 15: "Russia undertakes to make the necessary representations to the southern Caucasus Republics to ensure that in agreements between Turkey and these Republics the provisions relating to them contained in the present Turco-Russian Treaty will be adhered to." In other words, the RSFSR undertook to secure the acceptance of this treaty by the Caucasus Republics, and in particular the clauses relating to Turkey's eastern frontier.

The treaty came into effect with the exchange of the instruments of ratification on 22 September 1921. This treaty became the cornerstone of the relations between the two states during their early years. From then on, all treaties between the two states would make a reference to this treaty. During the 1950s, when there was an effort to improve relations, the Soviet leaders would never fail to allude to this treaty in their declarations.

E. The Treaties of Kars and Ardahan

At the time of the signing of the treaty in Moscow a serious crisis was brewing in the Caucasus. On 8 March 1921 the Red Army attacked Menshevik Georgia. Upon the request of the Georgians for a "temporary occupation," Karabekir Paşa occupied Batum on 11 March. The 16 March treaty had ceded Batum to Georgia, even if certain conditions were attached. But Turkey refused to evacuate Batum. The clashes that erupted between the Red Army and Karabekir's units on 17 March continued until 24 March. Finally the Turks evacuated Batum. But in doing so they blew up the magazines containing ammunition. This led Chicherin to condemn the government of the TGNA. Batum was the outlet for the products of the region. After Azerbaijan and Armenia came under Soviet domination, there was an attempt to set up the "Caucasus Wall" at Batum, and the port became the subject of intense negotiations at the London Conference. When the evacuation of Batum was delayed, the flow of aid from Moscow started faltering. Ali Fuat Paşa met with Stalin on the night of 21–22 April and secured a promise that the sending of aid would continue.

In 1921 the government of the TGNA was forced to direct its attention to the western front. After the Battle of Sakarya a friendship treaty with Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia was signed at Kars on 13 October 1921. The content of this treaty was almost identical to the content of the one that had been signed in Moscow. As already noted, article 15 of the Moscow Treaty had foreseen this result. Following the arrival of M. V. Frunze in Ankara on 13 December, a Treaty of Friendship and Fraternity was signed with Ukraine on 2 January 1922. In this manner, bilateral relations were placed on a sound basis prior to the Lausanne Conference. With the Kars Treaty, the obstacles to a smooth flow of aid were removed. Furthermore, the neighboring states officially recognized Turkey's eastern frontier and the principles of the government of the TGNA (Soysal, p. 39). After the treaty with the RSFSR, the signing of treaties with the Soviet Republics in the Caucasus facilitated the agreement of 20 October with France.

The friendly relations established with the RSFSR were marred by a diplomatic scandal in April 1922. The personnel of the military attaché's office of the Turkish Embassy were involved in an espionage affair, together with the personnel of the British and Polish missions. When the Soviet police raided the homes of the personnel of the military attaché's office and arrested them, Ali Fuat Paşa delivered a sharp note of protest to Karahan. Karahan tried to minimize the issue; but Ali Fuat Paşa was not easily appeased, which aggravated the crisis. On 26 April the RSFSR demanded the recall of the arrested men. Ankara responded by recalling its ambassador. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the RSFSR had suspected Ali Fuat Paşa of secretly collaborating with Enver Paşa. On 10 May 1922 Ali Fuat Paşa left Moscow, accompanied by fifteen of his subordinates. To help settle matters, Rıza Nur was sent to Moscow. His contacts there and the efforts of ambassador S. I. Aralov in Ankara helped to clear things up.

F. Relations at Lausanne: The Question of the Straits

With victory in September 1922, the question of making peace was at the top of the agenda.

The first issue was the matter of participation in the peace negotiations. The Allies were against the participation of the RSFSR and the other Republics, because they had not fought Turkey and because they had settled their outstanding questions with the Moscow, Kars, and Ankara treaties. That is why the Soviet Republics were not among the countries that received invitations on 20 September 1922 to come to Lausanne.

Another important question that had to be settled was the future regime of the Straits. In article 5 of the Treaty of Moscow, it was agreed that this question would be decided by the Black Sea states. But the Allies, who now faced the prospect of evacuating the region of the Straits, wanted to have a say in the settlement. Furthermore, they were against Moscow's participation in the settlement. The Bolshevik administration declared to the Allies that a settlement reached in its absence would be invalid and reminded Turkey of its contractual obligation. On 30 October 1922 Ambassador Aralov delivered a note to the MFA, calling on Turkey to take up a common position on the matter.

A solution was reached whereby the Soviet delegation (consisting of the representatives of Russia, Ukraine, and Georgia) attended only meetings that took up the question of the Straits. On 27 October 1922 Lenin gave an interview to the Observer and Manchester Guardian and explained the Russian position on the question of the Straits: Turkey's national aspirations must be given satisfaction, the Straits must remain closed to all warships in war and peace, and merchant ships must enjoy full freedom of navigation. At the negotiations İsmet Paşa and Chicherin reached an agreement to consult and to adopt a common position. On 4 December Chicherin delivered a speech in which he accepted, on behalf of the Soviet government, that the Straits belonged to Turkey. He also stressed the importance of the Straits for the Soviet Republics and recalled that before the war 70% of Russia's wheat exports went through the Straits. The Straits were also important for their security. It was thanks to the provisions of the Mudros Armistice that the White Army had been able to attack Black Sea ports. Chicherin read out the text of the fourth article of the National Pact to demonstrate that his views were identical to those of Turkey on the question of keeping the Straits closed to warships. Article 4 stated that "the security of İstanbul, the seat of the Caliphate and Sultanate, and of the Sea of Marmara must be free from all threats." This speech led Lord Curzon to remark that Chicherin was more royalist than the king.

Although Moscow insisted on the Straits being kept closed to all warships and under Turkish control, Turkey was eager to reach a peace agreement and appeared ready to compromise. The Soviets accused Turkey of being insincere at the negotiations. Chicherin described the demilitarization of the Straits and their being made accessible to warships as the policy of Damat Ferit, whereupon Ismet Paşa asked whether the Soviets were prepared to help if the negotiations broke down and fighting resumed. Chicherin was unable to give a clearly affirmative answer. Ismet Paşa informed him that Turkey was not prepared to endanger the outcome of the negotiations on account of this question. On 12 December the Soviet delegate found out that the Allied members of the experts' committee on the Straits were engaged in secret negotiations with the Turkish members to reconcile the Allied and Turkish drafts. On 7 January 1923 the Soviet delegation submitted a note to the conference president, complaining that a draft convention for the Straits was being negotiated without its knowledge.

Despite these complaints, agreement had been reached when the question came before the committee on 1 February 1923. Warships would be allowed to enter the Black Sea under certain conditions, and the security of the Straits would be ensured by an International Commission.

The conference reached a deadlock on the question of the capitulations on 4 February 1923 and broke up. When the conference resumed its work, the question of the Straits was no longer on the agenda. The Soviets signed the convention not in Lausanne but in Rome on 14 August 1923.

Relations with Greece

When the Ottoman Empire signed the armistice ending World War I on 30 October 1918 at Mudros, its leadership believed that the state could continue its existence with the indulgence of the Allies. There were two reasons for this. First, prime minister Lloyd George had declared on 5 January 1918 that Britain would not prevent the Turkish Empire, with its capital in Istanbul, from continuing its existence on the lands inhabited by Turks. Second, Woodrow Wilson had declared in his speech to the joint session of Congress on 8 January 1918 in which he enumerated the principles on which peace would be based that the Turkish portions of the Ottoman Empire would be allowed to preserve their sovereignty.

The armistice was signed on behalf of the Ottoman Empire by navy minister Hüseyin Rauf Bey [Orbay]. Despite articles 7 and 24, which clearly demonstrated the intention of the Allies, in his statement to the press he declared that the state's independence and the rights of the sultanate had been secured, that no enemy soldier would set foot in İstanbul, and that naval yards would not face occupation. The important thing was to maintain law and order within the country, because otherwise everything might be lost.

There was no way to preserve law and order, however, once the terms of the armistice were revealed. Those who read between the lines could see what the Allied intentions were. The Eastern Question, which had been preoccupying the international community for a hundred years, would be resolved in the interest of the major powers. The Allies had partitioned the Ottoman Empire through their secret agreements concluded during the war (see Box 1-23 below). To carry out the partition plans, it was necessary to convince international public opinion before the signing of the peace treaty that the Ottoman Empire could no longer maintain its existence. To realize their ambitions and lend them some legitimacy, it was necessary to demonstrate that the inhabitants of the Ottoman Empire could not cohabit peacefully and that the Allies must assume the role of bringing harmony among these clashing ethnic groups.

The intentions of the Allies toward the Ottomans were also interpreted correctly by the non-Turkish subjects. In the postwar period, when multinational empires were coming apart, each national group was bent on establishing its own state over the largest possible area. Each nation was having its contacts with the Allies and informing them about its "legitimate" rights. The Armenians, Greeks, and Kurds were pursuing this path while making sure that article 7 of Mudros would come into effect by creating disturbances in their regions. The first step in their march toward independence was to free themselves from Ottoman sovereignty.

These developments were being closely followed by the Ottoman intelligentsia, whose main concern was the survival of the state. Notwithstanding the provisions in the armistice agreement for laying down arms, the people were reluctant to part with their weapons. Occupation would undoubtedly be met by local resistance, although there were serious doubts about the feasibility of organizing countrywide resistance to occupation. Shortly after the Mudros Armistice, Britain and France occupied the southeast and Italy landed troops in the south without running into organized resistance. When the Allied fleet sailed into Istanbul on 13 November, there was no reaction from the Turkish population, while the non-Muslim population rejoiced. The first resistance movements were to appear in 1919.

I. GREEK ASPIRATIONS IN ANATOLIA AND THE EMERGENCE OF THE NATIONAL STRUGGLE (1919)

In 1919 the Allies were consulting among themselves to prepare for the peace negotiations while the non-Turkish elements of the Ottoman state strove to influence the Allies to meet their aspirations. The Muslim-Turkish ele-

Box 1-19. Greece's Foreign Policy and the Megali Idea

After Greece attained independence, it was a poor, distant, and "forgotten" country in the eyes of the Western nations. Hence the Greek kingdom turned its face toward its wealthy kin living in the Ottoman Empire. The Ottoman Greeks were likewise beginning to establish ideological links with the Greek kingdom. The road to development for this kingdom was to expand into the rich lands inhabited by ethnic Greeks. This objective became known as the Megali Idea (Great Idea). It was described for the first time in 1844 by the minister of foreign affairs, Joannis Kolettis, in his speech to the constituent assembly. After that date Greece embarked on expansion, first into the Ionian Islands in 1864, when they were relinquished by Britain. In 1881 Thessaly and the Arta district of Epirus were annexed. In 1897 Crete acquired autonomy.

These territorial gains might appear substantial; but the country was getting deeper into debt, and there was no letup in internal disturbances. When the Cretan lawyer Eleftherios Venizelos came to power in 1910, he was able to double Greece's territory and population within a few years. Following the Balkan Wars of 1912 and 1913, the northern Aegean coast and the islands were added to Greece.

This rapid expansion turned Venizelos into a legendary figure. His successes blinded him to the fact that his compatriots needed a period of peace to put their economic house in order. To realize his dream of a greater Greece with its capital in Constantinople, he joined the Allies in World War I. After the war he was responsible for the misadventure in Asia Minor (known as Mikrasiatiki Katastrofi in Greek). As the leader who had come closest to achieving the Megali Idea, he found himself compelled to sign the Peace Treaty of Lausanne, which ended the dream of the Megali Idea once and for all.

ments of the population, however, were desperately trying to get organized to oppose occupation and eventual dismemberment. Greece played a central role in the inter-Allied peace talks as well as in the coming into being of the Turkish national movement.

The Paris Peace Conference and the Greek Position

The defeat of the Ottoman state in World War I and the signing of the Mudros Armistice were greeted with jubilation by the Greeks living within the Ottoman lands as well as in Greece itself. For the first time it looked like the Megali Idea (Great Ideal), the dream that had aroused and inspired all Greeks under the sway of nationalistic ideology since the second half of the nineteenth century, was about to come true (Box 1-19).

Greece was represented by prime minister Elefterios Venizelos at the Paris Peace Conference, where the peace terms with the vanquished nations were being discussed. Venizelos was counting on giving satisfaction to the ambitions of the Greek people and leaving his mark in history as the leader who had, for the first time since the Byzantine Empire, brought all the Greeks under the roof of a single state. He had assumed power in 1910 and led the Greeks from war to war. His staying in power depended on the sacrifices of the Greek people being rewarded with the realization of the Megali Idea dream. To understand the nature of the claims put forward by Venizelos at the 1919 Paris Peace Conference, we must bear in mind the historic role that he had undertaken to fulfill.

During the war Greece had complied with all Allied demands. It now considered itself fully justified in seeking its due reward. When Venizelos arrived in Paris in November 1918, he was ready to put forward Greece's territorial claims, starting with İzmir. These claims had the full backing of all quarters in Greece, with the exception of the Socialists. The press (again with the exception of the Socialist newspaper Rizopastis) was behind Venizelos.

On 30 December 1918 Venizelos submitted a memorandum to the Allied delegates, containing Greece's territorial claims: Northern Epirus (southern Albania), Eastern and Western Thrace excluding Istanbul and the Straits, Pontus (he called it "Trabzon" so that it could unite with Greater Armenia), western Anatolia, İmroz, Bozcaada (Tenedos) and the Dodecanese Islands, and finally, in a roundabout way, Cyprus. The inflated Greek claims were concentrated in western Anatolia. Venizelos let it be known that he might make concessions over the other claims. The Greek prime minister based his claims on Wilson's principle of self-determination and provided statistics on the Greek population of these areas. In the absence of official statistics, these were obtained from church records. To persuade delegates that Greeks outnumbered Muslims in certain areas, Venizelos put forth the idea that the islands were an integral part of Anatolia and, based on this logic, included the population of the islands in the population of the mainland. He also added the Greek colonies in southern Russia to the Greek population of Trabzon. While Venizelos was in Paris, he was being supported by the Greek community in Anatolia and its leadership (Box 1-20).

The Allied reaction to the Greek claims was not uniform. The British and the French, under British influence, wanted to see Greece in control of a large slice of western Anatolia, although they were not prepared to grant all of the Venizelos claims. The U.S. was against the claims because in all the districts outside of İzmir the Greek population was outnumbered by the Muslim population, and the U.S. was opposed on economic grounds to detaching the city of İzmir from its hinterland. Italy was against

Box 1-20. The Greek Community of Anatolia during the Armistice

When it became apparent that the Ottoman Empire was going to lose the war, the Greek Orthodox patriarch, Germanos V, was forced to resign and the archbishop of Bursa, Dorotheos Mammelis, was proclaimed acting patriarch (locum tenens). Dorotheos set up a "national committee," established contacts with European centers, severed direct links with the Sublime Porte (Bab-: Ali, the Ottoman seat of government), eliminated Turkish from the curricula of Greek community schools, and made the decision to unite with the motherland, Greece. In March 1919 the Patriarchate decided to end all links with the Ottoman state and to refrain from participating in elections. Dorotheos also went to the Paris Peace Conference, where he submitted a memorandum inviting the Allies to liberate the Greek population, which he described as enduring Turkish oppression. The archbishops of Trabzon and Izmir also sent letters to the conference providing statistics and describing the condition of their communities in these regions and appealing to the Allies to save them from Turkish tyranny. The archbishop of Trabzon, Ignoring Venizelos, put forth extravagant claims, which went beyond even the Greek claims. Aside from Lazistan, whose population was totally Muslim, the archbishop wanted to see an autonomous Pontus to be controlled by a single state. This entity would include the province of Trabzon plus Samsun, Sinop, Amasya, and Karahisar. He indicated that this autonomous state would engage in close cooperation with the future Armenian state. Although the conference did not heed these demands, they served the purpose of Greek propaganda in its efforts to sway international public opinion.

having the Greek claims discussed at the conference. It wanted İzmir to be taken up in conjunction with the peace arrangements for the rest of Anatolia. Furthermore, it considered the Greek claims on İzmir to be in conflict with earlier decisions made in London and St.-Jean-de-Maurienne on the final disposition of the territories in question. Italy considered that these territories should come under its sovereignty.

While the presumed "heirs" waited in harmony for the death of the "sick man," disputes broke out over the disposition of the "estate." Italy was in disagreement with the other Allies over western Anatolia. It also had differences with the U.S. over Fiume in the Adriatic. When these differences became insurmountable, the Italian delegation walked out of the conference on 24 April. The Allies started worrying about Italy's further moves. When the news came on 2 May that Italy had dispatched two cruisers to İzmir, the arch—Greek sympathizer Lloyd George, ignoring the warnings of his military advisors, persuaded President Wilson to allow the Greeks to land in İzmir to forestall an Italian fait accompli. On 6 May the Allies communicated their decision to Greece. When

V. E. Orlando, the head of the Italian delegation, returned to the table on 12 May, he was asked to adhere to the Allied decision. French premier Georges Clemenceau undertook the task of persuading Orlando. He obtained Orlando's consent by not revealing the intention to keep Italy out of İzmir. He said that Greece was landing in İzmir solely to protect the local inhabitants, that this did not imply occupation or laying a claim to the city, and that the final disposition of İzmir would be decided later.

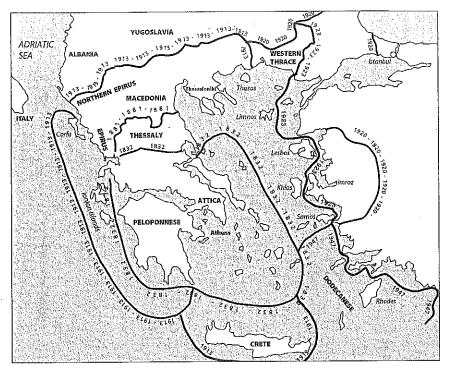

Shortly thereafter, having completed its military preparations, Greece landed its troops in İzmir under the cover of Allied warships.

The Occupation of İzmir and Its Consequences

The Greek soldiers who set foot in İzmir on 15 May 1919 were greeted by jubilant crowds of Greeks, headed by Archbishop Hrisostomos. They also found a resentful Turkish-Muslim population. The excesses in the rejoicing of one community and the anger of the other led inevitably to clashes. The first shot fired at the invaders heralded the changes that were about to take place in the destiny of the Anatolian peoples. From then on, the local nationalist resistance movements (Kuva-yı Milliye) would be merged into a force at the national level. Its leadership would be assumed by Mustafa Kemal, who was to set foot in Samsun four days after the Greek landing.

At a time when M. Kemal was striving to organize the nationalist resistance on a nationwide basis, the İstanbul government was responding to the Allied invitation and sending its delegates to the Paris Peace Conference to put forth its views. On 11 and 17 June 1919 Damat Ferit Paşa submitted two memoranda to the conference, containing these views on the Greek territorial claims.

- 1. Thrace: the safeguarding of peace in this region is dependent on the existence of a frontier that would allow Edirne to be effectively defended. The defense requirements of İstanbul also demand such a frontier. To comply with Wilson's principles, and for economic reasons as well, the territories to the north and west of Edirne, with their Turkish majorities, must remain within Ottoman borders.
- 2. Asia Minor: the prewar Turkish-Russian frontier should be restored, with the Black Sea in the north and Mosul and Diyarbakır vilayets in the east and as far as the Mediterranean, including parts of Adana.
- 3. Aegean Islands: the islands off the Ottoman coast are a prolongation of the coast itself. They must remain Ottoman for historic and economic reasons and also to prevent smuggling and allow for the defense of the coast-line.

Map 1-5. The Expansion of Greece

The arguments put forward by Damat Ferit Paşa made no impression on the Allies, and on 27 June the Ottoman delegation was asked to leave the conference. Hungary aside, peace treaties had been concluded with all the vanquished states by then, but the deliberations over the peace treaty with the Ottoman Empire dragged on. One of the reasons for the delay was the resistance movement gathering strength in Anatolia. The other reason was the conflicting interests of the Allies, arising from their desire to extend their areas of occupation at the expense of their partners.

By 1919 Mustafa Kemal had overcome the opposition of the groups who sought to become a U.S. mandate under the LoN regime and those who favored resistance at the local level and had managed to unify the resistance at a national level. The Amasya Declaration had been released on 22 June, and the Erzurum (23 July-7 August) and Sivas (4-11 September) congresses had been held. From reports reaching the Allies in Paris regarding the unfolding events in Anatolia, they realized that unless they concluded a peace treaty very soon the situation might develop against their interests. The British High Commission in Istanbul reported that the nationalist movement in Anatolia was gaining strength because of the landing of Greek troops in İzmir. The reports indicated that if the Greek and Italian forces of occupation were to evacuate Anatolia most of the difficulties facing the Allies would disappear, the prestige of the Istanbul government would rise, and the nationalist movement would lose its raison d'être. In this situation Britain and France decided to provide additional support to the Damat Ferit government and on 3 August informed İstanbul that the Greek zone of occupation in Anatolia would be kept within strict limits. But, as already noted, the Anatolia movement's decision to resist was not the only obstacle delaying the advent of peace. The inter-Allied squabbling was also a contributing factor.

The Greeks did not confine themselves to İzmir when they landed their troops. They pushed forward and rapidly extended their occupation to include Turgutlu, Ödemiş, and Aydın. This angered Italy because of its own designs on the region. Britain's support for Greece was frustrating Italy. Realizing that it could not impose its views in Paris, Italy shifted its policy. It could serve its interests better by making peace and seeking economic privileges, so it set about befriending Turkey. It went even further and started relaying information to M. Kemal about Allied decisions, provided support for the irregulars opposing the Greek advances, and gave sanctuary to these irregulars in its zone of occupation.

At this point France too was beginning to review its policies. Mustafa Kemal's improving relations with the RSFSR and the intensifying nationalist resistance against French occupation in the southern regions during November 1919 were beginning to have an effect on warweary French public opinion.

While France and Italy gauged the nature and resilience of the nationalist movement under Mustafa Kemal accurately, Greece and Britain opted for the policy of force. Venizelos felt that M. Kemal did not dispose of a proper army as yet but that an army would come into being and the movement would gather strength if his movement was not crushed soon. The Greek army was ready to do its duty but would expect its due reward in the form of additional territory for its services. With British backing, the Greek army would launch its drive to the interior of Anatolia and toward Ankara itself in the summer of 1920.

II. THE TURKISH-GREEK STRUGGLE FOR ANATOLIA (1920–1922)

By 1920 the Allies were getting impatient to conclude a peace treaty with the Ottoman state. More than a year had elapsed since the signing of the armistice, yet there was no peace treaty and the Anatolia movement kept gathering momentum. Faced with Mustafa Kemal's pressure, the İstanbul government had held elections in 1919; and the new parliament had adopted the National Pact on 28 January 1920, reflecting the demands of Anatolia. Britain and France wanted to see the treaty signed with minor modifications that would not affect their interests: the Turks would be evicted from Europe, an international arrangement would take charge of Istanbul, and Greece and Italy would be induced to evacuate Anatolia by being offered economic and other privileges. This would pave the way for the restoration of Turkish sovereignty over Anatolia. But when news arrived of the growing intensity of the clashes between Turkish resistance forces and French troops in Cilicia and Maraş and of the massacre of thousands of Armenians in the region, the negotiations were interrupted and the policy of force prevailed. On 16 March 1920 İstanbul was occupied by Allied forces and the parliament building was attacked and taken over. Venizelos was waiting for just this opportunity.

The Greek Army's Advance in Anatolia

As the British and the French were engaged in discussing possible changes in the peace terms, Venizelos held that the only way to impose these terms on the Turks would be by crushing the Anatolia movement and sought permission from the Allies to let the Greek army carry out this task. The fate of Venizelos and of his government depended directly on the success of his Anatolian gamble. He had taken Greece into the war despite the king's objections, secured his exile with the help of the Allies, and landed troops in Anatolia without regard to strong domestic opposition. The Greek people had grown weary after enduring many years of war. Nevertheless, the Greek army in Anatolia was getting restless for action. The ethnic Greeks of Anatolia were enthusiastic backers of Venizelos and were eager to see results. To remove Greek troops from Anatolia at this juncture would seal the political fate of Venizelos.

Venizelos knew well that he could not take unilateral action, that he would need the blessing of the Allies before he could order his troops to march forward. Although the Turks were engaged on three fronts (Armenia, Cilicia, and western Anatolia), Greece was unable to take on the nationalist Turkish forces without Allied backing.

Until the spring of 1920, however, the Allies were not prepared to approve the adventurist Greek policies. After the occupation of İstanbul, Venizelos stepped up his pressure on Britain to give him the go-ahead signal. Britain indicated that it could not provide troops to fight in Thrace or Anatolia but that it stood ready to provide whatever arms or military supplies might be necessary. Greece had been notified that it would have to proceed on its own; neither Britain nor France would participate directly in a military operation.

When the Allies occupied İstanbul and dissolved parliament, M. Kemal, who was thoroughly opposed to the parliament meeting in İstanbul, got his chance to convene the Turkish Grand National Assembly in Ankara on 23 April 1920. The coming into being of a government in Anatolia that represented the national will was a sign that a peace agreement with İstanbul would be rejected by Ankara. Sure enough, as the preparation for Sèvres went ahead at San Remo in April 1920, the resistance movement was gaining in strength in Anatolia. France was involved in talks with the government of the TGNA in May 1920 to conclude an armistice agreement in the southeast.

The armistice negotiations implied France's recognition of the government of the TGNA, and they brought on a sharp reaction in Britain. Furthermore, Turkish nationalists had for the first time skirmished with British troops in the vicinity of İzmit. Against this background the Greeks got Britain's green light to push into Anatolia on 20 June 1920. The Greek army occupied Bursa on 8 July, Tekirdağ on 20 July, Edirne on 25 July, and Uşak on 29 August. As the Greek advance unfolded in Anatolia, the İstanbul government gave in to Allied pressures and signed the Peace Treaty of Sèvres on 10 August.

By the peace treaty Greece was acquiring Thrace, Izmir, and its hinterland and all of the Aegean islands apart from the Dodecanese. Venizelos wanted to capitalize on this success by holding an election. In the election held on 14 November Venizelos was able to obtain only 33% of the votes. Most of these votes were cast in regions that had been annexed by Greece after the Balkan Wars. Venizelos was forced to admit that the Greek nation was tired of war. A new government was formed by Dimitrios Rallis. In the meantime King Alexander had died in exile. Following a referendum held on 5 December, his successor, King Constantine, returned to Greece on 19 December.

The 14 November election had important effects on Greek politics. After the election the gulf separating the supporters of Venizelos, the liberal republicans, and the monarchists widened. This gulf would remain a salient feature of Greek politics for many years. The election also had profound effects on the fate of Anatolia.

Although Rallis was originally opposed to the Anatolia operation, the new government decided to pursue the Venizelos policy of using the army to compel the Turkish nationalist movement to accept Sèvres. In any case it was difficult to persuade Greek public opinion to accept a withdrawal, when it had no inkling about what was really going on in Anatolia. At this point it would also be very difficult to abandon the ethnic Greeks of Anatolia to their fates. Although Greece maintained its former policies, the Allies changed their position vis-à-vis Greece after the 1920 election.

The Allies were uneasy about the return of King Constantine to Greece. The situation was extremely fluid. The government of the TGNA was consolidating its position and had declared its opposition to Sèvres. It had scored victories over the Armenians and was close to persuading Moscow to provide aid and to engage in cooperation against regional governments enjoying British backing. France was in an extremely delicate position in the south on account of the stiff resistance encountered there. The British and French people wanted to know why their troops were not coming home despite the signing of the peace treaty. In these circumstances the Allies were looking at ways to soften the terms of the Sèvres Treaty. But they had also assumed responsibilities toward Greece by allowing it to land in Anatolia. The return of King Constantine provided the Allies with an excuse for relieving themselves from their responsibilities to Athens.

France articulated its new policy unambiguously: relations must be established with the government of the TGNA and the Greek army must get out of Anatolia. Britain's position was not that clear. It was ready to revise Sèvres so as to secure a split between the government of Ankara and the Bolsheviks, but it did not favor a Greek withdrawal even if it had cut financial aid to Athens. In these circumstances it followed a policy of "wait and see." Britain was determined to safeguard its interests whatever the outcome of the standoff; meanwhile it would pursue the war through its proxy Greece. The appraisal of the Turkish-Greek battles of 1921–22 should be made against this background of relations between Greece and its allies after the election of 1920.

In 1921 the tide started turning in favor of Turkey. In the east the Peace Treaty of Gümrü had been signed with Armenia and preparations were going ahead for a treaty with Moscow. In the south the French army was in difficulties, and Paris was seeking ways to reach an armistice agreement with Ankara from May 1920 on. Italy was maintaining its covert support to Ankara. Mustafa Kemal had declared his rejection of Sèvres and his determination to pursue the armed struggle until the objectives of the National Pact had been attained. Relations with the Istanbul government had been severed, and Anatolia's fate was now in the hands of the nationalists. The armed bands and irregulars had been replaced by a regular army. Peace in the east allowed some troops to be deployed to the western front. The fighting spirit of the army was high, despite shortages of materials and supplies.

In Greece the opposite situation applied. After the 1920 election the Allies had cut their aid. Only Britain continued to support Greece in Anatolia, and this was confined to moral support. The army was tired of waiting and was getting anxious to return to Greece. The soldiers began questioning the need to fight on behalf of their Anatolian kin, whose habits differed from theirs and who, while providing financial support, refrained from fighting for their own cause. At this point the new Rallis government made changes in the army high command and put Venizelos opponents in top positions. These changes proved to be misguided. The Greek Communists were exploiting the restlessness in army ranks by distributing tracts that exhorted soldiers not to fight for the imperialist cause. Despite these unfavorable factors, the Rallis government was quick to launch a new operation in Anatolia.

The First Battle of İnönü

The royalist Rallis government wanted to demonstrate the resolve of the Greek army. It also wanted to confirm that it had not abandoned the Venizelos policies. So the order to advance was issued. On 6 January the Greek army moved in two directions: from Bursa toward Eskişehir and from Uşak toward Afyon. The prime objective was Eskişehir, located on the İstanbul-Baghdad railroad. On 9 January 1921 the Greeks came into contact with the Turkish army under the command of Colonel İsmet [İnönü] in the İnönü region. After two days of clashes the Greek army withdrew to its original positions for a larger operation. The success of the Turks led Gen. Anastasios Papoulas to request reinforcements but did not shake his confidence in his ability to take Eskişehir.

The first Battle of İnönü was not a decisive encounter, but it was important as the first time the two armies had fought one another. It had a very positive effect on Ankara's morale. More than its military consequences, its diplomatic consequences were noteworthy. The treaty negotiations underway with Moscow were given a boost, and the Allies decided to convene a conference in London to revise Sèvres. This situation would also allow Ankara to play Moscow against the West.

The London Conference

In the new circumstances prevailing in Anatolia, Britain, France, and Italy decided to invite İstanbul and Athens to the London Conference scheduled to take place on 21

February 1921. The invitation addressed to the İstanbul government called for the inclusion of representatives from the government of the TGNA within the İstanbul delegation. At the TGNA doubts were expressed about the true Allied intentions, which were perceived as being designed to gain time for the Greeks after the first Battle of İnönü. M. Kemal stated that this invitation would not be accepted. His condition for attending the conference was an invitation addressed directly to Ankara. When the Allies complied with this request and sent a proper invitation, Bekir Sami Bey (who is sometimes referred to as Bekir Sami Kunduh because his father was called Musa Kunduh Paşa, as if his last name was Kunduh) went to London upon his return from Moscow.

The invitation to the London Conference shook up the domestic political scene in Greece. After having responded positively to the Allied invitation, Rallis was castigated for being conciliatory and forced to resign. He was replaced by Nikolaos Kalogeropoulos, who was expected to demonstrate Greece's determination to the Allies. On 23 February the Allies heard the Turkish views. Although there were two Turkish delegations at the conference, İstanbul's representative, Tevfik Paşa, ceded the floor to Bekir Sami Bey. As a result, the Ankara government's view was heard as the Turkish view. Bekir Sami Bey started off by repeating that Ankara did not recognize the Treaty of Sèvres. He went on to demand the withdrawal of Greek troops from Thrace and İzmir, the evacuation of İstanbul by the Allies, and the recognition of Turkish sovereignty over the Straits.

After Bekir Sami Bey's speech, the Allies presented their views on the revisions they were prepared to make in the Treaty of Sèvres. These were minor changes in the terms relating to Istanbul and the Straits, the Financial Commission, minorities, and Armenia. The contemplated changes were far from meeting Ankara's expectations. In regard to the revisions dealing with İzmir, the city would remain under Turkish sovereignty; but a Greek armed presence would remain in the city, and law and order would be maintained by a force of gendarmes under Allied command and reflecting the ethnic composition of the city's population. The administration would be under a Christian governor to be designated by the LoN. He would be assisted by an elected general assembly and an administrative assembly. The governor would be responsible for delivering to the Turkish government a specific proportion of the city's tax revenues. This status would be reviewed in five years upon the request of one of the two sides. It was also proposed that a census be held in the region to determine the size of the Turkish and Greek populations. There was no question of Ankara accepting these terms, but the Turkish delegation left London with the request that it be given twenty-four days to examine them further. Upon Bekir Sami's return to Ankara, the agreements that he had signed while on this trip were sharply criticized at the TGNA and were not ratified. Bekir Sami himself was dismissed.

The Greek Army's Advance on Afyon and Eskişehir and the Second Battle of İnönü

Even before the Turkish delegation returned to Ankara from the London Conference, the Greek army had launched its offensive. As on the previous occasion two months earlier, it thrust forward from Bursa to Eskişehir and from Uşak to Afyon farther south. On 27 March it occupied Afyon without meeting serious resistance. In the north it was confronted by a regular army under İsmet Paşa's command. This force held fortified positions and was armed beyond the expectation of the advancing Greek army. The clashes started at the İnönü positions on 27 March and lasted three days, after which the Greek army started an orderly retreat on 1 April. The Greeks were meeting their first reverse because of their attack plan, hastily conceived without a proper appraisal of the adversary's forces. The Greek haste was due to the perceived need to deal a crushing blow to Ankara before it had time to get its military forces properly organized. In their haste the Greek commanders were unable to perceive that the forces they were confronting were no longer the opponents of 1920.

Despite this setback the Greek general staff continued its probes, seeking a military victory. The second operation had been undertaken with the arrival of reinforcements. Now a better-prepared summer operation would be undertaken in order to strike a decisive blow at Ankara. Reservists were quickly mobilized, and the size of the Greek army in Anatolia was doubled, reaching 200,000 men at its peak strength. Most of these soldiers were not adequately trained or subject to proper military discipline.

The Greeks had not lost hope, but the second Battle of İnönü provided Ankara with important diplomatic dividends. The Italians had started their evacuation of Antalya in June. France sent Henri Franklin-Bouillon and initiated peace negotiations, while evacuating Zonguldak. Britain released forty of the Malta exiles in April and made proposals through Gen. Charles Harrington to initiate peace talks. The talks were unproductive, but the government of the TGNA gained prestige in the eyes of the Allies.

While Greece was pressing on with preparations for a new offensive, Britain made an attempt at mediation in June. Having completed its preparations for an offensive, Greece rebuffed Britain. It knew well that it had to win a decisive victory over Ankara if it was going to keep alive its hopes of establishing itself in Anatolia. The talks between the government of the TGNA and General Harrington proved inconclusive, and Britain realized that the two armies were destined to settle their scores on the battlefield. Thereupon Britain decided to relax its policy of neutrality, adopted after the Greek election of November 1920, and tilt toward Greece. At that point Britain would be helpful by opening the Straits to Greek shipping and allowing these ships to carry supplies to Anatolia from Istanbul and other Marmara Sea locations. Depending on developments, weapons and financial assistance were also to be provided at a later stage. Greece understood that Britain's position would become clearer after the military operation.

The Battle of Sakarya

On 10 July the Greek army resumed its advance for the third time in seven months. As on the previous occasions, the objective was to capture the rail link between Eskişehir and Afyon. But this time a different strategy was being followed. All of the Greek forces would converge on Kütahya and then swing north to Eskişehir. Kütahya was captured on 17 July. On that day Mustafa Kemal went to the front and ordered the army to retreat. While the Turkish army was trying to delay the Greek advance with rearguard action, an effort was being made to move military supplies eastward by rail. By the time Eskişehir fell on 19 July the Turkish had already evacuated the city, and by 25 July all of the Turkish forces had retreated east of the Sakarya River. The Greeks were beginning to think that the road to Ankara was now open to their forces.

Mustafa Kemal was implementing the policy of pulling back despite the strong domestic opposition. In doing this he was risking his political fortune. His objective was to draw the Greek army away from its operational center while regrouping his own forces. Although he drew strong criticism in the TGNA, he was allowed to assume the supreme command with special powers for a period of three months.

On 14 August the Greek army left its positions east of Eskişehir and started its march on Ankara. After advancing for nine days in territory inhabited by an alien population, it encountered the Turkish army on 24 August. Following pitched battles that lasted three weeks, the Turkish army counterattacked and pushed the Greek forces west of the Sakarya River. As the Greek army retreated toward Eskişehir, it was destroying everything that could be of use to the Turks: railroad bridges were being blown up, and evacuated villages were being torched.

For Greece, the Battle of Sakarya was the end of the dream to impose Sèvres on Ankara by force of arms. Sakarya was to lead to a series of diplomatic successes for Ankara. On 13 October the Treaty of Kars was signed with Azerbaijan, Armenia, and Georgia; on 20 October the Treaty of Ankara with France; on 23 October an agreement for the exchange of prisoners with Britain.

The Battle of Sakarya caused profound demoralization among the people of Greece. There was widespread skepticism about Greece's war aims. The army in Anatolia was suffering from serious shortages, providing Communists with opportunities to intensify their pacifist propaganda to the soldiers.

The majority of the Anatolian Greeks held the king and the royalist government responsible. After the 1920 election the National Defense Movement based in Istanbul, consisting of Venizelos backers, intensified its activities. In the election for patriarch held on 6 December 1921, Meletios Metaksakis, a Cretan cleric, was chosen despite the opposition of Athens. Metaksakis was pro-Venizelos and opposed to the monarchy. From then on, the idea of an independent Ionian state started gathering increasing support. The adherents of the idea were mostly the Greeks of Thrace and western Anatolia. Those who lived in central Anatolia, known as the Orthodox of Karaman, had started shifting their support to the government of the TGNA (Box 1-21).

The General Offensive

The development of the national defense movement in Anatolia started raising concern in Athens and led to a change in the high command of the army prior to the General Offensive. Papoulas, the commander-in-chief of the Anatolian armies, was dismissed and replaced by the commander of the army in Thrace, Georgios Hacianestis. This officer had no Anatolian experience, was a strict disciplinarian, and had a poor reputation among the ranks because of personality problems. The last-minute change in the command would be one of the weaknesses of the Greek army in the decisive encounter.

Feeling itself under growing pressure, the Greek government made an appeal to Britain for immediate help. The government warned Britain that without such help it would evacuate Anatolia unilaterally, leaving Britain alone to sort out its problems with Mustafa Kemal. The help being sought from Britain was not just moral support

Box 1-21. Papa Eftim and the Turkish Orthodox Patriarchate

The members of the community known as the Karamanlıs were of the Orthodox Christian faith but spoke Turkish as their mother tongue. They lived in the region of Konya, Niğde, Nevşehir, Kayseri, and Ankara. There are different theories about their origins. According to some historians, these people were of Greek extraction; but as the Turks settled in Anatolia, they gave up their own language and shifted to Turkish. According to other historians, the Karamanlıs were among the earliest Turkish settlers of Anatolia. Having encountered Christianity before Islam, they adopted the Christian faith.

Because the Karamanlis lived in the interior, they remained immune to Greek nationalism for a long time. It was only toward the end of the nineteenth century that Greek nationalism started directing its attention at the Karamanlis. During the War of Liberation, their stance differed from that of the other Christian populations. In April 1921 they sent telegrams to several newspaper editors, declaring that they wanted to break away from the Phanar Patriarchate for pursuing policies detrimental to the state. Their aim, they declared, was to set up a Turkish Orthodox Patriarchate, since they were Turks. Like the Bulgarians, they had a right to have their own independent national church. Subsequently they applied to their local governors to register their claims formally.

The Karamanlis were led by the acting bishop of Keskin, Pavli Eftim, who took the family name Erenerol after 1934 and was known as Papa Eftim. Papa Eftim remained in permanent contact with M. Kemal and actively supported the cause of the National Struggle. He worked hard not only in the region of Keskin but also in adjacent districts to block the subversive activities of the agents of the Phanar Patriarchate.

Immediately after the General Offensive on 29 August an ecclesiastical congress was convened on 21 September 1922 under the presidency of Prokobios, the archbishop of Konya. In this congress, where eighty ecclesiastical districts were represented by seventy-two clerics, the Turkish Orthodox Patriarchate was founded, with a Holy Synod of twelve laymen. An account of the proceedings was then sent to the TGNA. This Turkish Orthodox Patriarchate was never recognized by the Patriarchate of Phanar.

Papa Eftim identified himself not as a friend of the Turks but as an authentic Turk. Mustafa Kemal described his services during the National Struggle as being as valuable as the services of an army. Papa Eftim was the bearer of the Independence Medal (Istiklal Madalyası), awarded to the veterans of the War of Liberation. And yet he was unable to spare his community of Karamanlis from the "catastrophe" of the postwar exchange of populations. During the exchange he moved to Istanbul to set up his own church and to continue his struggle with the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Phanar. Small to begin with, the community dwindled with the passage of time. While the Turkish government lent him support in the first instance, its interest waned as Turkish-Greek relations developed in the 1930s.

Papa Eftim died on 14 March 1968 and was succeeded by his son, Turgut Erenerol. When Turgut Erenerol passed away, the community consisted of just the Erenerol family.

but tangible aid. Britain was also reminded that British Middle East policy would come apart if Greece removed itself from the struggle. While Britain's reply to the request for tangible aid was negative, it proposed a meeting of the three Allies in Paris to seek a diplomatic solution to the Anatolian problem.

On 22 March 1922 the foreign ministers of Britain, France, and Italy met in Paris. On 27 March telegrams were sent to Athens and Ankara, in which the three ministers declared that they had met to restore peace in the Middle East and secure the evacuation of Anatolia without loss of life or property. To this end they demanded an immediate armistice, during which the two sides would refrain from reinforcing their armies.

The next day the three Allies communicated their peace terms:

- A. The LoN would get directly involved in the protection of minorities in both Turkey and Greece, in the implementation of rules to secure such protection, and in the establishment of an Armenian homeland.
- B. To secure the freedom of the Straits, a demilitarized zone would be established in the Gallipoli peninsula and in the region of the Straits.
- C. The boundary in Thrace would be redrawn to al- low Turkey to retain Tekirdağ and Greece to hold Kırkkilise, Babaeski, and Edirne.

- D. İzmir would remain Turkish, but the Greek population of the city, as well as the Turks of Edirne, would be fairly represented in the two city administrations.
- E. After the conclusion of peace İstanbul would be evacuated by the Allies.
- F. The ceiling placed on the Turkish armed forces by the Treaty of Sèvres would be raised from 50,000 to 85,000 men and the Turkish military would still be professional soldiers.
- G. The Financial Commission would be abolished, while a system would be devised to reconcile Turkey's sovereignty with the protection of the economic interests of the Allies and the payment of war reparations.
- H. A committee would be set up to secure revisions in the judicial and economic capitulations.

While Greece responded positively to the Allied proposal for an armistice, it did not accept the peace terms. The minister of foreign affairs of the government of the TGNA, Yusuf Kemal [Tengirşenk], declared that Turkey would accept an armistice only on the condition that there would be a concurrent evacuation of Anatolia. If agreement was reached on this point, Turkey would be ready to dispatch its delegates within three weeks to negotiate the peace terms.

The Allies refused to evacuate Anatolia concurrently with an armistice. They declared that such an evacuation would be considered only if Ankara accepted all of the peace terms. While these diplomatic contacts were going on, Ankara completed its preparations to deal the final blow to the Greek army, which Ankara knew was in a precarious situation.

The offensive was launched on 26 August. Within a short time the Greek lines were breached and the Greek army was in full retreat. The Greek forces had practically lost their contact with İzmir, and the orders coming from there bore no relation to the situation on the ground. The officers in the battlefield were acting on their own initiatives. By 30 August the Greek army had been effectively destroyed at the Battle of the Commander-in-Chief. After that, Hacianestis was dismissed by Athens and replaced by Gen. Nikolaos Trikoupis as commander-in-chief. Trikoupis would be informed of his appointment by Mustafa Kemal after being captured in Uşak.

Following a chase lasting ten days, the Turkish army entered İzmir on 9 September. It was now the turn of the Turks to display their jubilation the way the Greeks had done on 15 May 1919. Much confusion accompanied the jubilation, however. The Greek population of the region was also fleeing, along with the defeated Greek army. They were fearful of the possible consequences of four years of hostile occupation. İzmir was overrun by refugees. All available craft were desperately trying to ferry people to the offshore islands. One day before the arrival of the Turkish army in İzmir, the Greek navy weighed anchor and, amid the saluting Allied warships, sailed to Çeşme to evacuate the remnants of the Greek army.

Although law and order was restored after the Turkish army entered the city, individual killings were going on. It was impossible to control the urge for revenge resulting from four years of enmity between the non-Muslim and Muslim populations. The most striking instance was the lynching of the archbishop of İzmir by a crowd at the instigation of "Bearded" Nurettin Paşa. On 13 September the city was to suffer a terrible fate. A fire broke out in the district inhabited by non-Muslims (Punta, the present-day Alsancak) and spread rapidly to reach the waterfront. The responsibility for this fire is still a matter of dispute among historians. The majority of Turkish historians claim that it was the Greeks or the Armenians who started the fire, while Greek and European historians assert that it was the Turks, driven by feelings of revenge, who started the fire.

In any case, the result was plain: some quarters of İzmir were turned to ash.

The Turkish army entered Bursa on 10 September and Bandirma and Mudanya on 17 September. The advance toward Çanakkale and the Straits was proceeding despite the diplomatic efforts of the Allies, and only a narrow strip of neutral territory remained between the Turkish and British troops. Although the Turkish units entered Çanakkale on 23 September and the neutral zone the next day, diplomatic contacts were taking place to conclude an armistice. Thanks to Mustafa Kemal's wisdom and statesmanship, the Chanak affair (see "Relations with Britain" above) did not lead to fighting and the armistice talks (see "The Armistice of Mudanya" below) could get underway.

On 19 October Refet Paşa [Bele] was appointed governor of Eastern Thrace and charged with the duty of taking over the region from the occupation authority. When it became apparent that the Turkish army would enter Thrace, the Christian population started evacuating the region and moving to Western Thrace. Within a short period thousands of refugees had moved to Greece, leaving their homes and property behind. When the refugees arrived in Western Thrace, they took possession of the property and livestock of the Muslim population of that region. Once again it was the civilians on both sides who were suffering the consequences of war.

In October 1922 the Turkish-Greek war came to an end. This war demonstrated once again that the flow of history cannot be reversed. The Greek army charged into Anatolia with the dream of restoring the multinational Byzantine Empire and came to grief at the hands of the Turkish army, which was seeking to break away from the multinational Ottoman Empire and create a nation-state. Given the historic trend, the result could not have been otherwise: the twentieth century was to be the century of nationalism and of the nation-state. Turkey and Greece accepted this reality at Lausanne and established the foundation of a new relationship between the two countries.

Relations with the Middle East

Although the term "Middle East" is widely used today, it was employed for the first time in World War II when Britain established the Middle East Command in Egypt. Previously the region had been known as the Near East. Both terms reflected a European vantage point; the region was east of Europe but closer than the Far East.

The confusion in the terminology is also reflected in the different ways in which the region is delimited.

In its broadest sense the Middle East stretches from Morocco in the west to Afghanistan and Pakistan in the east and from Turkey in the north to Ethiopia in the south. Some scholars include India, the Balkan Peninsula, and even the Caucasus. There are also more restrictive descriptions of the Middle East.

In this book the Middle East is understood to be the region stretching from Egypt to Pakistan. It includes Egypt, Turkey, Iran, Afghanistan and Pakistan, the countries of the Fertile Crescent (Iraq, Israel, Jordan, Lebanon, and Syria), and the countries of the Arabian Peninsula (Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Kuwait, Oman, and Yemen).

Many ethnic and religious groups coexist in the Middle East, the birthplace of writing and of the three monotheistic religions. Arabs are the dominant ethnic group, followed by Turks, Iranians, Pakistanis, Kurds, Jews, Afghans, Armenians, Assyrians, Beluchis, and Copts (Box 1-22).

The region is just as complex in religious composition. There is a majority of Muslims, who share the region with Christians and Jews. Two-thirds of the Muslims are Sunni and the remainder Shiite. In addition, there are the Kharijites, Nusairi, and Druze sects. Among the Christians, the Orthodox, who owe allegiance to the Patriarchate of İstanbul, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria, are in a majority. Other churches broke away in the fourth and fifth centuries, including the Gregorian Armenian, Coptic, Nestorian, Syrian, and Maronite churches, plus the Melchite Catholic, Armenian Catholic, Coptic Catholic, and Chaldean churches. To this should be added the Roman Catholics and the Protestants. Another small group is the Yezidis. Religious affiliations frequently cut across ethnic groups (see Box 1-22, following page).

After the nineteenth century the Middle East started attracting the attention of the great powers, especially after the discovery of oil. The region quickly became a scene of competition among the powers. The complex religious and ethnic structure of the area became even more complicated with the advent of nationalism. This mix turned the Middle East into a bundle of unresolved problems that have remained with us to this day.

While it was striving to establish its nation-state and afterward, Turkey had its face turned to the West, in keeping with its basic ideology. This orientation meant that its relations with the Middle East, and especially with the Arab countries, remained limited. But a number of factors helped change this course, including geography, history, and culture. However much it had its eyes fixed on Europe, the Middle Eastern countries were Turkey's neighbors. Just as it was a Balkan and a Caucasus country, it was also a Middle Eastern country and could not avoid relations with the Middle East to deal with common problems.

In addition to geography, the region also shared a long common history. Ottoman sovereignty was established over the Middle East in the sixteenth century. With the exception of Iran, Afghanistan, and Pakistan, the countries of the Middle East lived under Ottoman administration for centuries and conducted their initial nationalistic struggles against the Ottomans. This long common existence created many positive and negative sentiments among the countries involved. When Turkey or the Middle Eastern countries probe into their past, they cannot avoid running into their joint history. The ties of history bind Turkey firmly to the Middle East.

Despite its secular official structure, Turkey's population is overwhelmingly Muslim, sharing many common cultural traits with the peoples of the Middle East. Shared religious beliefs bring the people closer together, irrespective of the state of official relations. While Turkey is not an Arab country and its state structure is not based on Islam, its Muslim background ensures that it will remain inextricably linked to the Middle East.

I. RELATIONS WITH ARAB COUNTRIES

When the Mudros Armistice was signed on 30 October 1918, the British army had just occupied Aleppo and had reached the southern regions of Mosul and İskenderun. At the time, the Ottoman forces holding the front against the British consisted of the 6th Army under the command of Ali İhsan Paşa [Sabis] in Mosul; the 2nd Army with headquarters in Adana, attached to the Lightning Group of Armies under the command of Otto Liman von Sanders; and the 7th Army at Raco. In addition there were some forces in Tripoli and Bengazi and three units attached to the Lightning Group of Armies in the Arabian Peninsula: the Mobile Force of Hijaz under the command of the governor of Medina, Fahreddin Paşa [Türkkan]; a division at Asir under Muhiddin Paşa; and an army corps in Yemen under Tevfik Paşa.

A. The Mudros Armistice and Subsequent Developments

When we look at the military arrangements made in the Middle East after the Mudros Armistice, we see the implementation of article 5, which calls for the immediate demobilization of the Turkish army other than the forces needed to control the frontiers and maintain internal order. Article 16 stipulated that all garrisons in Hijaz, Asir, Yemen, Syria, and Iraq must surrender to the nearest Allied command; all forces in Cilicia except for the forces needed for the purposes mentioned in article 5 were to be evacuated. Article 17 provided that all Turkish officers in Tripoli and Bengazi should surrender to the nearest Italian garrison. Article 18 stated that all ports under occupation in Tripoli and Bengazi, including Misrata, should be surrendered to the Allies. Concerning military occupation, only article 10 stipulated that the railroad tunnels in the Taurus Mountains would come under Allied occupation.

No boundaries were traced in Mudros; nor was it clear which areas were included in the regions of Syria, Iraq, and Cilicia that were mentioned in article 16. When M. Kemal took over the command of the Lightning Group

Box 1-22. The Suryanis

The Suryani, as the ancient people of the Middle East identify themselves, is a name that can be translated into English alternatively as Syriacs, Syrians, Assyrians, and Assyrian-Chaldeans. Their numbers have dwindled in recent years in Turkey. Their history is very complex but can best be summarized in the following manner.

When dealing with Christian sects in the Middle East, we must first examine the term "Suryani," which is often confused with ethnic groups. "Suryani" has one broad and several narrow definitions. In the broad sense the Suryani are the source of several other sects. These are the first Christians, the Arameans (Arami), meaning "people of the mountain" in Chaldean. The Arameans were a Semitic tribe that spread its language throughout the Middle East, Jesus spoke Aramaic.

When differences in doctrine on the nature of Christ arose, the Christians split into two groups at the Council of Chalcedony in 451 AD. The first group accepted the council's ruling that Christ had a divine and human nature. These were known as Rumi (meaning Roman), also known as Melchites (Melkai or the emperor's men; they were the Byzantines, the forebears of the present-day Greek Orthodox Church). According to them, the two natures of Christ were unmixable, unalterable, and inseparable. The second group rejected the council's ruling and became known as the Monophysites. They maintained that Christ has one nature, partly divine and partly human, and they broke away from the Eastern church (in Byzantium). Seen from a political perspective, they were the ones who wanted to get rid of the Byzantine influence. It is said that they welcomed the outcome of the Battle of Malazgirt (the Turkish victory against the Byzantines in 1071). The Coptic, Suryani, and Armenian churches can be classified as Monophysite. After this there were splits within the Suryani Church.

The first to break away were the Nestorians (Nasturi), also known as the eastern Suryani and Assyrians (Asuri). When the teaching of Nestorios, the patriarch of Constantinople, that the divine and human natures of Christ were separate was rejected by the Councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedony (451), the Nestorians broke away. They stressed the human nature of Christ. The Nestorians developed in Syria and Anatolia and came under the influence of Iran.

In 1445 the Nestorians broke into two groups. (1) the Cypriots, who accepted the teachings of the Roman Church (that is, Catholicism); and (2) those who did not, known as Assyrians in the narrow sense.

The group that broke away from the Nestorians in 1551 and united with the Roman Church became known as the Chaldeans (Keldani). This term was used for the first time by the pope to distinguish the Cypriot Nestorians who were linked to Rome from the Assyrians.

With the breaking away of the Nestorians, the remainder were referred to as Jacobites (Yakubi) and also West Suryani or just Suryani. These are the ones who remained under Byzantine influence.

Some of the Jacobites came under the influence of the Jesuit and Capuchin missionaries and broke away in 1656 to form the Suryani Catholics. The remainder would be referred to as Suryani Orthodox. The famous Deir Zafaran (Deyrulzafaran) monastery at Mardin; dating back to the fifth century, belongs to the Suryani Orthodox sect.

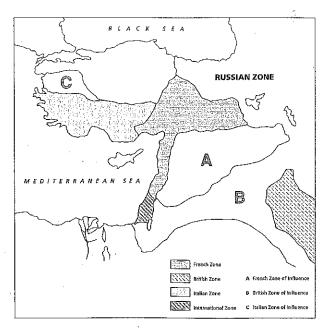

of Armies for a short spell after the armistice, he asked the Ministry of War what was intended by Syria and Cilicia. The ministry replied that Syria included only the vilayet of Damascus, from which Aleppo, where three-quarters of the population were Turkish even if they spoke Arabic, was excluded. The ministry also added that the regions of Iskenderun, Antakya, Cebelseman, Katma, and Kilis had Turkish populations. There was no doubt in Istanbul that Mosul, where the 6th Army was deployed, was Turkish territory.

But the British did not share this view. Mosul had been the subject of tough bargaining during World War I. To implement the agreement in a way that would safeguard British interests, it was essential to bring Mosul under British administration. Furthermore, oil had been discovered in the Mosul region, with indications of more deposits elsewhere in the area. The question went beyond the simple apportionment of land.

As a matter of fact, Britain started occupying the lands it had not been able to overrun during the war, even though the Mudros Armistice contained no provisions to justify such action. A week after the signing of the armistice, Britain occupied Aleppo and İskenderun on 9 November. Britain subsequently allowed France to take over these places.

A similar development proved to be more problematic in Mosul, because the Turkish commander Ali İhsan Pasa refused to evacuate the region. Britain was convinced that it must take over the area without delay, so it claimed that the local Armenians were evacuating Mosul out of fear for their safety. With this pretext Britain invoked article 7 of the armistice agreement, which allowed Allied occupation to restore order, and demanded the withdrawal of Turkish forces. Ali İhsan Paşa rejected the British claims and declared that all the measures were in place in the city to ensure the maintenance of order. On 7 November he was notified that if the Ottoman army failed to evacuate Mosul by 15 November he would be held personally accountable for any loss of life. Istanbul remained passive in the affair, and Ali İhsan Paşa did not want to act on his own initiative, so the evacuation of the city started on 8 November. The British flag was hoisted on the building that housed the governor's office. By 15 November Mosul was totally under British control.

Although the secret Sykes-Picot Agreement had allocated the region to France, Britain had no intention of allowing this oil-rich region to pass into French hands (Box 1-23). In December 1918 French premier Clemenceau agreed to allow Mosul to be included in the British zone of influence. Thus began the Mosul question, which was to be a source of tension between Britain and Turkey and to which a solution could not be found at the Lausanne Conference.

B. Conflicting Interests over the Middle East at the 1919 Paris Peace Conference and the Arab Policies of the Representative Delegation (Heyet-i Temsiliye)

In January 1919 the conflicts of interest among the participants of the Paris Peace Conference came to the surface. During the war Britain had made overlapping promises to its allies and to the Arabs and Jews in secret agreements, and now each contender wanted its piece of territory. When the peace conference got underway, Iraq, Syria, and Palestine were under British occupation and Cilicia under French occupation. Emir Faisal had established his administration in Damascus.

During the conference Britain was striving to reconcile the conflicting French, Arab, and Zionist interests. France indicated that after Mosul it would accept no other changes to the arrangements made in the course of the war. The spokesman for the Arabs, Emir Faisal, signed an agreement on 3 January 1919, in which he allowed Jewish immigration to Palestine in return for the promise of independence. The Zionist delegation sought to have the Balfour Declaration adopted at the conference and to secure a British mandate over Palestine.

At the beginning of the conference President Wilson was the principal actor, declaring that the wartime secret accords were invalid. He took a stand in favor of

Box 1-23. Secret Agreements on the Middle East

After the Bolshevik revolution of 1917 the socialist government in Moscow revealed the contents of secret inter-Allied agreements on the Middle East. This created an uproar, not only because it exposed the secret appropriation of territories but also because it laid bare how Britain had made promises about the disposition of the same territory to both Arabs and Zionists.

Agreements Signed among the Allies

The Agreement on Istanbul (18 March 1915): the document signed by Britain, France, and Russia contained provisions for turning the Straits into a free port, while Russia recognized that Britain and France had special rights over Turkey's Asian territories. The Muslim holy sites would be detached from Turkey and, together with Arabia, placed under Muslim control.

The London Agreement (26 April 1915): when it became necessary to review the Istanbul Agreement after Italy joined the war on the side of the Allies, a new agreement was signed by Britain, France, Russia, and Italy. By this agreement the Dodecanese Islands (under Italian occupation since 1912) as well as Libya were promised to Italy. Italy was acknowledged to have special rights in the Mediterranean and was promised a share in the Antalya region.

The Sykes-Picot Agreement (16 May 1916): the foreign ministers of Britain and France signed this agreement to partition the Middle Eastern territories of the Ottoman state. Although prior Russian agreement had been sought for this agreement on 26 April, it was kept secret from the Italians as well as from the Arabs. Under its terms, (1) Erzurum, Trabzon, Van, Bitlis, Muş, and Siirt would be given to Russia. (2) France would get coastal Syria, the vilayet of Adana in Cilicia, and the regions of Antep-Mardin, Aladag-Kayseri, and Egin-Harput. (3) Britain was to receive southern Iraq (including Baghdad) and the ports of Haifa and Acre in Palestine. (4) A confederation of Arab states or an Independent Arab state would be established in the region between the territories under British and French sovereignty. But here too there would be a division into British and French zones of influence. Syria's hinterland and Mosul would be under French influence, while Britain's zone of influence would extend from Palestine to the Iranian border. (5) Iskenderun (Alexandretta) would become a free port. (6) Palestine would be placed under international administration.

The Agreement of St.-Jean-de-Maurienne (17 April 1917): to appease the Italians, who had become aware of the Sykes-Picot Agreement, they were offered the region between İzmir and Antalya, including Konya, as well as a zone of influence to the north of this region.

Talks between Britain and Arab Nationalists

The British decided to provide financial aid and weapons to Sharif Hussein, who proposed to start an armed revolt against the Ottoman Empire. At the same time, the borders of the Independent Arab kingdom that would be established after the war were traced. Once the agreement in principle had been reached, the Arab revolt was started in June 1916. On 2 November 1916 Sharif Hussein declared himself "King of the Arab Lands."

(M. FIRAT)

self-determination and proposed that a committee be set up to determine which Arab territories would come under which country's mandate. When Britain and France opposed this proposal, the U.S. set up the King-Crane Commission to report on the situation in the region (Box1-24).

The report of the King-Crane Commission was never considered at the conference. By the time the document appeared (28 August), President Wilson had left the conference because of negative reactions back in the U.S. Britain and France ignored this report that reflected the wishes of the local inhabitants.

When it became clear that the Paris Conference was not going to fulfill the expectations of the Arabs, their nationalist movement took a stand against Britain and especially France. Uprisings broke out in different localities. At this stage Arab nationalists established some contacts with Turkish nationalists, who had also taken a stand against occupation; but nothing much came from these contacts. Nevertheless, it is on the record that there was increasing sympathy in Syria for the Turks, that the press was supporting Mustafa Kemal's movement, and that he was using every opportunity to urge the Syrians to resort

Box 1-24. The King-Crane Commission

The U.S. government set up a commission consisting of Dr. Henry C. King (the president of Oberlin College in the U.S.) and Charles Crane (an American businessman). The commission went to the Middle East in May-July 1919 and submitted a report on its findings on 28 August, According to this report, the Arabs of Syria and Palestine wanted a fully independent Syrian state that included Palestine and Lebanon. Failing this, they were in favor of an American or British mandate. In any case they were opposed to a French mandate and to Zionism. The commission made the following recommendations. Syria should become a kingdom under Emir Faisal and include Palestine. It should be placed under a U.S. or British mandate, with an international administration to oversee the holy places in Palestine. The committee members also spoke to the Iraqi Arabs and determined that they wanted full independence and were against their country becoming a mandated territory. The committee therefore made no recommendation regarding a country to take over the mandate there. The state of Iraq would be established within the Diyarbakir, Mosul, and Mohammara triangle and come under the rule of Emir Abdullah or Emir Zeid. The commission also had talks with the leaders of the Kürdistan Teali Cemiyeti (Association for the Development of Kurdistan).

(M. FIRAT)

to arms and resist the attempts of foreign powers to dismember their country.

When British troops evacuated Syria and Cilicia in November 1919 and were replaced by French troops, contacts with Arab nationalists intensified. M. Kemal made maximum use of this opportunity. Salahi R. Sonyel has summarized the Arab policies of the Representative Delegation thus: "To secure the cooperation of the inhabitants of the Arab lands lying beyond the southern frontiers of Turkey; to force the French to fight on two fronts and thereby compel them to reach an agreement with Turkish nationalists on Cilicia; to foment trouble on the Iraqi border in order to harass the British" (Sonyel 1995, pp. 194–95).

Whatever goals the Turkish and Arab nationalists may have pursued in their contacts and whatever the actual policies of the Representative Delegation may have been, the official Arab policy of the government of the TGNA took shape in the National Pact.

C. Arab Policies from the National Pact to Sèvres

As we have already seen, the National Pact embodying the objectives of the War of Liberation was adopted on 28 January 1920 by the last Ottoman Parliament. Its first article enunciated the policy vis-à-vis the Arabs. It provided that the future of those Ottoman territories with Arab majorities that were under enemy occupation on 30 October 1918 when the armistice was signed should be determined by the freely expressed will of their inhabitants. The Turkish nationalists acknowledged the right of the Arabs to self-determination but placed three conditions on where this right would apply: there must be an Arab majority, this majority must be settled, and the area must be under enemy occupation on 30 October 1918. By these criteria Mosul and Iskenderun were included within the National Pact boundaries and excluded from Arab territories whose future would be determined by plebiscite.

Although Turkey's national policy envisaged self-determination for the Arabs, international politics would not allow this to happen. At the preparatory conference that opened on 24 April 1920 the mandate treaties previously adopted at San Remo were signed. Under this system France was given Syria and Britain was given Iraq and Palestine. Article 4 of the mandate agreement that France signed with the LoN provided that France could not relinquish any portion of its mandate to another state. Britain added the Balfour Declaration to its mandate agreement on Palestine (Box 1-25).

Box 1-25. The Balfour Declaration

During World War I the Zionist movement under Chaim Weizmann was in constant contact with the governments of Britain and the U.S. As a result of these contacts, the British foreign secretary, Lord A. J. Balfour, sent a letter to Lord Walter Rothschild, who was Jewish, Informing him that his government viewed the Jewish Zionist aspirations with sympathy and would provide every facility to secure the establishment of a homeland for the Jews in Palestine on condition that this did not prejudice the civil and religious rights of the non-Jewish Inhabitants of Palestine and that the rights and political status of Jews in other countries also would not be affected. By setting up a national home for Jews in the territory that was promised to Sharif Hussein as part of the Arab Kingdom, Britain was sowing the seeds of the conflict that has lasted to our day.

(M. FIRAT)

The Syrian National Assembly, which met in March, declared that Greater Syria had been established, including Palestine and Jordan, and proclaimed Faisal king of Syria. The French administration in Syria realized that it would not be able to rule the country without getting rid of the nationalists in Faisal's circle, whereupon it launched a military operation in July. As a result the nationalists were routed, and Faisal was forced to flee the country.

Britain followed a wiser policy in its mandated territories. It operated on the assumption that its administration would be temporary and sought to preserve a good image with the local Arabs. To demonstrate that Britain kept its promises, it proclaimed Faisal king of Iraq and Abdullah king of Trans-Jordan at the Cairo Conference of 1921.

The Ottoman Empire gave its consent to these arrangements by articles 94 to 97 of the Treaty of Sèvres on 10 August 1920. Neither the İstanbul administration nor the TGNA ever ratified Sèvres, however, so Ankara's consent to these Western arrangements came from the Turkish-French agreement of 1921 and the Treaty of Lausanne of 1923.

D. Clashes with Britain and Kurdish Revolts

After reaching agreement with France on the demarcation of the Syrian frontier in 1921, Ankara directed its full attention to the Greek army on the western front. But at that time clashes were occurring with British forces on the Iraqi border.

After Sèvres, Britain's Kurdish policy underwent changes. It started pursuing policies that aimed to incorporate regions with Kurdish majorities in Iraq. This policy caused anger among the Kurdish tribes, which had been restless since April 1919. The Ankara government and Britain, who were feuding over Mosul, both used the discontented Kurds to achieve their ends. On 18 October 1921 British units supported by the Royal Air Force compelled the Turkish garrisons at Rania and Revanduz to retreat.

Further clashes occurred in 1922. Both sides wanted to improve their situation on the ground before entering into peace negotiations and launched attacks on one another's positions in the border regions. On M. Kemal's orders Ali Şefik el Mısri (also known as Özdemir Bey) was sent to Revanduz to harass the British. Upon completing his preparations, Özdemir Bey engaged the British forces. When the situation turned unfavorable for Britain, it reached an agreement with Sheikh Mahmut Berzenci, who had been living in exile in Baghdad. The agreement provided that Berzenci would dislodge the Turks from the region and take over its administration. When Berzenci arrived in Suleymaniyah on 30 September, however, he declared himself king and got into contact with the Turks. Soon Özdemir Bey and Berzenci were working together. The British found themselves in a tight fix, so they shifted their ground to the diplomatic field. One of the basic issues on which the British made no concessions at Lausanne was Mosul.

II. RELATIONS WITH NON-ARAB COUNTRIES

A. Relations with Iran

Relations with Iran were very cool during this period. This was in stark contrast with Ankara's ties to other Eastern countries. Furthermore, Soviet Russia was making intensive efforts to secure a united front against British imperialism through bilateral treaties between Moscow and Ankara, Kabul, and Tehran. The only one of these that failed to materialize was a treaty between Turkey and Iran.

Ankara was more eager than Tehran to improve ties between the two states. In June 1921 the minister of foreign affairs, Yusuf Kemal [Tengirşenk], declared in a speech delivered at the TGNA that "concrete steps were about to be taken in relations with Iran." This was in connection with the arrival in Ankara of an unofficial representative of Reza Khan. The first official contact with Iran took place a year later, however, when an Iranian delegation headed by the minister of education, Mumtaz-ud Dovled, visited Ankara in June 1922. This was reciprocated by the visit of a delegation headed by Muhiddin Paṣa [Akyüz] to Tehran. On 22 June 1922 Iran announced that it had decided to recognize Ankara and that it had appointed Mofag Khan

Box 1-26. The Basis of the Sunni-Shiite Conflict between the Ottoman Empire and Iran

Shah Ismail established the Safavid state in 1501 with Tabriz as its capital. From then until 1639 there was constant strife between the Safavid and Ottoman states. The reason for the chronic strife was that Istanbul represented Sunni Islam while Tabriz represented the Alevi form of Islam. But this religious difference had its roots in the differing infrastructure of the two countries. The Ottomans represented a sedentary order, while the economy of the Safavids was of a seminomadic nature. After the conquest of Istanbul, the Ottomans were making an effort to rid themselves of seminomadic elements and move on to a fully sedentary structure. The people who had established the Safavid state were the seminomadic Alevis Ilving in Anatolia. They had left the country because of the Ottoman pressure, conquered Iran, and imposed the Kizilbash form of Islam on the country.

It was not by coincidence that the Sunni-Alevi divide and the sedentary-migratory divide were in full concordance. The Sunni form responded to the hierarchical needs of a sedentary way of production, while the Alevi form corresponded to the simpler needs of a seminomadic mode of production. When the dominant mode of production shifted from seminomadic to sedentary in the first half of the seventeenth century in Iran, the country's sect was transformed from Alevi to Shiite, which, like the Sunni form, corresponded more closely to the sedentary mode of production.

Eshag as ambassador to Ankara. Ankara's first ambassador to Tehran, Muhiddin Paşa, was to present his credentials on 7 February 1923.

Despite these visits and the appointment of ambassadors, it was not possible to bridge the gap between Iran and Turkey and sign a treaty of friendship. There were very good reasons for this holding back.

- 1. The historic reason: relations between the Ottomans on the one hand and the Safavids and Qajars on the other were always characterized by lack of trust. This missing ingredient was due to the rivalry between Shiites and Sunnis; even when not in direct conflict, the two sides remained cool toward one another (Box 1-26).
- 2. Pan-Turanian policies: the Pan-Turanian policies pursued by Union and Progress during the latter stages of its hold on power were a source of concern for Iran, which had remained neutral in World War I. Despite its neutrality, Ottoman forces occupied the Iranian province of Azerbaijan and spread nationalist propaganda among its inhabitants. After the Ottoman evacuation, the Azerbaijanis under the leadership of Sheikh Muhammad Hiyabani proclaimed the socialist-oriented Republic of Azadistan.

It was not out of the question that the architect of these nationalist policies, Enver Paşa, might yet assume the

Box 1-27. Iran (Up to 1923)

In 1907 Britain and Russia agreed to divide fran into three zones of influence. When Russia's influence on Iran evaporated with the collapse of the tsarist regime in 1917, Britain took advantage of this situation and forced Iran to sign the treaty of 9 August 1919, which in effect brought all of Iran under British influence. The nationalists, however, who constituted a majority in the Majlis, refused to ratify the treaty. At that stage Britain was not up to using force to secure its objectives in Iran.

In its search for a way to counterbalance Britain, Iran sought a rapprochement with the Soviets, which resulted in the treaty of friendship signed in Moscow on 26 February 1921. Article 6 of this treaty gave the Soviets the right to intervene in Iran in the event of "Iran being occupied by another country [meaning Britain] or foreign troops being forcibly introduced into Iran for use against the Soviets."

Another reason for Iran's moving closer to the Soviets was the activity of separatist movements in northern Iran after. World War I. Iran reached an agreement with Soviet Russia to put an end to all foreign aid to the separatists, which helped the Tehran government to reestablish its authority throughout the country.

During this period the authority of the Turkmen Qajar dynasty, which had ruled Iran since the eighteenth century, was in decline. Real authority was shifting to the elected governments. Reza Khan, the commander of the Cossack regiment, the only disciplined force in the country, became minister of defense on 21 February 1921 and soon became the focus of power within these elected governments. In 1923 Reza Khan became prime minister in a coup and ended up as absolute ruler.

leadership of the Anatolia movement. Furthermore, it was not clear whether the nationalism of the Kemalists would or would not take a Pan-Turanian turn. It should not be forgotten that the ideologue of Kemalism, Ziya Gökalp, had once formulated a project known as Oğuzistan that would unite the Turks of Anatolia, Iran, Azerbaijan, and Turkmenistan. Iran was worried about an ethnic partition and that Turkey would encourage this.

- 3. The British factor: Iran did not want to rouse the anger of Britain through a premature recognition of Ankara. The political situation in Tehran was very unstable at the time (Box 1-27). Both the British and the Bolsheviks were exerting considerable pressure on Iranian governments. The reason for Iran's rapprochement with Moscow was to counterbalance British influence, strengthen internal stability, and thereby create the conditions that would allow Tehran to avoid having to implement the August 1919 treaty that Britain had imposed on Iran. The last thing Iran wanted to do was to antagonize Britain.
- 4. The question of the Kurdish tribes: after World War I a serious frontier dispute arose between Iran and Turkey. Actually, neither country had any objections to maintaining the common frontier as it was. In other words, it was not a question of establishing sovereignty over a given territory.

The Kurdish tribes living along the common border had begun to feel independent of any authority and were disturbing the peace on both sides of the border. They were able to evade punitive action by crossing over the border. This situation was creating tensions between the Turkish and Iranian frontier guards and even giving rise to occasional clashes.

The question came to a boil with the rebellion of the Kurdish leader Simko Aga. He had fought against the Armenians, so when he revolted on the Iranian side of the border he received the aid of Kazım Karabekir Paşa. Through this support Simko Aga was able to control the region from 1919 to 1922. Iran was able to put down the revolt only when Turkey withheld its support in August 1922.

5. Territorial claims: at the Paris Peace Conference Iran made a claim to Turkish territory in the east. Although this claim never reached the agenda of the conference, it soured the Turkish attitude to Iran. After Reza Khan took over the reins of power, the question of territorial claims was put to rest.

Actually, there was no real territorial dispute between the two countries. Iran had advanced the claim in order to extract possible concessions from Britain at a time when London was pressuring Iran to ratify the 1919 treaty.

For the first four reasons described above, Iran felt in no hurry to establish ties with Ankara. Even when ties were established in 1922, little cordiality existed. There were even occasional crises. This situation lasted until 1926.

B. Relations with Afghanistan

Afghanistan achieved its independence from Britain, even if it was only partial, in 1919. The policy of Afghanistan and its leader, Amanullah Khan, was to preserve this independence and set up stable institutions in the country (Box 1-28). The new government in Kabul was eager to establish ties with governments, such as the government in Ankara, that would contribute to the attainment of its objectives.

Even before formal ties were established between the governments, two individuals played a decisive role in setting the course of relations between Turkey and Afghanistan. The first was Tarzi Mahmut Bey, an Afghan national who completed his education in Istanbul and returned to his country. Tarzi was in good standing with both the king, Habibullah Khan, and his son and successor, Amanullah

Box 1-28. Afghanistan (Up to 1923)

Under the leadership of Amanullah Khan, Afghanistan obtained its limited independence from Britain by the Treaty of Rawalpindi, signed on 8 August 1919. Like Iran, Afghanistan sought a rapprochement with the Soviets to counterbalance the Britain. Two days after Iran signed a treaty with the Soviets, Afghanistan concluded a nonaggression treaty of friendship with the Soviets in Moscow on 28 February 1921. Nevertheless, contrary to the Soviet-Iranian example, Soviet-Afghan relations deteriorated, because Amanullah Khan was helping the Central Asian nations to resist the Bolsheviks. Along with Enver Paşa, Amanullah Khan was supporting the principal anti-Bolshevik independence movement in Central Asia: the Basmacı Uprising. Once the Soviet forces achieved supremacy in Central Asia, Afghan-Soviet relations started to improve.

Eventually a treaty of friendship was signed with Britain on 22 November 1921, allowing Afghanistan relative external autonomy. After this Amanullah Khan was to concentrate his attention on modernizing his country.

Khan. Tarzi persuaded both leaders to emulate Turkey in establishing institutions based on Western models. As a result, members of the Turkish elite, most of them army officers, were invited to Afghanistan to help in setting up institutions in the Western pattern (the first batch arrived in Afghanistan prior to the Balkan War).

The second individual was Cemal Paşa, a member of the Union and Progress troika. He reorganized the Afghan army and spoke up for Afghanistan in Europe. Cemal Paşa had Mustafa Kemal's support and kept him informed about his connections and activities in Afghanistan. Until he was killed in 1922, Cemal Paşa exerted a decisive influence on the relations between the two countries (Box1-29).

In 1920 the Ankara government appointed Abdurrahman Bey as its representative in Kabul. On 1 March 1921 a treaty was signed in Moscow between the Kabul and Ankara governments. This treaty had the support of the Soviet government. It was signed by Yusuf Kemal and Rıza Nur, members of the Turkish delegation then in Moscow, and the leader of the Afghan delegation, Muhammed Veli Khan. After the Treaty of Gümrü signed with Armenia on 2 December 1920, this was the second international agreement of the Ankara government. Article 1 of this treaty declares that "the Turkish State...considers it a duty to recognize the State of Afghanistan as fully independent." This demonstrates the desire of Afghanistan to have its independence recognized. Article 8 reflected Tarzi's efforts to get the Turkish elite involved in institution building in his country: "Turkey undertakes...to assist Afghanistan in the field of culture and to send officers and teachers." The cultural and technical assistance provided by the Ankara government would be the salient feature of the bilateral relations between the two countries for many decades.

In April 1921 Sultan Ahmad Khan took over his post as Afghanistan's ambassador in Ankara. Fahreddin Paşa [Türkkan] left Ankara in the same month, bound for Kabul as Turkey's ambassador. He had made a reputation for himself during World War I as the defender of Medina, which played a part in his appointment. In this way the common religion of the two nations was also being emphasized. Britain considered the appointment of a soldier an attempt to intervene in India in the event of a Muslim revolt and also believed that the Afghan-Turkish Treaty of 1 March 1921 had secret military clauses.

Actually, one clause in article 2 of the treaty directly threatened the interests of the British Empire and was designed to unleash a wave of decolonization throughout Asia: "The contracting parties declare that all eastern peoples have the right to be fully independent...they recognize the independence of the states of Bukhara and Khiva." Obviously, neither country had the material means to bring this about, but every allusion to the "independence of eastern nations" in an international agreement was of significance. That is why Britain's uneasiness was not groundless. Article 5 read: "The contracting parties undertake not to be a party to any treaty or convention...that would be detrimental to the interests of one of the parties." Therefore the treaty was more than a mutualsupport document. As a matter of fact, Article 4 showed that it was in the nature of a treaty of alliance: "Any one of the contracting parties...shall regard any attack by an imperialist state against the other contracting party as being directed against itself and accepts to repulse this attack with the means and possibilities at its disposal."

The relations that Ankara established with Afghanistan and the Indian Muslims were a source of concern for Britain and one of the important successes of Turkish foreign policy of the period.

C. Relations with the Indian Muslims and the Caliphate Movement

The Pan-Islamist policy of the Ottoman Empire during World War I and the declaration of a jihad (holy war) did not have the expected results on the world's Muslims. The Muslims of the Western empires fought under Christian flags against the Ottomans. Nonetheless, the caliphate in Istanbul stood as a symbol and gave hope of eventual independence to the Muslims living under colonial rule. This was especially valid for the Indian Muslims. When

Box 1-29. The Killing of Cemal Pasa and Afghanistan

When Cernal Paşa was returning to Afghanistan from Europe, he was killed by an Armenian in Tbillsi. There were rumors that this assassination had been planned in London or Moscow. It is a fact that both the USSR and Britain were uneasy about Cernal Paşa's activities in Afghanistan. Even Ankara was somewhat wary about his "mission."

London's uneasiness derived from the important role played by Cemal Paşa in modernizing the army of a country that had fought against Britain before gaining independence in 1919. Cemal Paşa went from Kabul to Berlin via Moscow and worked as Afghanistan's spokesman in Germany and France, trying hard to persuade those he met to recognize the independence of the country. Had Cemal Paşa not been slain, he might have persuaded Amanullah Khan to make an effort to recover Afghanistan's southern provinces, which had been ceded to Britain after the war of 1919.

Moscow was apprehensive because the 1921 Afghan-Soviet treaty had a clause that foresaw independence for the Khanates of Bukhara and Khiva following a plebiscite. The Soviets had Ignored this commitment, and the independence of these regions was now no longer on the agenda. Amanullah Khan was unhappy with this situation and might have given Cemal Paşa his support to join Enver Paşa's adventure in Central Asia.

Finally, Ankara was also uncomfortable because the perception was gaining ground that Cemal Paşa had assumed the leadership of Union and Progress. Cemal Paşa was restoring his links with former colleagues in Union and Progress and trying to present Pan-Islamism as one of Ankara's policy objectives. The disappearance of Cemal Paşa from the scene would allow Ankara's relations with Kabul to take their normal course.

(A. AKDEVELIOĞLU)

Istanbul was occupied and the institution of the sovereign caliphate appeared to be in danger, a wave of sympathy for the Anatolia movement swept through the Muslim community of India and led to the establishment of the Caliphate Movement, led by a Caliphate Committee with its seat in Bombay. The chairman of the committee was M. Chotani. The Caliphate Committee organized several meetings under the banner of the All India Caliphate Conference, with the earliest meeting taking place in November 1919.

The main objective of the leaders of the Caliphate Movement was to engage in anti-British activities in order to make progress on the road to independence. Its name implied saving the caliphate, but this was only a façade. As a matter of fact, the movement's attitude toward Ankara did not change when Ankara abolished the caliphate.

In May 1918 Lloyd George had promised the Indian Muslims that after the war the caliphate's sovereignty—at least in those regions with a Turkish majority—would not be affected. When it became clear that Lloyd George would not honor his promise, the Indian Muslim reaction got underway. In addition to Chotani, the spiritual leader of the Ismaili sect, Aga Khan III, and the future leader of Pakistan, Muhammed Ali Jinnah, were among those who joined the protest movement. The Muslim leaders were conveying their demands to the secretary for Indian affairs, E. S. Montague, or directly to the Foreign Office in London and threatening to start a revolt in India if their demands were not met. The demands of the Caliphate Movement and the objectives of Ankara were totally convergent. At that time, the Caliphate Movement was among the principal issues in India. More than 10,000 people took part in the demonstration organized in Bombay by the Caliphate Committee on 14 May 1919, one day before the landing of Greek troops in İzmir.

The Caliphate Movement had the following effects.

- 1. It contributed to the split between Hindus and Muslims in India: until then, the Muslims had been fighting British imperialism under the umbrella of the Congress Party. With their movement to save the caliphate, they asserted their separate identity from the Hindu majority. This became more manifest when the Muslims broke from the Congress Party and established the Muslim League. Mahatma Gandhi saw the danger of partition in these developments and consequently gave his full support to the Caliphate Movement. He also secured the participation of the Hindus in this struggle against British imperialism. Nevertheless, the majority of the activists in the Caliphate Movement were Indian Muslims.
- 2. A pro-Turkish lobby was established in London: to forestall any problems that the Caliphate Movement might create in India, Montague became a defender of Kemalist views. His reports were given a hearing at cabinet meetings in London. Venizelos was uneasy about the misgivings in London over the situation in India. To appease the Indian Muslims and reduce the influence of Montague in London, he felt compelled to propose the idea of preserving the caliphate in Istanbul even if the Turks were expelled from the city. He was thinking of a Vatican-type arrangement for the caliphate.

The effects of the Caliphate Movement were also seen in the House of Commons and in the British press, where the government's policy toward Islam was frequently questioned. The pressure of the Caliphate Movement on the British government's anti-Ankara policies was growing. On 19 September 1922, one day after the Greek evacuation of Anatolia was completed, British newspapers published "The Open Telegram of the Caliphate Committee to the British Public": "At a time when the Indian Muslims are in joy over the Kemalist victory, news is being received that the British government is seeking assistance from the colonies to engage in a possible new conflict with Turkey. God forbid!...It is impossible to describe the horror and revulsion that this news has provoked among the Indian public... Millions of Indian Muslim volunteers stand ready...to come to the assistance of their Turkish brothers."

3. This development had a sobering effect on France: it started worrying about the possibility of similar movements in its colonies. When formulating its policies toward Ankara, France felt the need to consider their possible effects on its possessions.

Furthermore, the representative of the Caliphate Committee in Europe, Muhammad Ali, also defended Ankara's position to the pope and the Italian government.

4. Financial assistance was secured: the Caliphate Committee established the İzmir Fund to secure the liberation of İzmir from Greek occupation and subsequently the Ankara Fund to help in the rehabilitation of Anatolia after the damage inflicted by the fleeing Greek forces. In all, 110,000 (or 125,000) gold pounds were collected in these funds. Some claimed that the amount collected was actually greater but that part of the money disappeared in Amsterdam or Paris on its way to Ankara. It is impossible to verify the accuracy of these claims. The money was deposited in Mustafa Kemal's account by the Ottoman Bank, and a receipt bearing his signature went to India. Mustafa Kemal loaned this money to the state treasury on two occasions. When the treasury repaid the loans, he used the funds to furnish the initial capital of İş Bankası, established in 1924. By his will, the shares of İş Bankası were bequeathed to the Republican People's Party and the income from the shares to the Turkish Language and History Societies (Karaman, pp. 231–41; Müderrisoğlu, pp. 653–55, 660, 661).

In addition, the Caliphate Committee undertook the formation of an Ankara Regiment, consisting of volunteers. It never saw action in Anatolia, because the war came to an end before the unit became operational.

The Armistice of Mudanya

The struggle of the Anatolia movement lasted over three years and ended with the Peace Treaty of Lausanne. This was preceded by an armistice signed at Mudanya.

The Chanak crisis was overcome through M. Kemal's strategy of not confronting the West and also through the cool-headedness of both sides. Nevertheless it did jolt the adversaries. As a result, when the French were able to persuade the British to allow Edirne to remain Turkish, the armistice conference was convened in Mudanya on 3 October 1922.

The negotiators and signatories at Mudanya should actually have been Greece and Turkey, since these were the countries that had been fighting. But the negotiations were conducted by Turkey (Ismet Paşa) and, representing the real players in the War of Liberation, Britain (Gen. Charles Harrington), France (Gen. Charles Antoine Charpy), and Italy (Gen. Ernesto Mombelli). The armistice document was signed by these four negotiators.

The Turkish side demanded that Greece evacuate Eastern Thrace, including Edirne and the east bank of the Meriç (Maritsa) River, and that the whole territory be transferred to the government of the TGNA within twenty days. Should it be decided that the territory would be placed under a neutral administration pending a peace treaty, then Turkey wanted guarantees regarding the ultimate fate of the territory.

The Entente countries agreed to the evacuation but wanted Allied troops stationed on the east bank of the Meric. The conference was deadlocked on a number of occasions; but once again agreement was reached, through France's persuasion of Britain, and the armistice was signed on 11 October. Although Greek general Alexandros Mazarakis participated with his delegation at the negotiations, he stayed on board a Greek warship anchored off Mudanya and refrained from signing the armistice on the ground that he did not have authorization. Despite this, General Harrington gave assurances that the armistice would be implemented by the Allies. The question was settled on 14 October when the Greek representative in İstanbul, Haralambos Simopoulos, formally approved the document.

By the Armistice of Mudanya, officially known as the Military Convention of Mudanya, the Armistice of Mudros of 1918 was superseded, and the Turkish-Greek War was ended. Although the evacuation of Eastern Thrace was completed on 25 November 1922, the convention provided that the evacuation of Istanbul and the Straits would take place after the signing of the peace treaty. This evacuation finally took place in October 1923.

With the signing of the convention, British prime minister Lloyd George's Turkish policies were totally wrecked, leading to his resignation. The important provisions of the convention are listed below.

Article 1: "With the coming into effect of the present Convention, all hostilities between the Turkish and Greek armed forces shall cease."

Article 2: "Greek forces shall retreat to the west of the Meriç River from its outlet into the Aegean Sea to the point where it meets the Bulgarian frontier."

Article 3: "Pending the conclusion of a peace treaty, the right bank of the Meriç River and Karaağaç will be occupied by allied forces to forestall any possible disorders."

Article 5: "The evacuation by Greek forces of Eastern Thrace shall commence when the present Convention comes into effect and will be completed within 15 days."

Article 9: "Eastern Thrace shall be occupied by allied forces. These forces shall maintain order during the evacuation and the transfer of responsibility."

Article 10: "The evacuation by the Allies shall be completed within 30 days of the...evacuation [by Greek forces]."

Article 11 traces the line south of the Marmara Sea beyond which the government of the TGNA would not cross before the end of the peace conference.

Article 12: "The allied forces shall remain at their presently held positions. The government of the TGNA undertakes to respect this situation pending the decisions of the peace conference." A listing of the territories that come within this category follows.

Article 13: "The government of the TGNA undertakes not to transfer troops to Eastern Thrace, or to recruit an army or to maintain troops there until the ratification of the peace treaty."

As noted above, the Greek representative did not sign the document, but the Greek representative in Istanbul made the following statement to the Allies on 14 October:

The Greek government holds the view that the observations made by the Greek delegates at Mudanya regarding the guarantees for the safety of the Christians of Eastern Thrace and of their properties have to be kept in mind. The Greek government places its trust in the humane approach of the allied states toward the Christians and, in compliance with the wishes of these states, undertakes to abide by the decisions taken and feels compelled to accede to the Armistice Convention signed at Mudanya on 11 October 1922.

Signed, Sinopulos [Simopoulos], Ambassador. (Soysal, p. 66)

The Peace Treaty of Lausanne

I. THE PEACE CONFERENCE OF LAUSANNE

A. Preparations for the Conference

One week after Mudanya, the three Allied states Britain, France, and Italy, also acting on behalf of Japan, issued invitations to the Ankara and İstanbul governments to attend the Lausanne Conference "for the purpose of bringing full peace to the East."

The Question of Turkish Representation and Its Solution: Abolition of the Sultanate

Ankara had maintained all along that the government of Istanbul was not capable of representing Turkey. A regime that based its legitimacy on national sovereignty and that emerged victorious from the War of Liberation could not share political power with a regime based on the authority of an individual who had sent troops to suppress the War of Liberation. Nor would it agree to share the right to represent Turkey at an international event.

At this point Istanbul sent a message signed by grand vizier Tevfik Paşa to the Ankara government, requesting it to send a representative and warning that the Istanbul government would select and dispatch a representative for Ankara if it failed to do so. The message was dated 29 October 1922.

M. Kemal had already made up his mind to declare a Republic and made good use of this message. Together with his close companions, he tabled a draft resolution at the TGNA to the effect that "the Ottoman State had collapsed and that a new Turkish State had risen in its place." When the draft resolution was being discussed in committee, M. Kemal replied to his critics to remind them that the TGNA was a revolutionary assembly. He said that the Turkish nation was now sovereign. All that needed to be done at this point was to confirm this state of affairs by a law; whether this was acknowledged or not would not change the outcome "but might well result in some heads rolling" (Kemal, p. 691). This declaration made on 1 November 1922 proved effective, and the critics drew back. They declared that they had seen the matter from the wrong angle and thanked M. Kemal for his clarifications, whereupon the committee prepared a bill consisting of two articles. The first article abolished the sultanate without actually saying so:

With the constitution, the people of Turkey have decided that their sovereignty shall be embodied in the TGNA, their true representative; that this sovereignty cannot be relinquished or shared; and that it shall be exercised by the TGNA. The people shall recognize no force or group that is not based on national sovereignty and therefore cannot accept the existence of another government within the frontiers of the National Pact. Therefore, the people of Turkey consider the government of Istanbul, based as it is on personal sovereignty, to be buried in history forever, starting from 16 March 1920.

Article 2 provided that the caliph would be selected by the TGNA from the members of the Ottoman dynasty (Turan, pp. 277–80). The bill was enacted on 1 November 1922.

The İstanbul government then submitted its resignation. Ankara had won. The Sultan Vahideddin did what other leaders who had lost after bitter turmoil had done. Following the example of Enver, Talat, and Cemal, who had left the country on board a German vessel on 1 November 1918, Vahideddin, who considered his life to be in danger, informed General Harrington on 16 November that he wanted asylum in Britain and left İstanbul on board the battleship Malaya the next day. He would live modestly in San Remo, Italy, until his death in 1926. He was interred in Damascus.

The Participating States and the Turkish Delegation

Ankara proposed İzmir as the venue for the peace conference, but this was not accepted due to the lack of adequate infrastructure, communications facilities, and so forth. Lausanne became the venue of the conference. M. Kemal trusted the negotiating skills of İsmet Paşa and thus wanted him to head the Turkish delegation. The TGNA replaced Yusuf Kemal Bey with İsmet Paşa as minister of foreign affairs and appointed him leader of the Turkish delegation.

The participating states can be placed in the following categories (Soysal, p. 69):

- 1. The inviting states: Britain, France, Italy, Japan.
- 2. The states invited to all of the negotiating sessions: Greece, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, the U.S. on the one hand and Turkey on the other. (The U.S. acted as an observer; although an active participant in the negotiations, it did not vote or sign the treaty or its annexes. It was only in 1927 that the U.S. established formal relations with Turkey.)
- 3. The Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic, which was invited only to the negotiations relating to the Straits (originally Russia had not been invited, but Ankara insisted on Russia's presence in order to strengthen its negotiating position), and Bulgaria, which was invited to the sessions dealing with the Straits and the frontier in Thrace.
- Belgium and Portugal, which were invited to the sessions dealing with certain topics such as trade and residence.

The Serb-Croat-Slovene State's representative did not sign the treaty, so annex 17 stated that this country would be able to sign the documents in Paris before the treaty came into effect.

The Turkish delegation at the conference consisted of chief delegate İsmet Paşa and two delegates: the minister of health, Dr. Rıza Nur, and former minister of finance Hasan Bey [Saka]. It also included twenty-one advisors, two press advisors, one advisor and secretary-general, one translator, and eight secretaries (making thirty-three people in all in addition to the delegates themselves).

On the other side of the table were two important diplomatic personages: Venizelos and Curzon. Unlike other heads of delegation, Venizelos was there without any official position. He was empowered to sign any document at his discretion without having to consult Athens. This showed both his importance and the utterly helpless condition of Greece at the time. Curzon was in full charge of the conference, thanks to his diplomatic skills and his profound knowledge of the Middle East; he was the undisputed spokesman and coordinator of the Allies, keeping them united throughout the conference.

The Turkish Delegation's Brief

Before the delegation left for the conference, the cabinet met and quickly approved a three-page brief consisting of fourteen items (Şimşir 1990, p. xiv):

- Eastern frontiers: there can be no "Armenian homeland"; if the question comes up, the negotiations shall be terminated.
- Iraqi frontier: the provinces of Suleymaniyah, Kirkuk, and Mosul will be claimed; and if a contrary situation develops, instructions shall be sought from the government.
- 3. Syrian frontier: the frontier shall be rectified in the following manner: Re'si Ibn Hani to Harim, Müslimiye, Meskene, the Euphrates, Deirzor, the desert up to the southern border of the vilayet of Mosul.
- 4. The islands: depending on the negotiations, the closest islands to the mainland will be claimed; if contested, instructions will be sought.
- 5. Frontiers of Thrace: the 1914 line will be maintained.
- Western Thrace: the National Pact will apply [i.e., a plebiscite will be sought].
- 7. The Straits and the Gallipoli peninsula: no foreign troops will be allowed; if it becomes necessary to end negotiations, Ankara is to be informed.
- 8. Capitulations: unacceptable; if it becomes necessary to end negotiations, what is needed will be done.
- 9. Minorities: a solution to be sought based on exchange.
- 10. Ottoman debts: debts to be shared with the countries breaking away; Greek reparations to be set aside for settling debt; if not attainable, a twenty-year grace will be sought. The Ottoman Public Debt administration will be abolished; if difficulties arise, instructions will be sought.
- No limitations on the army or navy can be accepted.
- 12. Foreign institutions must be bound by Turkish legislation.
- 13. The National Pact shall apply to the breakaway states.
- 14. The rights of Islamic communities and pious foundations shall be secured in accordance with previous agreements.

Rivelpen value

The first seven items of the brief had to do with frontiers, the next five dealt with the structure of the state, and the last two had to do with the structure of the breakaway states. In other words, the brief sought to trace the frontiers and to establish an independent state within these frontiers (Şimşir 1994, p. 26).

It is noteworthy that the delegation was given binding instructions on two issues. If the Allies insisted on the establishment of an Armenian homeland or the preservation of the capitulations, the delegation was to reject these demands without referring them to Ankara and, if necessary, terminate the negotiations and return home. This was proof of Ankara's sensitivity and determination on these two issues.

The delegation's brief was just an outline, so the delegation was in continuous contact with Ankara and with M. Kemal personally. This cable traffic was of use to the British, who had their code breakers on the job. The damage that this inflicted on the Turkish side, however, was somewhat mitigated by the cumbersome nature of British bureaucracy. The British intelligence service in Istanbul transmitted the secret correspondence only in outline form to Lausanne, with the full transcript going to the Defense Ministry, from there to the Foreign Office, and only then to Lord Curzon. The British also tended to underestimate the Turkish delegation, which often caused them to stray from realism. All of this prevented the British from making the best use of this intelligence (Jeffery and Sharp, pp. 149 and 151).

The General Features of the Conference and of the Signed Instruments

The Organization of the Conference and Its General Atmosphere

The conference was known officially as "The Lausanne Conference on Questions of the Near East." It was held in two sessions. The first session, lasting two and a half months, ran from 21 November 1922 to 4 February 1923. The session ended mainly because of the capitulations, with the Turkish delegation returning home. Two and a half months later, the second session got underway on 23 April 1923 and lasted until the signing ceremony on 24 July 1923. It took the conference about eight months to complete its work.

M. Kemal took advantage of the two and a half months of the break to hold the Economic Congress of İzmir. The congress conveyed two important messages to the Allies. The speeches at the congress demonstrated that Turkey was not about to stray from the "system." It would stay in the capitalist Western camp and had nothing to do with the order established by the Bolsheviks in Russia. The second message was that Turkey would not agree to the maintenance of the capitulations under any circumstances. In short, the new state was not antisystem, but it wanted to join the system on its terms as a fully independent, equal member.

The work of the conference was divided among three main committees. The first committee, chaired by Britain's Lord Curzon, took up territorial and military questions, including frontiers, citizenship, minorities, the regime of the Straits, and so forth. The second committee, chaired by Italy, was dealing with the status of foreign nationals in Turkey, including jurisdiction issues, capitulations, privileges, and other issues. Under France's chairmanship, the third committee was responsible for economic and financial issues, including the Ottoman debt. In other words, each one of the Allies was chairing a committee that dealt with issues of greatest interest to that country. Britain was focused on Mosul and the Straits, France on the debt issue, and Italy on the capitulations, the islands, and cabotage rights. The reasons for this were plain: Mosul had oil, and the Straits were important for the Royal Navy; most of the creditors of the Ottoman Empire were French nationals; Italy was a long-time beneficiary of the capitulations through its links to Venice and Genoa, while the Dodecanese Islands were important as a stepping stone for Italy, as a latecomer in the colonial business, to develop a colonial empire. The issues that led to the adjournment of the first session were precisely the Ottoman debt, the abolition of the capitulations, and the evacuation of İstanbul and the Straits.

Turkey was not able to take any administrative responsibility in the drafting committee other than providing a member. Actually, İsmet Paşa was very strict about the question of equality. When Curzon delivered a speech at the inaugural ceremony after the opening speech of Switzerland's head of state, İsmet Paşa insisted on his right also to take the floor and delivered a short speech (Meray 1969, p. vi). Although he was warned about would-be Armenian assassins, he never removed the flag from his official vehicle. As noted earlier, however, Curzon was completely in charge. The people sitting across the table were all seasoned European career diplomats, while İsmet Paşa had a military background and had to operate in a foreign tongue: French. Only three of the advisors and six of the secretaries in the Turkish delegation were from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

The biggest stumbling block at the conference was that the Allies had adopted Mudros as their point of reference while the Turkish side was focused on Mudanya. This was highlighted in İsmet İnönü's preface to Seha L. Meray's translation of the Treaty of Lausanne. "Whenever the occasion arose, I emphasized that as chief delegate I had come to the conference following the armistice of Mudanya, while Lord Curzon tried to remind me of the armistice of Mudros. We never saw eye to eye on this issue" (Meray 1969, p. v). The Lausanne Conference brought to an end both World War I and the Turkish-Greek War. That is why the treaty was very difficult to put together and the final document was not one that awarded victory to any one side. It was very much a compromise text. Therefore the criticisms leveled at Ismet Paşa and the Treaty of Lausanne in Turkey, both at the time of its signing and subsequently to this day, have little validity. The treaty was negotiated in very difficult circumstances, and the new Turkey was in great need of signing it as early as possible.

The Allies had natural advantages, but the Turkish delegation was able to resort to two weapons whenever it felt cornered. (1) The National Pact: the members of the delegation made plain at every occasion that they were bound to this document and that if they deviated from it in any substantial way they would be pilloried at home and the TGNA would refuse to ratify the resulting treaty. (2) Westernization: Ankara's general tactic was to stress to the Allies that it was not necessary to press Turkey on issues like minority rights, judicial competence, privileges, and so forth, because new legislation based on Western models, including a civil code, would be adopted as soon as the new state was established. This tactic proved useful, especially in getting rid of the capitulations. It had to be admitted that the justification for the capitulations, and especially the judicial capitulations, was the Ottoman theocratic order's significant deviation from the order existing in the Western world. The precondition for ending the privileges of the foreigners and non-Muslims was the elimination of the distinction between Muslims and Christians and treating all citizens as equals. Turkey undertook to do this at the negotiations and, after signing the peace treaty, introduced a series of Westernizing reforms, especially legal reforms.

General Information about the Instruments

The package of instruments signed at the conference consists of three categories of texts (Soysal, p. 72). The originals of these texts as well as the conference records are in French.

1. The peace treaty.

- 2. The annexes to the treaty, consisting of conventions, agreements, declarations, and protocols. There are seventeen such instruments, some of them provisional.
- 3. Letters exchanged between Turkey and some Western countries. There is no agreement over whether these letters also form part of the Lausanne package of instruments.

In this book, the texts contained in Meray 1973 have been used as source material for the first two categories and Soysal's original texts have been used for the third category.

Of the eighteen texts in the first two categories, three are noteworthy: (1) the peace treaty, (2) the convention concerning the exchange of populations, and (3) the Straits Convention.

From the viewpoint of the independence of the new Turkey, five more follow suit: (i) the convention on conditions of residence, business, and jurisdiction, (2) the commercial convention, (3) the declaration relating to sanitary matters in Turkey, (4) the declaration relating to the administration of justice in Turkey, and (5) the protocol relating to certain concessions granted in the Ottoman Empire and the attached declaration. The important provisions of these instruments are noted below, after examining the peace treaty. The letters in the third category that clarify certain aspects of the instruments are dealt with in conjunction with the instruments.

Details of the Conference

The thorniest questions of the conference were taken up, and generally settled, in the first session. In the second session these questions were tidied up and finalized and secondary questions were dealt with.

Because of its humanitarian urgency, the first item taken up at the conference was the question of the repatriation of interned civilians and prisoners of war held by Turkey and Greece. An agreement on this item was signed on 30 January 1923. The convention concerning the exchange of Greek and Turkish populations was also signed on the same day. This convention had great political importance for both Turkey and Greece (see "Relations with Greece" in Section 2). The other sixteen instruments would be signed six months later, on 24 July 1923, at the end of the conference.

The main topics of the conference and the position of the parties can be summarized as follows:

1. Frontiers: territorial questions had been settled on the battlefield to a large extent. With the USSR and Iran, there was no problem. The Greek armies had left. The matter had also been settled with France and Italy. Britain had confined itself to the occupation of İstanbul. Only Thrace and the region of the Straits were under Allied occupation. This constituted a handicap for the Turkish delegation.

The Turkish position on Thrace was that the frontier with Bulgaria (traced in 1913 after the Balkan War) should be respected, while a plebiscite should be held to determine the future of Western Thrace, where the majority of the population was Turkish. This would be in keeping with article 3 of the National Pact. Venizelos replied to this argument by pointing out that Turkey had lost Western Thrace to Bulgaria in 1913, that Bulgaria had lost it to the Allies in 1918, and that the Allies had transferred the territory to Greece in 1920.

The differences over the Iraqi border were very serious; when these differences proved insurmountable, it was decided to return to this question after the conference. This postponement was proof that Britain was not about to relinquish Mosul.

The question of frontiers was a key issue for Turkey, because great importance had always been attached to the land and because the leadership consisted entirely of military men whose primary duty had always been to defend their land. M. Kemal was a realist, however, and the objectives that were being sought were "defensible frontiers" and "a nation-state." These objectives did not require a strategy of holding onto a maximum amount of territory. The objective was a size that was adequate to ensure self-sufficiency and a homogeneous Turkish population.

2. The Straits: on this issue Britain and Russia were the main contestants, with Turkey playing a secondary role. During the nineteenth century Britain had sought to keep the Straits closed in order to keep the Russian Black Sea fleet out of the Mediterranean. This was done in cooperation with the Ottoman Empire. Now that Russia's fleet was diminished and Britain was the leading commercial and naval power, it was pressing for completely open Straits (Hale, p. 54). The position was in concordance with Woodrow Wilson's twelfth point. The Soviets were trying to keep access to the Black Sea by the great powers restricted. That is why they favored strengthening Turkish control over the waterway. Turkey had sought the invitation of Russia in order to gain this support at the negotiations.

In addition to Turkey's generally pro-Western stance, Realpolitik also called for Turkey's rapprochement with Britain. That is why the Convention of the Straits reflected Britain's position. But in line with Turkey's traditional policy of balance, Ankara insisted on certain restrictions being imposed on non-Black Sea powers. Turkey's views prevailed. Nevertheless, Russia was dissatisfied with the convention and refrained from signing it until 14 August 1923 in Rome.

3. The capitulations and concessions: this was an issue of crucial importance for Turkey. Although it caused the conference to adjourn for two and a half months, it was finally settled to Turkey's satisfaction. But concessions had to be made to secure the abolition of the capitulations.

As will be seen below, instruments IV, V, X, XI, and XII and the letters attached to them provided that customs duties would not be raised for a period of five years; concessions granted prior to October 1914 would be recognized; a temporary derogation was made in regard to cabotage rights; and temporary restrictions were accepted on sovereignty in the fields of health, residence, and judicial competence.

- 4. Minorities: as a result of the deportation of the Armenians and the exchange of populations with Greece, the population of Anatolia had become more homogeneous and the number of non-Muslims was greatly diminished. Ankara had agreed to grant minority rights under article 5 of the National Pact. The difficulties arose over these issues:
- (a) In defining minority, the Allies proposed the criteria of racial, linguistic, and religious minorities. This conformed to the standard of the period and had been accepted by other countries. Turkey maintained that in the Ottoman Empire only the non-Muslims were considered minorities. Turkey also recalled that the question of minority rights had been abused by foreign powers and used as a pretext to interfere in the country's internal affairs. In the end, minority rights under international guarantees were only recognized for non-Muslim minorities.
- (b) The Allies wanted the non-Muslims to be exempt from military service against payment of a fixed sum, but this idea was not upheld.
- (c) The issue of an Armenian homeland gave rise to heated debates. But the Turkish delegation stood its ground, and there was no allusion to this in the treaty or in its annexes.
- (d) The Allies agreed that the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate's competence would be restricted to spiritual matters only as the price for maintaining its seat in the country. Although it was the subject of long debates, the patriarchate is not mentioned in any of the Lausanne documents.
- 5. The Ottoman Public Debt Administration (Düyun-1 Umumiye): although it was the subject of long discussions, the question was not fully settled. Because Turkey was one of the successor states of the Ottoman Empire, it took over part of the debt. The final settlement with the creditors, most of whom were French, would be reached after Lausanne in 1928 and 1933. The last installment was paid on 25 May 1954.

The Fundamental Importance of Lausanne

The Lausanne Conference came to an end when the peace treaty and the other instruments were signed on 23 July 1923.

Lausanne was important for Turkey in three ways.

First, Lausanne was a treaty signed by equals. All the treaties ending World War I, in particular Sèvres, were texts that had not been negotiated but had been imposed on the vanquished by the Allies. All of them contained the Covenant of the League to demonstrate that they were reflecting the postwar order established by the Allies. Lausanne is the sole exception. It was signed after an arduous negotiating process. Because it is a compromise text that emerged from negotiations, it is the only peace treaty that has endured to this day. The others have all been discarded.

Second, Lausanne signifies economic independence and constitutes the first step toward nationalizing the economy. The capitulations were abolished and the Ottoman debt rescheduled, allowing the state to repay the debt by 1954. This made it possible for Turkey to establish the infrastructure on which its economic independence would be based.

Third, Lausanne reflects the political independence of Turkey. Aside from some restrictions, the treaty recognizes Turkey as an independent state and confirms this on an international plane. It is the founding document of the Turkish state. The establishment of a Republican regime was to come three months later, on 29 October 1923.

Let us now examine the principal instruments signed at the conference.

II. THE PEACE TREATY (INSTRUMENT NO. I)

The following countries participated in the negotiations leading up to the peace treaty: Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Greece, Romania, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State on the one hand and Turkey on the other.

The treaty consists of 143 articles.

A. Political Clauses

Frontiers

The Soviet frontier traced in 1921 and the Iranian frontier fixed in 1639 were not discussed at the conference.

The western frontier: Bulgaria's southern frontier from the Black Sea to the Meric River would be identical to the Greek-Bulgarian frontier of 1919. After reaching the Meric River, the frontier with Greece would be the river to the Aegean Sea, with the city of Edirne left in Turkey (article 2). Under the provisions of the convention respecting the Thracian frontier, the frontier between Turkey and Bulgaria and Turkey and Greece would remain demilitarized to the depth of about thirty kilometers on either side of the line. The demilitarized zone would be abolished by mutual agreement under a treaty concluded in 1938.

The southern frontier: the frontier with Syria would be the line described in the Franco-Turkish Agreement of 20 October 1921. This is the line that exists today, with the exception of Hatay, which is left outside of Turkey. The frontier reaches the Mediterranean north of the city of Iskenderun (article 3/1). Hatay was to join Turkey in 1939.

The frontier with Iraq could not be fixed. Article 3/2 stipulated that Turkey and Great Britain would try to reach an agreement through negotiations within nine months. In case of failure, the dispute would be referred to the Council of the League of Nations for a final decision. In the meantime the two countries would refrain from modifying in any way the present state of the territories. (For the full text of Art. 3/2 see pp, 156–157.)

This provision meant that Mosul was being ceded to Britain. Britain would prevent a decision from being reached within nine months and would have the matter referred to the Council of the League, where Britain was in a position to ensure a decision in its favor. Consequently, it can be said that the ceding of Mosul to Iraq (Britain) happened not in 1926 but at Lausanne in 1923. M. Kemal and İsmet Paşa were probably in disagreement on this question. But M. Kemal knew that Turkey could not have Mosul because of its oil reserves. He did not want to face the prospect of renewed hostilities with Britain even before peace was attained. At a press conference in İzmit in January 1923, when the conference was still in session, he made the following off-the-record declaration to journalists: "Now that all is over, is it reasonable to continue the war over Mosul?" (Perinçek, p. 96). At this press conference M. Kemal also declared that the British wanted to establish a Kurdish government in northern Iraq and that this could have an effect on the Kurds of Turkey, so the border should be drawn farther south to prevent this. But at the same time he may well have noted the difficulties that the Iraqi Kurds under the leadership of Sheikh Mahmut Berzenci were causing Britain and not wanted to "import" these problems.

The islands: according to articles 12, 13, and 14 all of the northern Aegean islands were left to Greece and demilitarized, with the exception of Gökçeada (Imbros), Bozcaada (Tenedos), and the Rabbit Islands. Article 15 left the Dodecanese Islands to Italy.

Article 20 read as follows: "Turkey hereby recognizes the annexation of Cyprus proclaimed by the British Government on the 5th November 1914."

Capitulations

This was a difficult issue, which led to the conference being adjourned. It was dealt with in article 28, which read: "Each of the High Contracting Parties hereby accepts, in so far as it is concerned, the complete abolition of the capitulations in Turkey in every respect."

Protection of Minorities

Unlike Sèvres, Lausanne dealt with the question of minorities not as a "part" of the treaty but as a "section" among the political clauses (articles 37–45). This is an indication that the question was considered of secondary importance.

Article 37: "Turkey undertakes that the stipulations contained in Articles 38 to 44 shall be recognized as fundamental laws, and that no law, no regulation, nor official action shall conflict or interfere with these stipulations, nor shall any law, regulation, nor official action prevail over them." This provision for protecting minorities was present in all of the peace treaties, including Sèvres (article 140). The provision stipulated that the rights enumerated in this section could under no circumstances be denied by the Turkish authorities.

This issue is important today in regard to making the democratic reforms necessitated by the process of Turkish candidacy for the EU. The hierarchical relationship of the provisions of laws and constitutions and international treaties is open to debate. Can the Turkish state enact laws or introduce constitutional provisions that would nullify the stipulations of this section of the Treaty of Lausanne? By article 37, the answer to this question must be no. The tendency in legal practice is to give equal weight to domestic and international provisions. But if the rights enumerated in this article are abridged or denied by subsequent legislation, it would signify that the Turkish state has invalidated its signature affixed to the treaty by which it came into existence. Such a situation occurred when the 12 September military regime adopted the 1982 Constitution. Under articles 26 and 28 of the Constitution and Law No. 2932, the use of languages other than Turkish is proscribed (see "Appraisal of the Period" in Section 6). This is a clear violation of the Treaty of Lausanne.

As a part of the EU Harmonization Packages, however, a fifth paragraph was added to article 90 of the Turkish Constitution in May 2004: "International treaties on fundamental rights and freedoms have precedence over national laws treating the same subject."

Article 38 states:

The Turkish Government undertakes to assure full and complete protection of life and liberty to all inhabitants of Turkey without distinction of birth, nationality, race, or religion.

All inhabitants of Turkey shall be entitled to free exercise, whether in public or private, of any creed, religion, or belief, the observance of which shall not be incompatible with public order or good morals.

Non-Moslem minorities will enjoy full freedom of movement and of emigration, subject to the measures applied, on the whole or on part of the territory, to all Turkish nationals, and which may be taken by the Turkish Government for national defense, or for the maintenance of public order

This article introduced negative rights (see Box 1-6 above). Although in substance the article contained the same rights as the ones included in article 141 of Sèvres, the striking issue was that rights were bestowed upon noncitizens and even upon "inhabitants of Turkey" in a section titled "Protection of Minorities." The Lausanne records show (Report of Montagna, chairman of the Subcommittee on Minorities, in Meray 1969, pp. 309–10) that the Allies accepted the Turkish opposition to the criteria of "race, language, religion" and therefore agreed to exclude the Muslim communities of Turkey from being considered minorities only after the inclusion of this article. It would be correct to assume that the Allies were trying to ensure the rights of their nationals residing in Turkey.

Article 39: after three paragraphs ensuring negative rights for non-Muslims, paragraphs 4 and 5 stipulated as follows:

No restrictions shall be imposed on the free use by any Turkish national of any language in private intercourse, in commerce, religion, in the press, or in publications of any kind or at public meetings.

Notwithstanding the existence of the official language, adequate facilities shall be given to Turkish nationals of non-Turkish speech for the oral use of their own language before the courts.

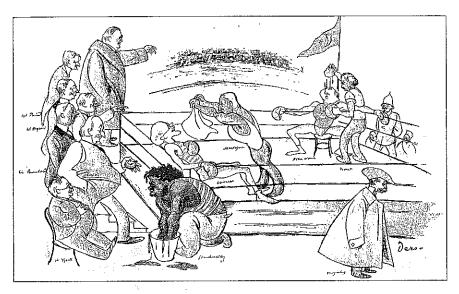

Figure 1-3. The heated debates in the Subcommittee on Minorities at Lausanne as seen by Derso (Derso and Kelen, Guignol à Lausanne [[stanbul: İnönü Vakfı Yayını, 1993]).

Paragraph 4 of article 39 is important for Turkey today, when respect for human rights carries great importance, because it has never been implemented in regard to the use of native languages. The paragraph clearly states that any Turkish national may freely use any language in any place in Turkey and adds that no restrictions can be imposed on this freedom. It is clear that, aside from government offices, the paragraph provides for the use of native languages just about everywhere and also in "publications of any kind." Consequently, it is pointless to argue over whether languages other than Turkish can be employed in radio and TV broadcasting in Turkey today because generic terms such as "publications" are interpreted according to their meaning at the date of interpretation.

Paragraph 5 of article 39 relates to the right of defense in courts. Because of the importance of this right, it allows individuals to exercise this right in the language in which they are most fluent. Obviously, that is intended to include the mother tongue of Turkish nationals who speak non-Turkish languages. This is the only exception made to the use of languages other than Turkish, even orally, in any government offices. It is the only instance of a positive right recognized for individuals not in the category of non-Muslims.

The provisions of these two paragraphs were present in all the treaties relating to the protection of minorities during that period. They were also present in the Turkish delegation's proposals. The Treaty of Sèvres contained these provisions in its article 145, but it will be remembered that the right was more extensive and included the use of native languages in written form in the courts as well as orally.

Article 40: after making provisions for their negative rights, the Turkish nationals belonging to non-Muslim minorities are granted important positive rights: "they shall have an equal right to establish, manage, and control at their own expense any charitable, religious, and social institutions, any schools and other establishments for instruction and education, with the right to use their own language and to exercise their own religion freely therein."

The rights to establish educational establishments and to use one's own language as the language of instruction are not recognized for the Muslims of Turkey. There are two important aspects to this question. First, since it says "and other establishments," non-Muslims may set up any schools from the primary to the university level. Second, since it says "an equal right," it means that in the establishment, management, and control process minorities will be subject to the same rules as the majority. This is identical to article 147 of Sèvres, with just one difference. The Sèvres version includes the phrase "without interference by the Turkish authorities."

Article 41 introduces rights that have been exercised only sporadically to this day in Turkey:

As regards public instruction, the Turkish Government will grant, in those towns and districts where a considerable proportion of non-Moslem nationals are resident, adequate facilities for ensuring that in the primary schools the instruction shall be given to the children of such Turkish nationals through the medium of their own language. This provision will not prevent the Turkish Government from making the teaching of the Turkish language obligatory in the said schools.

In towns and districts where there is a considerable proportion of Turkish nationals belonging to non-Moslem minorities, these minorities shall be assured an equitable share in the enjoyment and application of the sums which may be provided out of public funds under the State, municipal, or other budgets for educational, religious, or charitable purposes.

The sums in question shall be paid to the qualified representatives of the establishments and institutions concerned.

Article 42 also has not been fully implemented:

The Turkish Government undertakes to take, as regards non-Moslem minorities, in so far as concerns their family law or personal status, measures permitting the settlement of these questions in accordance with the customs of these minorities.

These measures will be elaborated by special Commissions composed of representatives of the Turkish Government and of representatives of each of the minorities concerned in equal number. In case of divergence, the Turkish Government and the Council of the League of Nations will appoint in agreement an umpire chosen from amongst European lawyers.

The Turkish Government undertakes to grant full protection to the churches, synagogues, cemeteries, and other religious establishments of the above-mentioned minorities. All facilities and authorization will be granted to the pious foundations and to the religious and charitable institutions of the said minorities at present existing in Turkey, and the Turkish Government will not refuse, for the formation of new religious and charitable institutions, any of the necessary facilities which are granted to other private institutions of that nature.

What is meant in article 42, paragraph 1, is, for example, the right to get married in a church or synagogue. This is an obvious example of a positive right. When the Civil Code adopted in 1926 made official civil marriages obligatory, the state asked minorities to give up this positive right and agree to an official civil marriage ceremony before the church or synagogue marriage. Otherwise the Muslim majority could have claimed the same right for themselves. To secure this, the "special Commissions" foreseen in paragraph 2 of article 42 were called upon to meet; after official insistence, they decided on 29 November 1925 to relinquish the right mentioned in paragraph 1 (Alexandris, pp. 135-39). This question is examined in greater detail in paragraph 2 of the subheading that follows. It should be mentioned here that on 11 September 1926 Greece lodged a complaint with the LoN and claimed that the treaty provisions were not being observed. The secretary-general of the LoN informed Turkey by his let-

Box 1-30. The 1936 Declaration

The Law on Foundations came into force in 1936 as a Republican reform law. The state called on each foundation to declare all real property in its possession. The purpose of the declaration (in fact a circular order) was to make arrangements that would deprive the Islamists of their financial means. But Atatürk died shortly thereafter, and the declaration fell into oblivion.

After 1972 the Directorate General of Foundations, as a means of pressuring Greece in the Cyprus affair, wanted to put pressure on Greek (Rum) Orthodox foundations and started calling on non-Muslim foundations to submit their founding charters. These foundations had no such charter, however, because they had been set up through imperial decrees during the Ottoman era. The Directorate General informed these foundations that the 1936 declaration would be accepted in lieu of a charter and started appropriating all real estate acquired after 1936. The legal justification for this was that the 1936 declaration did not indicate that these foundations could acquire new properties.

The argument that the 1936 declaration was merely a listing of all fixed property and therefore could not contain such a clause was to no avail, and all property acquired through purchase, donation, legacy, or other means and not listed in the declaration was expropriated. The property thus expropriated was returned, free of charge, to the sellers or their legal heirs or, in the event of their absence, to the treasury. This violation of the Lausanne treaty as well as of the right to property came to an end in 2003 with the promulgation of an EU Harmonization Package. Seizures were stopped, real estate buys were permitted, and confiscated real estate was legally returned to the owner foundations, but no solution had yet been found (by the end of 2007) for real estate sold to third parties.

(B. ORAN) (Source: Oran 2005, pp. 117; 123–29)

ter of 18 June 1927, however, that the council committee had reached a decision not to submit the question to the Council of the League (Bilsel, pp. 41 and 53).

The facilities foreseen for foundations in paragraph 3 of the article were forgotten and even reversed in the negative atmosphere of the 1960s and 1970s when the question of Cyprus was preying on minds and the crimes of ASALA (Armeé Secrète Arménien pour la Libération de l'Arménie) were causing outrage. The most egregious example of this practice is the question of the "1936 Declaration," which has lasted into the 2000s (Box 1-30).

Article 43 contained a provision that would lose its applicability with the Westernizing reforms carried out in the 1920s when the weekly day of rest was shifted from Friday to Sunday:

Turkish nationals belonging to non-Moslem minorities shall not be compelled to perform any act which constitutes a violation of their faith or religious observances and shall not be placed under any disability by reason of their refusal to attend Courts of Law or to perform any legal business on their weekly day of rest.

This provision, however, shall not exempt such Turkish nationals from such obligations as shall be imposed upon all other Turkish nationals for the preservation of public order.

Article 44 contained a guarantee clause. The rights guaranteed by this article were those of non-Muslims. "Turkey agrees that, in so far as the preceding Articles of this Section affect non-Moslem nationals of Turkey, these provisions constitute obligations of international concern and shall be placed under the guarantee of the League of Nations." Modifying these provisions would be possible only with assent from the majority of the LoN.

In case of a violation of these obligations, any member of the Council of the League could bring the matter to the attention of the council (44/2). Any difference over this issue could be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice for a final ruling. It will be recalled that in the Treaty of Sèvres there was a completely different mechanism whereby the Principal Allied Powers were given a blank check.

Article 45 stipulated: "The rights conferred by the provisions of the present Section on the non-Moslem minorities in Turkey will be similarly conferred by Greece on the Moslem minority in her territory"

This clause is frequently labeled as reciprocity. As stipulated in the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (article 60/5), reciprocity is invalid in the case of "treaties of a humanitarian character." In other words, if either of these two countries decided not to implement its part of the minority protection, the other could not get rid of its commitments on the pretext of reciprocity. Article 45 pertains to what can be called "parallel obligations."

The Concept of a Minority at Lausanne, Minority Rights, and Implementation

At Lausanne, "minority" was defined as non-Muslims. Actually there is no such definition in section III or in any of the other Lausanne instruments. The reasons for this particular definition are well grounded and have two basic causes. (1) The first and therefore the template of the minority protection treaties imposed by the Allies on a number of countries after World War I was the Polish Treaty of 28 June 1919. Wherever the term "race, language, or religion" is used in these treaties, it was replaced with the term "non-Moslems" in Lausanne. (2) As noted above, only the rights of non-Muslims were placed under international guarantees. In the postwar years, the era of the LoN was characterized by minority rights under full international guarantees.

There are a number of misconceptions and instances of erroneous implementation regarding Lausanne and "minorities" in Turkey.

- 1. In the Treaty of Lausanne the criteria of race and religion have not been reduced to just the religious criterion when determining who is to be considered a member of a minority group. Religion too has been eliminated. Had it been otherwise, the Alevis, because they are religiously different, would also be considered a minority and enjoy international guarantees for their rights (Nur, p. 1044).
- 2. It is true that at Lausanne only non-Muslims were given minority status. Based on this, some have argued that only the non-Muslims enjoy rights. This is incorrect in two ways.

First, in practice all non-Muslims do not enjoy the rights guaranteed by the Lausanne Treaty. Only the Greek, Armenian, and Jewish communities enjoy full rights. The rights of Syrians/Syriacs, Chaldeans, and others pertaining to establishing their own schools and teaching their own language as provided by article 40 are not recognized in practice. Nowhere in the Lausanne text are the Greek, Armenian, and Jewish communities identified as "minority"; the reference is merely to "non-Muslims." When asked why the members of the Syrian sect do not enjoy these rights, the official response is that this community relinquished these rights with the establishment of the Republic. Even if there was such a formal relinquishing of rights, it is null and void, because minority rights have been considered individual rights ever since Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679). Although enjoyed collectively, these rights have been conferred not on the group but on the individual. The group is not the right holder. Therefore the leader or representative of a group cannot relinquish a right that belongs not to the group but to the individual. This is even more the case if the right has been conferred by an international treaty that states explicitly that its provisions cannot be nullified in any way (article 37).

Second, Lausanne has conferred rights not only on non-Muslims. Rights have been granted to three other groups as well (Box 1-31).

B. Financial Clauses

Article 46 of the treaty divides the Ottoman Public Debt into four parts:

- 1. "Turkey";
- "the States in favor of which territory has been detached from the Ottoman Empire after the Balkan Wars of 1912 and 1913";

Box 1-31. The Four Groups Benefiting from Rights under the Treaty of Lausanne

A reading of section III on the Protection of Minorities reveals that four groups are being granted rights.

A. Non-Muslim Turkish nationals (articles 38/3, 39/1, 40, 41/1 and 2, 42/1, 43). Naturally these rights also apply to groups B, C, and D.

B. Turkish nationals speaking a language other than Turkish (article 39/5). This right also applies to groups C and D.

C. All Turkish nationals (articles 39/3 and 4). The rights of this group also apply to group D.

D. All inhabitants of Turkey (articles 38/1 and 2, 39/2).

If we examine these four groups and the rights conferred on them, we can draw the following conclusions.

The treaty grants different rights to these four groups, all of them irrevocable under article 37.

The non-Muslims are only one group out of four. They are conferred the most extensive rights, and only their rights are internationally guaranteed under article 44/1. Bearing in mind article 39/5, it is not true that only non-Muslims have been given positive rights.

Lausanne is a document that defines minority as being non-Muslim. When it is considered that rights are also conferred on those who are not members of a minority group and even on non-nationals, then it becomes clear that section III is concerned not only with minority rights but also with human rights. It would be wrong to confine the section to minority rights by only looking at its title. This is the title used in all the documents dealing with minority rights signed after World War I. At that time the concept of human rights did not exist in international law, minority rights was the only concept. Human rights entered the international instruments only at the end of World War II, in article I, paragraph 3, of the Charter of the United Nations.

- 3. "the States to which the islands referred in Articles 12 and 15 of the present Treaty and the territory referred to in the last paragraph of the present Article have been attributed";
- 4. the States newly created in territories in Asia which are detached from the Ottoman Empire under the present Treaty."

Article 47 provides that the amounts of the annuities for the loans that are payable by the states concerned would be determined by the Council of the Ottoman Debt.

Article 49 stipulates that a commission would meet in Paris after the final determination of the amount of the annuities to establish the detailed conditions of repayment.

Article 50 distributes these loans among the four categories of states according to whether they were contracted prior to the Balkan Wars or between the Balkan Wars and World War I.

When Turkey reached an agreement with its creditors on the repayment of its debts, the income of the Ottoman Public Debt reverted to the state. The organization would be removed from Turkey and become a vehicle for transferring Turkey's repayments to the creditors.

Article 58 provides for the reciprocal renouncing of claims and certain payments:

Turkey on the one hand and the other Contracting Powers (except Greece) on the other hand reciprocally renounce all pecuniary claims for the loss and damage suffered...between 1st August, 1914 and the coming into force of the present Treaty...Turkey renounces in favor of the other Contracting Powers (except Greece) any right in the sums of gold [payable to the Reichsbank on behalf of the Council of the Ottoman Debt]...Turkey also agrees not to claim from the British Government or its nationals the repayment of the sums paid for warships ordered in England by the Ottoman Government which were requisitioned by the British Government in 1914.

Article 59 was the counterpart of article 231 of Sèvres and placed Greece in the same situation in which the Allies had tried to place Turkey:

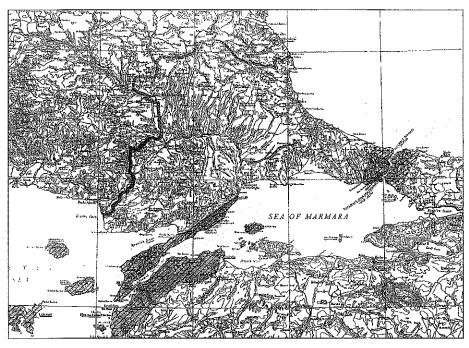

Greece recognizes her obligation to make reparations for the damage caused in Anatolia by the acts of the Greek army or administration which were contrary to the laws of war.

On the other hand, Turkey, in consideration of the financial situation of Greece resulting from the prolongation of the war and from its consequences, finally renounces all claims for reparation against the Greek Government.

Nevertheless, the district of Karaağaç on the Greek-Turkish border was left to Turkey in lieu of reparation under the protocol signed as annex XV.

III. EXAMINATION OF THE OTHER NOTEWORTHY INSTRUMENTS OF THE CONFERENCE

Among the other instruments signed at the conference, the most important for Turkey was the convention concerning the exchange of Greek and Turkish populations and the attached protocol (this instrument is examined in detail in "Relations with Greece" in Section 2).

Map 1-7. The Region of the Straits according to the Treaty of Lausanne

A. Convention Relating to the Straits (Instrument No. II)

The countries that participated in the negotiation of the Convention Relating to the Regime of the Straits were Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Bulgaria, Greece, Romania, Russia, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, and Turkey.

Article 1 introduced the principle of freedom of navigation. "The High Contracting Parties agree to recognize and declare the principle of freedom of transit and of navigation by sea and air in the Straits of the Dardanelles, the Sea of Marmara, and the Bosphorus, hereinafter comprised under the general term of the 'Straits.'"

Article 2 regulated passage through its rather extensive annexes. Two groups of craft were envisaged.

1. Merchant vessels and nonmilitary aircraft: their passage was regulated in time of peace and time of war.

In time of peace, vessels with any cargo and under any flag could freely navigate by day and by night without any formalities, subject only to international sanitary provisions. Pilotage would be optional.

Passage in time of war was divided into two cases: (a) if Turkey was neutral, passage would be under the same conditions as in time of peace; (b) if Turkey was a belligerent, neutral vessels and aircraft would enjoy freedom of navigation provided that they did not assist the enemy and Turkey was given the right to visit and search such vessels and aircraft. Turkey was free to take whatever measures were necessary to deal with enemy vessels and aircraft.

2. Warships, military aircraft, and aircraft carriers:

their passage was also regulated according to time of peace or time of war.

In time of peace warships of any flag enjoyed complete freedom of passage by day and by night, with one restriction. A non-Black Sea Power could not send a force through the Straits greater than the most powerful fleet of the littoral powers. The powers had the right to send at any time a force of not more than three ships, however, of which no ship should exceed 10,000 tons.

Passage in time of war was divided into two cases: (a) if Turkey was neutral, passage would be free as in time of peace, but no hostile action was allowed during passage; (b) if Turkey was belligerent, neutral vessels had freedom within the limitations applicable in peacetime. Turkey would be able to investigate neutral military aircraft. The passage of the Straits by submarines of powers at peace with Turkey could only be on the surface.

Under article 4 certain parts of the Straits region were demilitarized (Map 1-7). This demilitarization clause would be removed at Montreux in 1936.

Article 6 provided that there would be no armed forces in the demilitarized zone other than police and gendarmerie forces for the maintenance of order.

Article 8 stipulated that a garrison with a maximum strength of 12,000 men would be stationed in the region of Istanbul for the requirements of the capital.

Article 10 provided for the setting up of an international commission in Istanbul to be called the Straits Commission. Article 11 declared that "[t]he Commission will exercise its functions over the waters of the Straits."

Article 12: "The Commission shall be composed of a representative of Turkey, who shall be President, and representatives of France, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Bulgaria, Greece, Romania, Russia, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, in so far as these powers are signatories of the present Convention."

Article 14: "It will be the duty of the Commission to see that the provisions relating to the passage of warships and military aircraft are carried out."

Article 18 provided that, if the security of the Straits was endangered, the signatories and, in any case, France, Britain, Italy, and Japan would take the necessary measures to eliminate the danger.

It will be seen that the Straits Convention of Lausanne restricted Turkish sovereignty in two ways. One was the demilitarized zone, and the other was the Straits Commission. Both of these restrictions would be lifted at Montreux.

B. Convention on Conditions of Residence and Business and Jurisdiction (Instrument No. IV)

This convention is one of the instruments that temporarily restricted Turkey's sovereignty. Admittedly, the restrictions placed on Turkey applied in equal measure to the other countries. Turkish nationals would enjoy the same privileges in the other signatory states. Nonetheless, questions of residence and jurisdiction that should be regulated by a country's national legislation were being made the subject of an international convention.

The convention was concluded for a period of seven years and would remain in force unless it was denounced by one of the signatories one year before expiring. It expired after seven years.

As explained earlier, at the end of the Lausanne Conference the parties exchanged letters that made up the third group of instruments.

Among these letters were some that dealt with this convention. The Turkish delegation addressed almost identical letters to Britain, France, and Italy. In these letters Turkey recognized the religious, educational, health, and charitable institutions of these countries located in Turkey. Turkey declared that in their financial affairs these institutions would be treated in the same manner as their Turkish counterparts and that they would be subject to Turkish laws and regulations. But their working conditions and the manner of their establishment would be taken into account. This arrangement was to allow foreign schools to continue operating in Turkey (Soysal, pp. 222–26) (Box 1-32).

C. Commercial Convention (Instrument No. V)

This convention brought temporary restrictions on Turkey's sovereignty in the field of customs. This is how the restriction was formulated in article l: "From the coming into force of the present Convention, the tariffs applicable on the importation into Turkey of the produce or manufactures originating and emanating from the territories of the other contracting countries shall be those of the Turkish specific tariff which came into operation on 1 September 1916." Thus the 1916 tariff was being imposed on Turkey.

Article 18 specified that "the present Convention will remain in force for a period of five years." The convention had expired when the worldwide economic crisis occurred in 1929, and Turkey was able to protect itself from the effects of the crisis by raising its tariffs.

Article 9 accorded Turkey the right of reserving for the national flag maritime cabotage ("transport by sea of goods and passengers embarked in one port of its territory for another port in the same territory") and the rendering of port services.

The Turkish delegation submitted almost identical letters to Britain, France, and Italy in regard to this article. These letters indicated that negotiations would be undertaken with three specified shipping companies from each of the states starting on 1 January 1924, that the operations of these firms would be allowed to continue for another two years if these negotiations did not yield results, and that reciprocity would be taken into account (Soysal, pp. 231–35). In other words, three firms from each of these three countries would enjoy a two-year waiver on the restriction on foreign flags.

D. Declaration Relating to Sanitary Matters (Instrument No. X)

This declaration signed by the Turkish delegation stated that "the Turkish Government will appoint, for a period of five years, three European medical specialists as counselors for the sanitary administration of the frontiers. These medical specialists shall be Turkish officials and shall be attached to the Ministry of Health." This restriction on sovereignty ended at the end of the five-year period stipulated in the article.

Box 1-32. The Legal Status of Foreign Schools in Turkey

Foreign schools started getting established in the Ottoman Empire in the early 1800s and proliferated within the disorderly educational system of the time. The General Educational Regulation (Maarif-i Umumiye Nizamnamesi) of 1869 regulated the legal status of these schools. The Regulation of Private Schools of 1915 forbade foreign corporate bodies from establishing private schools. The regulation allowed foreign real persons to establish private schools on condition that official records indicated that there were enough inhabitants to justify a school and on condition of reciprocity.

During World War I, only the schools belonging to Allied states were allowed to operate. After the armistice, foreign schools resumed their activities. The subject was regulated at Lausanne by the convention on residence and jurisdiction and the attached letters.

The "national" and "secular" educational policy of the Republic prevented foreign schools from providing religious education and insisted on Turkish being taught as a compulsory subject by Turkish instructors. Students receiving a falling grade in Turkish had to repeat the year.

The Private Educational Institutions Law of 1965 imposed many restrictions. No new foreign schools could be set up and existing institutions could not expand their buildings or build new ones, replace old buildings, add new divisions, acquire property, or rent premises.

By an amendment to this law in 1984, foreigners were allowed to open schools at the primary level to cater exclusively to foreign children. These schools were designated international schools, and there are several operating in this category. Schools not in the primary school category are also accessible to Turkish students,

The 1984 amendment eased some of the restrictions and allowed private schools set up by foreigners to be expanded; the buildings, number of students, and equipment can be doubled with the permission of the Ministry of Education. The acquisition of new land and the expansion of capacity by a factor of up to five require the permission of the Council of Ministers.

The regulation of 1985 regarding private educational institutions was amended in 1999 to specify that repairs required the permission of the Ministry of Education.

Law No. 4306 of 16 August 1997 regarding the extension of primary education from five to eight years affected seventeen foreign schools that did not have a primary level of five years. Since the 1965 law provided that primary schools established by foreigners could not be attended by Turkish nationals, an indirect way was found to enable these schools to include the first five years in their program. The usual practice was to allow graduates of Turkish nationality to set up the elementary level of five years and to combine this with the existing middle level.

In addition, there are the consular schools established in accordance with bilateral cultural agreements. These institutions are outside the system of the Ministry of Education. Examples of these are the Pierre Loti school in Istanbul and the Charles de Gaulle school in Ankara.

E. Declaration Relating to the Administration of Justice (Instrument No. XI)

This declaration signed by the Turkish delegation was also a temporary abridgment of sovereignty. "The Turkish Government proposes to take immediately into its service, for such period as it may consider necessary, not being less than five years, a number of European legal counselors... These legal counselors will serve under the Minister of Justice... They will take part in the legislative commissions."

This declaration also expired in five years. During this interval Turkey completed the most important of its legal reforms,

F. Protocol Relating to Certain Concessions Granted in the Ottoman Empire (Instrument No. XII)

The concessions granted during the Ottoman period were being recognized through this document. Article 1: "Concessionary contracts and subsequent agreements relating thereto, duly entered into before 29th October, 1914, between the Ottoman Government or any local authority, on the one hand, and nationals (including companies) of the Contracting Powers, other than Turkey, on the other hand, are maintained."

Through letters submitted by Turkey to Britain, France, and Italy, the provisions of this article were elaborated. The letter submitted to Britain indicated that "if for a period of 5 years, starting from the date of signature of the Peace Treaty, the Turkish Government decides to resort to foreign industry or capital, the said companies will be so informed and they will be given a chance to enter into competition on a footing of equality with an individual or company." In this manner, Britain was given satisfaction regarding the two companies mentioned in the protocol that had obtained concessions in 1913 and 1914 without Turkey entering into any concrete commitment.

The letter submitted to France contained similar phraseology. The French company mentioned in the protocol that had received a concession in 1914 would, in the event that it failed for any reason to obtain a new concession, be notified by the Turkish government of any call for tenders to build the Black Sea rail network. Here too Turkey undertook to ensure competition on a footing of full equality.

The letter to Italy was formulated in similar fashion. This letter undertook to "respect the concession agreements concluded by the Ottoman Empire prior to 29 October 1914 regarding the Anatolia, Baghdad, Mersin-Adana railroads and the Eastern Railroad and the Port of Haydarpaşa." Another sentence declared that "[t]he provisions of the concession agreements will be adjusted to suit the new economic conditions within one year of the signing of the Peace Treaty" (Soysal, pp. 236–38).

The issue of concessions granted by the Ottoman Empire had delayed the signing of the peace treaty; but the problems were resolved through this formulation without Turkey having to concede anything of substance.

IV. DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE LAUSANNE AND SÈVRES TREATIES

The two peace treaties have to be compared to get an idea of how the tough provisions of Sèvres were attenuated at Lausanne.

- 1. There is no blank check in Lausanne such as the recurring phrase in Sèvres whereby "Turkey hereby agrees to execute" or to "renounce all rights and title" without knowing what the big powers would rule concerning the subject in question in the future.
- 2. Lausanne contains no provisions regarding Kurdistan, Armenia, or İzmir.
  - 3. The capitulations are abolished.
- 4. The Financial Commission is absent from the Lausanne text.
- 5. The Straits Commission is no longer an autonomous body.
- 6. Although the provisions relating to minorities in both texts are derived from the Polish Treaty for the Protection of Minorities of 1919, there are important differences between the two. First, the provisions relating to minorities are no longer a separate "part" but a "section" of the treaty. Second, the responsibilities imposed at Sèvres go beyond the standards of the period, whereas at Lausanne they are less onerous than the standards of the time: instead of referring to the criteria of race, language, and religion, the only criterion for a "minority" at Lausanne is being a non-Muslim. Third, Lausanne contains no provisions for the return of relocated Armenians. Fourth, there are no references to an electoral system that would provide proportional representation to a racial minority. Fifth, the phrase "without any interference of the authorities in schools" has been removed. Sixth, Turkey is not bound to recognize foreign diplomas and to allow the holders of such diplomas to practice their professions in Turkey. Seventh, Turkey is not bound to recognize privileges and immunities granted by imperial orders or edicts to churches, to schools, or in the field of judicial matters. Eighth, there are no blank checks to great powers to reassure them; if there is a disagreement, the question is to be referred to the Permanent International Court of Justice.

Appraisal of the Period

THE INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENT AND DYNAMICS

The international environment in the interwar period displayed features seldom seen in modern times. Two developments profoundly affected the continent.

The first feature was the struggle between revisionists and defenders of the status quo, the former challenging and the latter defending the post–World War I order. This left a deep imprint on the age. The principal peace treaty following World War I was Versailles. Its harsh terms rendered it impossible to implement and prevented peace from taking root. Immediately after its signing, the old rivalries between a defeated Germany and the victors, Britain and France, were resumed. The second feature was the great depression that followed the economic crisis of 1929. Both of these developments had important short-term and medium-term consequences.

In the medium term, Europe started losing its central position in the world. Europe had been drained of its energy during the war and was now suffering from the ravages of the economic slump. At the end of World War II Europe found itself relegated to a secondary position when compared to the U.S. or the USSR.

The short-term effect of losing its central position was that Europe lost its ability to impose its "pax" on the peripheral countries. This situation allowed these countries to gain a substantial degree of "relative autonomy" (see Box Intro-6 in the Introduction).

For the new Turkey, this situation was a blessing for three reasons. First, it was among the countries that gained relative autonomy. Second, as a result of the struggle between the defenders of the status quo and the revisionists, both camps courted Turkey for its important geostrategic location. Third, its historic foe, Russia, ceased to be a threat after 1917 as it struggled to overcome the effects of war. In fact it became a valued friend in the circumstances prevailing at the time. These advantages were exploited with skill and realism by M. Kemal, drawing his inspiration from the Ottoman policies of preserving a balance between competing foreign powers.

II. THE DOMESTIC ENVIRONMENT AND DYNAMICS

When surveying Turkey's domestic structure from the economic and political angles, a distinction must be made between the period from 1923 to 1930 and the period from 1930 to 1939. These periods were quite distinct economically, politically, and socially.

A. The Period from 1923 to 1930 and Liberalism

The Economy

It is generally assumed that in the interwar years the state played a highly interventionist role in the economic and political life of Turkey. This is correct only insofar as it relates to the second part of the period.

Turkey's economic policy in the period from 1923 to 1930 was conceived in February and March 1923 at the Economic Congress of İzmir when the Lausanne Conference was still in progress. The landowners and traders in undeveloped countries make up the dominant class. It was these two groups that controlled the congress and laid down the principles that would guide Turkey's economy in the 1920s. The economy would be open to the world, foreign capital would be welcomed, and the guiding principle would be liberalism. This was the most "wide-open" period of the Turkish Republic (Gülalp, p. 30). Only in the globalization process of the twenty-first century would this degree of openness be surpassed.

In fact, contrary to the generally held view, the first government's program dated 9 May 1920 contained this sentence: "We are prepared to reconcile the economic interests of states that are true friends with our own economic interests and work with them" (Arar, p. 10). The nationalist regime objected to foreign capital operating under the protection of the capitulations. Therefore during this period a good number of foreign companies received concessions with monopolistic features, and the country benefited from a relatively large influx of foreign capital. Gündüz Ökçün's research reveals that one-third of the 210 joint-stock companies established between 1920 and 1930 were foreign owned. Of the concessions granted by the government or municipalities, 51% were to foreign-owned firms that operated in the banking sector or were engaged in exporting raw materials or importing finished products. None introduced new technologies to the country. These foreign firms ensured their position vis-à-vis the administration by placing senior bureaucrats on their firms' managing boards or allowing them to become shareholders or founding partners without having to put up any capital (Ökçün, pp. 117 and 153-70). According to Çağlar Keyder's calculations, foreign investments in industrial enterprises were twice as high as domestic investments during the ten years after 1920 (Keyder, p. 79).

This economic dependency is clearly reflected in Hikmet Uluğbay's table of basic economic indicators (Table 2-2 and Box 2-1). The ratio of foreign trade to GNP is very high until 1930, with the average for the period from 1923 to 1929 being 25.27%. It falls sharply to less than 20% in 1929 and follows a gradually diminishing trend in subsequent years. The ratio of exports to imports was continuously unfavorable until 1930. The deficit in foreign trade (in million U.S. dollars) was 36.1 in 1923, 18 in 1924, 26.3 in 1925, 25 in 1926, 27 in 1927, 25.4 in 1928, and 48.7 in 1929.

Actually, this course was the economic policy of Union and Progress, which had sought to create a local bourgeoisie, and the founders of the Republic were mostly Unionists by background. This excessive dependence on foreign capital was due to the scarcity of local capital and was compensated by the Turkification policies being pursued at the time. There was a campaign to ensure that all citizens spoke Turkish, and administrative measures had been put in place to eliminate the

Box 2-1. Various Kinds of External Economic Dependency

In theory, all countries engaged in any form of economic relation with others are interdependent. As relations develop, so does interdependence. To take one example, the country that receives a loan becomes dependent on the lender. But the creditor nation must consider a possible default. Although dependency cannot be totally eliminated, the objective is to seek a reasonable level of balance.

This should not lead us to conclude that, since all countries are interdependent, economic dependency is not important. Everything is relative. Sometimes the level of economic dependency of a nation is such that its political sovereignty is seriously compromised.

In the modern world there are four kinds of economic dependency: (1) on foreign technology, (2) on foreign capital, (3) on foreign borrowing, and (4) on foreign trade. Excessive foreign dependency comes about when three of these elements are present.

The first, technology, is a relatively recent element. The second, foreign capital, is present in limited amounts in Turkey, so we refer to it in this book in absolute figures (thousands or millions of dollars). The third and fourth elements are of great importance for Turkey and are reflected in absolute terms as well as in ratios. The ratio is to the gross national product (GNP), the total value of goods and services produced in the country. In a way, GNP reflects the strength of a country, so a low ratio of foreign debt or foreign trade to GNP denotes low economic dependency. This is assuming that imports are not kept low through protectionism and that exports are not low due to lack of competitiveness.

In any country the external debt/GNP ratio is one of the key factors showing external dependency. The larger the share of short-term debt in external debt, the greater the risk of this dependency. This understanding is further underlined by the Maastricht Criteria, which were accepted by the European Union in 1991. According to these criteria, total public sector debt (PSD) should not exceed 60% of the gross domestic product (GDP). Those EU members that exceed the criteria face difficulty in the EU. When the external debt/GNP ratio continues to increase and the PSD/GDP ratio stays above 60%, the country faces a higher risk premium in its new borrowings and difficulty in finding new credit, if it can find any credit, it will be short-term and with a high risk premium. A country could face difficulties in finding external credit even if the above-mentioned ratios are within acceptable boundaries. Turkey faced such a problem during the early 1970s (External debt shown in the tables of this book denotes both public and private sector external debts. Domestic debt corresponds solely to the treasury's domestic stock.)

The subject of foreign trade needs elaboration. It is not a good sign if a country's foreign trade volume is low; this is a sign of a closed and therefore underdeveloped economy. The higher the ratio of foreign trade to GNP, the higher the country's economic dependency. This dependency can pose serious problems in the following circumstances:

- 1. If a country cannot find a quick substitute outlet or new source for any particular product whose export or import has been disrupted: to cite an example, Turkey is dependent on American spare parts for its military equipment and faced difficulties in keeping its military aircraft in the air when the U.S. Imposed an arms embargo in 1975.
- When foreign trade has a large place in a country's economy: the high level of dependency of the Japanese economy on Middle East oil is an example of this.
- When the economy is dependent on the export of a single or a few commodities: for instance, Ghana's economic well-being is closely linked to the price of cocoa on the international market.
- 4. If the country's imports include a product of critical importance; for example, the U.S. share in Turkey's foreign trade is roughly 10%, but a good proportion of this consists of military spare parts that are considered indispensable.

presence of non-Muslims from the economy and replace them with Muslim Turks. This was the second phase of "nationalizing the economy" after the first phase at the Lausanne Conference was over. We know from British ambassador R. Lindsay's dispatches to London that in the 1920s foreign companies were required to keep their books in Turkish and that at least 75% of their personnel had to be Muslim Turks. This Turkification policy led to Law No. 2007, dated 11 June 1932, entitled "Law on Professions and Services Reserved for Turkish Citizens in Turkey." It excluded foreign nationals from a long list of professions and trades (including photographers, barbers, shoemakers, construction workers, chauffeurs, security guards, veterinarians, chemical engineers, and others) (Aktar, pp. 4–18).

The economic dependency of the 1923–30 period was in part due to the Treaty of Lausanne's prohibition against raising customs duties for a period of five years. It also derived its strength from the corrupt practices known as "affairism" and the political circumstances of that period (Box 2-2).

Politics

Between 1923 and 1930 M. Kemal and his friends were able to resolve three important questions.

The first question related to the elimination of the alternative leadership and the coalitions of the War of Liberation. The alternative leadership, consisting entirely of Unionist soldiers and civilians, was eliminated by taking advantage of the Sheikh Said uprising of 1925 and the 1926 attempt on the life of M. Kemal in İzmir. In regard to the coalitions, the Islamists were eliminated when the caliphate was abolished in 1924. The Communists and Kurds were dealt with as a result of the 1925 uprising. It was after this that M. Kemal, having established his undisputed leadership, would deliver his great speech in 1927 and demonstrate that he was in charge.

The second question, dealing with the principal Westernizing reforms, took up most of the government's time until 1930. These reforms were the abolition of the caliphate in 1924, the new civil code in 1926, the penal code in 1927, the adoption of the Latin alphabet in 1928, and the removal from the Constitution of the phrase "the religion of the state is Islam" in 1928.

The third and most important question was the suppression of the Kurdish nationalist revolt in 1930. It was only after eliminating this serious question of internal security that the state was able to assert its authority in the east. With the Tunceli operation in 1937, the regime

Box 2-2. Affairism and Affairists

The word affairiste (derived from the French affairisme) is defined in the Larousse Dictionary as someone who is constantly seeking his or her own interest, a profiteer, a trickster. Affairisme (defined as "[political] racketeering" in Le Grand Robert dictionary) is defined as the tendency to put commercial considerations above all else. This word was coined in Turkey in the 1920s and was inspired by the name of the is Bankasi, which is translated into French as Banque d'Affaires.

When the Türkiye İş Bankası was founded, a number of politicians converged on the bank to use their influential positions to secure loans and other benefits by acting as the representatives of entrepreneurs and/or foreign business circles. They were not averse to taking advantage of the fact that M. Kemal was the principal shareholder in the bank. The easiest way to earn money in Turkey was to use the influence of the state, even if it put the capital of the bank at risk. To secure business, foreigners had to acquire a "mask" (intermediary) in Ankara. This practice became so widespread and so natural that at one point two rival foreign firms bidding for a defense contract hired the same member of parliament to represent their respective firms (Atay, p. 455).

As a result, the regime's policies of supporting local capitalists resulted not in nationalizing the bourgeoisie as intended but in giving a Levantine aura to Ankara and to the deputies who operated in this environment. (Levantines were the European nationals who lived in Ottoman port cities over a long period.) The only thing that was different from Ottoman times was that the only intermediary between the foreign trader and the consumer in the past was the Levantine, whereas now the members of parliament were a new tier of intermediaries, rendering the condition of the consumer worse than before.

The most damaging effect of the affairists was their effort to give the production rights of basic commodities like paper or sugar to private enterprise rather than to the state. Affairism was also present in the 1930s and resulted in the resignation of prime minister Ismet Inonu in November 1937 for advocating the public ownership of key sectors of the economy. Upon his resignation, Celal Bayar, the first general manager of Türkiye iş Bankası, became prime minister. The magazine Kadro, which saw statism (state ownership of the means of production) as a "third way between communism and capitalism" that could be a model for all developing countries and the sole means for Turkey to achieve its independence, ceased publication as a result of its criticism of the Türkiye is Bankası and its circle of friends. The magazine had been in publication from 1932 until October 1934. Its publisher, Y.K. Karaosmanoğlu, was sent as ambassador to Tirana (Albania) when the magazine was forced to cease publication.

was able to break the last focus of resistance in Dersim (Box 2-3).

In dealing with these questions, the regime neglected both foreign policy and the endemic corruption of the influential politicians. But with the 1930 Serbest Cumhuriyet Firkasi (SCF: Free Republican Party) event (Box

Box 2-3. The Kurdish Uprisings, 1925-1937

The Kurdish tribal chiefs' uprisings during the Ottoman eraoccurred mainly from 1806 to 1843 as a reaction to the centralizing policies of Mahmut II. The last uprising instigated by the shelkhs who replaced these tribal chiefs was in 1925 (see Box 2-6).

In the Ottoman Empire the Kurdish population was semiautonomous, and its allegiance to the state in the last years of the empire derived from the fact that it saw the Armenians as the common foe and felt bound to the caliphate. With the deportation of the Armenians in 1915 and the abolition of the caliphate in 1924, these ties of allegiance lost their raison d'être. Although their numbers were relatively small, the Kurdish elite caused the Kurdish uprising in 1925. When this uprising was suppressed, a nationalist nucleus that established the Hoybun organization in Lebanon in 1927 supported the Ağri uprising (see Box 2-12). This uprising was suppressed in 1930 by operations that also involved the air force.

After Ağrı the Kurdish revolts were more in the nature of aftershocks of the 1925 uprising. In 1937 Ankara decided to extinguish the last focus of rebellion under the leadership of Seyit Riza in Dersim by mounting the Tuncell operation. In preparation for this operation, roads and railroads had been built to transport troops and military outposts had been strengthened. In 1934 the law on resettlement and in 1935 the Tuncell law were passed. In 1937 the Sadabad Pact was concluded. The military operation extended to 1938, when Kurdish resistance was finally broken. The pacification operations had been in progress from 1925 to 1937, but the two principal revolts occurred in 1925 and 1930. These successive revolts constituted the chief domestic question of the interwar years.

The next Kurdish uprising took place forty-six years later when the PKK (Partiya Karkeren Kürdistan: Kurdistan Labor Party) carried out raids in 1984 against Eruh and Şemdinli in southeastern Turkey. This uprising was suppressed to a large extent after the apprehension of Abdullah Öcalan in February 1999 (see Box 7-16 in Section 7) and in the antiterrorism atmosphere of 9/11 but restarted after June 2005 (see Section 8).

2-4) the discontentment of the people became manifest and the leadership was aroused. Corruption was weeded out, and measures were subsequently taken to control the chaos caused by the crisis of 1929. As a result, the system of "statism" would be introduced and the industrialization through import substitution (IIS) model would be adopted.

B. The Period from 1930 to 1939 and Statism

The Economy

The statism of this period was made necessary by the developments of the preceding period (Gülalp, pp. 29–31). That period witnessed corruption and the difficulties

Box 2-4. The Free Republican Party Event of 1930

The Free Republican Party (SCF: Serbest Cumhuriyet Firkası) was established at the behest of President M. Kemal, who was aware of the domestic problems, by his friend Ali Fethi [Okyar] on 12 August 1930. The intent was to rouse up the ruling Republican People's Party (CHP) and to gauge the strength of the opposition. The new party's political and economic ideology was liberal, and it was friendly to foreign capital. This compelled prime minister İsmet İnönü to declare in Sivas on 30 August 1930 that the CHP was "moderately statist." He thus introduced the term "statist" to Turkey's political discourse. Seven years after the War of Liberation the SCF received unexpected popular support in reaction to the "affairism" of the CHP and the hardship caused by the economic crisis of 1929. Within twelve days of its registration as a party, the SCF had 130,000 applications for membership (Keyder, p. 101). Against this, the CHP did not even have an organized presence in some southeastern provinces. When Fethi Bey went to Izmir in September, a child was shot by a police officer during disturbances. The child's father placed the body before the party leader and exclaimed: "Here is a martyr! We are prepared to endure more sacrifices! Please save us!" The incident aroused the concern of the government (Aydemir, p. 398). When the SCF scored big successes in the local elections held in October, Fethi Bey too was alarmed. He realized that the party could only come to power by opposing president Ataturk and hence dissolved the party.

resulting from the opening of the economy to the world superimposed on the penury of the Anatolian population, which was suffering from the effects of successive wars since 1911. The people were at the end of their tether. The regime had loosened up, especially after 1927, and the shock of the Free Republican Party forced it to reappraise the situation. The settling of accounts within the revolutionary cadres was over, the Kurdish uprising had been suppressed, the main reforms had been carried out, and the five-year restriction on raising customs tariffs imposed at Lausanne had expired. Above all, there was the global economic crisis. The combined effect of these factors forced the government to undertake an industrialization program led by the state. The Soviet Union had provided planning assistance as well as credits to support the program that opened up new employment opportunities and helped to relieve the scarcity of imported goods. The new development model would close the economy to the outside world, reduce dependency to a minimum, and provide the economic basis for ensuring the relative autonomy of the state. Whereas the balance of trade was in deficit until 1930, the situation was reversed after that year with successive surpluses ranging from $0.3 million to over $20 million up to 1938, when a deficit of $3.9 million was registered (see Table 2-2 above).

Politics

Statism in the economy and the state's full control of the country's political life were the distinguishing features of this period. During this time new lands were brought under the plow; despite the crisis, 200 kilometers of railroad were added to the network each year. This helped in reviving the economy (Kuruç, pp. 22-23). But that did not result in any measurable improvement in the people's daily lives. It was necessary to resort to ideology in pursuing the government's nation-building project (Kuyaş, pp. 9–10). For this purpose, a campaign was launched to build new schools and set up "People's Houses" where citizens could get involved in cultural activities. All of this was designed to gain the support of the masses. To this was added a campaign of indoctrination. The tools used for this campaign were pseudo-scientific and occasionally detrimental, but the project (which included the so-called Turkish History Thesis, which extolled the worth and accomplishments of Turks) did help in boosting the people's morale and overcoming the "sick-man" psychosis.

As a result of these policies, the state's relative internal autonomy increased. The intellectuals (aydınlar: the enlightened) took advantage of this to reduce Turkey's dependency on the outside world to a minimum. The aydınlar had no challengers in Turkey. Apart from the southeast, landholdings in Turkey were usually small to medium in size. The economic dominance of the non-Muslim bourgeoisie had been largely broken. The non-Muslims were reduced to a fortieth of the total population, whereas before World War I they made up a fifth (Keyder, p. 67). Foreign capital in the country was negligible, and the Turkish bourgeoisie that had replaced the non-Muslims was not even capable of maintaining the export trade because of the global crisis. From 1931 on, the single party established by the regime turned into a mechanism for controlling all aspects of life.

Much of the regime's ideology was borrowed directly from authoritarian models originating in Italy and Germany or the USSR (like One Nation/Ein Folk, One State/Ein Reich, One Leader/Ein Führer, One Party/Ein Partei, etc.). The single nation was the Turkish nation, the single state was the Turkish Republic, the single leader was Atatürk, the single party was the Republican People's Party (CHP), and the single ideology was Kemalism.

Despite the similarities with the authoritarian models, there were significant differences deriving from Turkey's particular features and Atatürk's realism. First, nationalism was confined within the country's frontiers, with no suggestion of a nationalism that would embrace other Turkic peoples. Irredentism had no place in Turkish foreign policy. (That is why "Atatürk's nationalism" and "Turkish nationalism" are different concepts. Present-day ideologically committed Turkish nationalists reject the first concept.) Second, the regime employed nationalism not as a pretext for imperialistic actions but as a vehicle for standing up against imperialism. Third, although an authoritarian structure came into being, the ultimate goal was to "be like the West." The Western model in Atatürk's mind was not the German but the British version, so it was bound to lead to democracy. Fourth, although it actively sought to create a national bourgeoisie, it kept the bourgeoisie under strict state control. Fifth, although the state was under the control of the party in the Nazi, Fascist, and Communist regimes, in Turkey the party was always under state control. In 1935 the minister of the interior became the secretary-general of the CHP and the provincial governors became the CHP's provincial chairs. This arrangement was designed to keep the local notables under supervision. Sixth, unlike the Nazis and Fascists, the state never established paramilitary organizations to bring pressure on dissidents. Finally, the nation-building method employed by Atatürk's nationalism, although it had its ethnic overtones and mainly emphasized "Turkishness," did not base itself on blood as in Germany but adopted a culture-based territorial model as in France (Ernest Renan model). In the 1990s advocates of democratic reforms reinterpreted this model as "constitutional citizenship" (Oran, pp. 41–50).

It is because of these factors that Turkey drew closer to Britain and France rather than Germany and Italy in this period. Thanks to its relative internal autonomy, Turkey was able to take rational economic measures to cope with the 1929 crisis without being hindered by its class structure and was also able to make rational decisions that reflected on its foreign policy.

III. THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE PERIOD

A. Three Views on Atatürk's Foreign Policy

The foreign policy of the period from 1923 to 1939, which can be described as Atatürk's period, was the subject of arguments in the late 1960s and 1970s when foreign policy discussions began. It is important to review these arguments (some of which are still going on) before analyzing this period. They are focused on three areas: (1) Does the Turkish revolution belong to the Third World or is it Western-oriented? (2) Is it anti-imperialist or not? (3) Is it expansionist? The first two questions were raised by the Left, while the third question was raised by the racist segment of the Right (Oran, pp. 157–79).

With reference to the first question, some authors claimed that the War of Liberation was the forerunner and perhaps the inspiration of the Third World (that is, the downtrodden nations). These concepts were much in vogue during the 1970s. It was also claimed that Atatürk's foreign policy was the first example of nonalignment, another fashionable concept of the time. They quoted from his speeches to prove their points.

As a matter of fact, Atatürk had uttered words that confirmed such views: "The day will come when the oppressed nations will surely destroy the oppressors. With this, the words oppressed and oppressor will disappear from the earth and mankind will achieve a social condition befitting its dignity" (Atatürk'ün Söylev ve Demeçleri, C. II, p. 29, 3 January 1922). "If Turkey's battle had been fought solely for its own benefit, it would probably have been less bloody and would have ended sooner... What Turkey was defending was the cause of the oppressed, the cause of the eastern peoples" (p. 40, 7 July 1922). "In this sacred struggle our nation is proud to help secure the salvation of Islam and promote the prosperity of the oppressed of the world" (p. 19, 14 October 1921). "They want to destroy, trample on, dismember Anatolia... The ultimate target of this attack is the entire East... With its defiance, Anatolia is not only doing what is necessary for its own survival, but protecting the East from aggression" (p. 21, 18 October 1921).

All of these phrases were uttered before the final victory and in diplomatic gatherings where there were no Westerners. The first quotation is from the speech delivered at the banquet in honor of General Frunze, the Ukrainian envoy; the second at the banquet of Soviet ambassador Aralov; the last two at meetings attended by the ambassador of Azerbaijan. Atatürk's purpose was to gain the support of the East for the ongoing Anatolian revolution.

It should also be recalled that in the interwar years there were only a handful of independent downtrodden nations, which carried little weight. There is no doubt that Atatürk's realistic foreign policy was pro-West. In any case, with the abolition of the caliphate, relations with Islamic Eastern states turned sour, and they did not start improving until 1933.

In regard to the second argument, some authors have contended that the War of Liberation, which formed the basis of the Turkish Revolution, was not anti-imperialist in character because it was not waged against the West but against the Armenians and the Greeks. Furthermore, the Western states were granted new economic concessions even during the war.

As a matter of fact, the Turkish revolution had nothing to do with anticapitalism. It was the reverse: the revolution was intended to integrate Turkey with the international system. But the capitalist features of the state created by the revolution did not prevent it from being against imperialism. It was seeking development not through international capitalism but through national capitalism that would bring prosperity to the country and protect the economy from the outside world. At the time, it was not possible to foresee that the local capitalists would be pursuing the same goal of profit maximization and that they would link up with international capitalism when the time was ripe in order to achieve this. Atatürk's Westernism was a strategy that can be described as "Westernization with full independence." The Soviets had noted this feature of the revolution and provided great assistance both during the War of Liberation and in the interwar years.

In regard to the granting of concessions during the War of Liberation, it will be recalled that these were used to play one Western state against another.

The racist far Right in Turkey got involved in the third argument by rejecting the restrictive interpretation of the National Pact. The rightists saw this document as a constricting vise and claimed that Atatürk favored expansionist policies, basing themselves on his policy in regard to Hatay. This school of thought was supported by the followers of the "Neo-Ottomanist" trend after the 1990s and has found adherents up to the present.

Hatay was Atatürk's personal cause, and the annexation of Hatay was a result of this fact. On repeated occasions (24 February 1920, 1 May 1920, 28 December 1920) he had declared that "our national rights extend to the south of Iskenderun" and claimed that Hatay was included in the National Pact (Atatürk'ün Söylev ve Demeçleri, C. I, pp. 28 and 71; Atatürk'ün Söylev ve Demeçleri, C. II, p. 12). But when Atatürk was pressed on the issue in the TGNA on 16 October 1921, he was embarrassed and forced to declare: "What is the armistice line? Does such a line exist? Of course not...The line that we'll fix with our might shall become the frontier line" (TBMM Gizli Celse Zabıtları, pp. 354-55). He was forced to make this statement because four days later, on 20 October, he would be reaching an agreement with Franklin-Bouillon. In this agreement Atatürk consented to drawing the frontier north of Iskenderun in order to secure the evacuation of Anatolia by French forces.

This concession rankled Atatürk. At a time when there was no serious domestic pressure to correct the situation and when his leadership was unchallenged at home, he decided to do something about it before he died. The formal annexation of Hatay occurred on 7 July 1939 after his death, but Atatürk lived to see the declaration of an independent Hatay Republic on 2 September 1938.

That is why the annexation of Hatay, which was an irredentist act, cannot be taken as an example of a policy of irredentism.

Let us now turn our attention to the implementation of Turkish foreign policy.

B. Foreign Policy in the East: The Kurdish Question

During this period Turkey concluded a number of agreements and protocols dealing with friendship, security, good neighborliness, neutrality, nonaggression, and cooperation with countries to its east and south. Among these can be cited agreements with Iran in 1926 and 1932, with France as trustee for Syria in 1926, and with Britain as trustee for Iraq in 1926. In 1937 Turkey signed the Sadabad Pact with Iran, Iraq, and Afghanistan.

When these agreements are examined, it becomes clear that Turkey's single concern with regard to the security of its eastern and southern frontiers was the common denominator in all of them: to ensure the joint control of the Kurdish tribes. This concern reached its pinnacle with the Sadabad Pact, which was the foreign policy dimension of the Tunceli operation carried out in 1937–38. The motive for the pact was that Kurdish insurgents who were pursued and cornered in one country slipped across the border to another country. The main task of Turkish foreign policy concerning the eastern provinces in that period was to prevent Turkey's principal domestic question from having international repercussions.

These concerns even led Turkey to occupy a portion of Iranian territory in 1930. The insurgents from the region of Mount Ağrı (Ararat) had fled to Iran when cornered and sought sanctuary on Lesser Mount Ağrı. The army pursued the insurgents and surrounded Lesser Mount Ağrı, located on Iranian territory. The problem was subsequently resolved through an exchange of territory with Iran, whereby Lesser Ağrı was incorporated in Turkey and Iran was compensated with an equivalent stretch of Turkish territory. This incident reveals how preoccupied the Turkish foreign-policy establishment was with the Kurdish question.

c. Foreign Policy in the West:The Question of Balance vs. Alliance

As in the case of the Ottoman Empire in the nineteenth century, Turkey as a strategic medium power was compelled to choose between relying on the balance of power or joining an alliance (Hale, p. 72). There was always the danger that a medium power in alliance with major powers would end up as a satellite.

As long as it was possible, Turkey relied successfully on the balance of power. In this instance, there were three groups to consider: (1) Britain and France; (2) Germany and Italy; and (3) the USSR.

Turkey's foreign-policy strategy was laid down by Atatürk and carried out by Tevfik Rüştü Aras. The general approach to these three groups was as follows.

- 1. The top priority was to resolve outstanding problems with the first group. To this end, Mosul was given up in 1926, leaving no contentious issue with Britain. Turkey established friendly relations with Greece in 1930 and obtained membership in the League of Nations (LoN) in 1932.
- 2. The policy was to remain distant from the second group and to ward off the threats emanating from Italy. Although the Turkish regime derived much inspiration from these countries, Atatürk never gave any thought to cordiality or alliance with these countries. He saw this group only as a counterweight to the first group. Atatürk perceived the West in the Anglo-Saxon context and was by nature averse to adventurism. He was probably also influenced by the fact that his archrival and adversary Enver Paşa was strongly pro-German.

Fascist Italy was pursuing a policy of looking upon the Mediterranean as "Mare Nostrum" (Our Sea); it was entrenched in the Dodecanese Islands and was openly coveting Antalya. This forced Turkey to distance itself further from Germany even though Germany and Italy had a major share of Turkey's foreign trade (see Table 2.3 above).

3. Unlike the situation in previous periods of history, no threat came from the USSR during this time. On the contrary, the USSR provided welcome assistance in the area of planning, which was greatly needed at the time to carry out the policies of statism. Turkey used its friendship with the USSR as a counterweight to the countries in groups 1 and 2.

The Search for a Balance of Power

Until the mid-1930s foreign policy had a low priority in Turkey. The pressing domestic questions and the absence of any particular external threat kept foreign policy issues in the background. Turkey's main concern at the time was to tidy up the questions left outstanding after Lausanne and to bring the Kurdish question under control in cooperation with its neighbors.

After Hitler came to power in 1933 and with the emergence of the Italian threat, Atatürk shifted course toward a search for a balance of power in an environment that was headed toward war. This policy found its expression in the Balkan Pact of 1934. But the search for a regional balance of power proved unfruitful, because the Balkan states other than Greece proved to be timid and because Britain and France were not ready to confront Germany and Italy.

In these circumstances Turkey would seek an alliance with the first group and try to draw the USSR into this alliance.

The Search for Alliance

Some writers and scholars in Turkey have considered the Turkish policy of entering into an alliance with Britain and France in October 1939 and remaining on the side of these countries rather than staying neutral during the war to be a departure from Atatürk's foreign policy.

Turkey chose this course, however, only after it became apparent that the policy of relying on the balance of power was no longer a viable option. The manifestation of this was the 1936 Medite ranean Pact, which foreign policy experts in Turkey have not analyzed sufficiently. Through this pact Britain give unilateral guarantees to certain Mediterranean countries when Italy started fortifying the Aegean islands and undertook the invasion of Abyssinia in 1935. Britain retracted its guarantee, again unilaterally, some months later. Turkey was eager to be a part of this arrangement, even though being a beneficiary of a unilateral guarantee would not contribute to its standing in the world. Atatürk had close relations with the British ambassador Percy Loraine, with whom he frequently exchanged ideas. Atatürk pressed the ambassador to help transform Turkey's relations with Britain into a bilateral alliance. But Britain still harbored hopes of drawing Italy to its side while pursuing a policy of appeasement vis-àvis Germany. Had Britain agreed, the alliance of October 1939 could have been consummated in 1936, because Turkey had already made up its mind at that time.

The course of Turkish foreign policy became evident with two apparently economic decisions that were actually political. When the restrictions on Turkish sovereignty over the Straits were removed at Montreux in 1936, Britain was awarded the contract for the refortification of the waterway. Turkey also awarded the contract for the construction of the Karabük Iron and Steelworks to Britain in 1936. Nevertheless, Turkey did not want to stray too much from a policy of balance: a German firm was selected to carry out the technical supervision of the construction of the steelworks. After this, the two contending European powers would vie with one another to offer loans to Turkey on favorable terms.

Because of Britain's indecision, the alliance could not be achieved right away. The invasion of Czechoslovakia in March 1939 finally aroused Britain.

The alliance of October 1939 was a natural outgrowth of Atatürk's foreign policy. The essence of Turkey's Western European policy in this period was to draw close to Britain and France while trying to get the USSR to join this group. Turkey went to great lengths to achieve this end. It kept the USSR informed about its negotiations with Britain in the hope that Moscow would join the alliance. Moscow, however, was aware of Britain's policy of pushing Germany to attack the USSR, which drove it to sign a nonaggression pact with Germany in August 1939. It was the USSR that, at Germany's request, tried to dissuade Turkey from forming the tripartite alliance of October 1939. (When Saracoğlu, the minister of foreign affairs, went to Moscow, Joachim von Ribbentrop was also there.) Once the Hatay question with France was resolved, the alliance was ready for signature. The delay occurred because of the expectation that Moscow would change its stance.

Three weeks after the occupation of Poland, Saracoğlu went to Moscow (September–October 1939) to try to persuade his hosts to join the alliance. When he failed in his impossible mission, the tripartite alliance was signed even before the minister of foreign affairs returned home.

IV. GENERAL APPRAISAL

The foreign policy of this period has been described in Turkey as being based on self-respect. This characterization is apt.

1. Turkey was able to achieve this despite the constraints of its foreign trade. In effect, Britain's share in Turkey's exports in 1938 was 3.4%, while the corresponding figure for Germany was 42.9%. Britain's share in Turkey's imports was 11.2%, while Germany's was 47%. In 1936 Germany's share in Turkey's exports was 51%, while it supplied 45.1% of Turkey's imports. Through its clearing policy in trade (a barter system that renders a country's foreign trade dependent on the stronger partner), Germany had established a stranglehold on Turkey's foreign trade

Italy's share in Turkey's foreign trade was also considerable until Turkey's open disapproval of Italy's Abyssinian adventure. In 1931 Britain received 8.5% of Turkey's exports, while Italy's share was 24.2%. In that year, Britain provided 11.3% of Turkey's imports, while Italy's share was 14.6%. Despite the dominant position of these two countries in its foreign trade, Turkey maintained a balance by aligning itself politically with the first group.

As regards the USSR, Turkey was able to reject communism domestically while cooperating with Moscow in the international arena. This approach was realistic and balanced.

- 2. Turkey pursued this balanced policy at a time of great economic hardship. It was repaying the Ottoman debt, coping with the effects of the 1929 depression, building railroads, nationalizing foreign-owned railroads, and so on. Foreign debt repayments occasionally reached figures in excess of 50% of Turkey's export earnings (see Table 2.2 above). As a result of the agreements reached with French creditors, the ratio of debt repayments to export earnings rose from 2.45% to 20.53% in 1929 and peaked in 1935 at 57.33%.
- 3. Turkey pursued its policy even while it obtained new loans from abroad. It could do this because it did not borrow haphazardly and continuously. It borrowed in a rational way to nationalize the concessions, finance industrialization, and strengthen its defense capabilities. This allowed it to repay these debts in an orderly way until 1950 (Gürsel, pp. 471–72).

The secret of this success lies in the three factors explained earlier.

- 1. In the interwar period Turkey enjoyed, for the first time, an international environment that allowed it to exercise a broad degree of relative autonomy. This was a considerable blessing for a medium power like Turkey.
- 2. Turkey was able to make maximum use of this situation. It was able to reinforce its relative external autonomy with rational economic policies. Among these were industrialization through import substitution, minimum foreign borrowing, observing strict financial discipline, constructing railroads without external assistance, and so forth. It implemented a rational foreign policy commensurate with its possibilities and means. It knew how to observe rules. As a striking example of this, one can cite the annexation of territory by adhering to rules and thereby avoiding complications: the occupation and annexation of Lesser Mount Ağrı in 1930 was carried out by relinquishing land and without disturbing regional or global balances. The annexation of Hatay was also carried out with the consent of the influential regional power, France, and no irredentism arose after that episode.
  - 3. While conveying the message to the first group that it had no intention of deviating from the Western structure, Turkey used the second and third groups as a counterweight and let it be known that it would be a part of this structure on its own terms.

As a result, Turkey took its place in the international arena as a successful country enjoying relative autonomy during this period.

Relations with Western Europe

RELATIONS WITH BRITAIN

As a result of the successful conclusion of the War of Liberation, the Allied forces evacuated Anatolia and İstanbul; but Britain's presence in the Middle East remained through its mandates in the region. With the signing of the Locarno Treaties in 1925, a relative stability was established in Europe. Aside from the issue of Mosul with Britain, no serious question came up in the Middle East during the 1920s.

A. Developments after Lausanne

At the Conference of Lausanne, which opened on 20 November 1922, the principal actors were minister of foreign affairs Ismet Paşa on the Turkish side and his adversary Lord Curzon, the British foreign secretary.

Another issue that affected relations with Britain was the question of moving the British Embassy to Ankara. Having led the Anatolia movement from Ankara, M. Kemal and his comrades proclaimed Ankara the capital of the new state. This was a strategic decision. In the final stages of the Ottoman Empire, its capital, Istanbul, was easily besieged in wartime.

Like several other states, Britain did not accept this move and for a long time refused to transfer its embassy to Ankara. It even used undiplomatic language when referring to this subject. Foreign secretary Austen Chamberlain declared in November 1924 that Britain could not send a diplomat with the rank of ambassador to "a small, dirty mountain village in remote Anatolia" (FO371-10194, E9848-210-44, in Acar, p. 90, footnote 2).

This was just an excuse with little validity. What rankled Britain was that Turkey had established a new state after a national struggle and that its capital had been shifted from Levantine Istanbul to Anatolian Ankara.

Ankara was eager to eliminate this source of discord with Britain, because it wanted good relations with London. It gave Britain, free of charge, a plot for an embassy building in Ankara. Nevertheless, Britain moved its embassy to Ankara only in 1926, after the Mosul question had been resolved to Britain's satisfaction.

The Mosul question was the most important source of tension between the two countries in the mid-1920s.

B. The Question of Mosul

From the 1923 Lausanne Conference to 1926 the question of Mosul was one of the main obstacles to the smooth development of Turkey's relations with Britain and with the Western states in general. As a matter of fact, the question of Mosul would remain on Turkey's foreign policy agenda in different guises after 1926 and even in the 1990s.

As noted earlier, a substantial portion of Mosul was in Ottoman hands when the armistice was signed on 30 October 1918. Britain started occupying the region on 3 November, and by 15 November the province was under total British control. When the Mudanya Armistice was signed in October 1922 following the War of Liberation, Mosul had not yet been liberated. Its ultimate fate would be discussed at the Lausanne Conference. (The following information is mainly based on Kürkçüoğlu 1972, pp. 275–89, and OTDP, pp. 70–73.)

For Turkey, Mosul was important for security reasons and because of the composition of its population. It was also rich in oil. Britain was interested in the province because of the oil and also because it was located on the route to India. Lord Curzon underlined Britain's strategic considerations when he asserted that the Euphrates was the western limit of Britain (meaning India) (Box 2-5). With these considerations in mind, Britain tightened its control over the region and in October 1922 signed an agreement with Faisal, who had been installed as king of Iraq by Britain. Although the Shiite and Kurdish segments of the population and most of the inhabitants of Mosul objected to the agreement, Britain's pressure ensured its ratification by Iraq. However, this did not result in full British control of northern Iraq. As noted above, at the time when the Lausanne Conference got underway in

Box 2-5. Britain's Kurdish Policy in the 1920s

Britain's Kurdish policy from the late 1910s to late 1920s shifted from one period to another, but the objective remained constant to maintain its control in the region. To achieve this objective Britain considered different approaches: establishment of a Kurdish state located in Turkey and Iraq, an autonomous Kurdish region, a chain of easily controllable Kurdish statelets, a Kurdish state in Iraq. But carrying out these different options was another matter, and Britain faced many obstacles.

First, Britain had promised the territory in question to the Kurds, Arabs, and Armenians, and it proved very difficult to reconcile their conflicting and overlapping claims. The Kurds informed Britain that they would not accept being placed under Armenian rule and would join forces with Turkey if that occurred. To prevent a negative Kurdish reaction, Britain had to withdraw its support of the Armenians and sought to involve the U.S.

Second, Britain had trouble bringing the Kurds under its control and overcoming their internal differences. The same question would confront the U.S. in the 1990s.

Finally, the British establishment itself was divided on the issue of how to deal with the Kurdish question. The India Office wanted to see an autonomous Kurdish state, Lord Curzon called for turning the Kurdish region into a British zone of influence, and Winston Churchill advocated the creation of a Kurdish state that would serve as a buffer between Turkey and the Arab region.

In 1918 Britain sent Maj. E. W. C. Noel, an expert on the region, on a fact-finding and special intelligence mission to southeast Anatolia and Mosul. This mission would have an important bearing on Britain's Kurdish policies. Noel was pro-Kurdish by inclination, which earned him the sobriquet of "the Kurdish Lawrence" (in reference to the famous "Lawrence of Arabia"). Even the Foreign Office found him to be too friendly to the Kurds. Noel's efforts were aimed at sowing discord between Turks and Kurds, securing the allegiance of the Kurds to Britain, and creating a Kurdish state. He was the architect of a failed plan to storm the Congress of Sivas with the help of the governor of Elazig, Ali Galip.

The Kurdish issue was discussed in April 1920 at the preparatory meeting in San Remo, and the envisaged settlement of the question took its final form in articles 62–64 of the Treaty of Sèvres (see "The Peace Treaty of Sèvres" in Section 1).

By this arrangement, Kurdistan was to be divided into a northern and a southern region, with the southern region (that is, Mosul) remaining under British rule. The concept of a unified Kurdistan was being dropped because the two regions were completely different, in Britain's view. The north had no oil fields and was mountainous and hence difficult to control. The south was rich in oil and was flat, so it came under British domination. The northern Kurds were opposed to being incorporated in an Armenian state, so they threw in their lot with Ankara's liberation struggle. The Iraqi Kurds were to cause trouble for Britain with their insurgencies.

At Lausanne the Kurds were not given the status of a minority. In fact, there was no mention of Kurds anywhere in the treaty. After Lausanne the Kurds were used by Britain to unsettle Turkey and to undermine Turkish claims to Mosul.

(I. UZGEL)

November 1922, the insurgency led by Sheikh Mahmut Berzenci was taking place in Suleymaniyah and Revanduz. The insurgents were being given support by the district officer (kaymakam) Özdemir Bey (see "The International Environment and Dynamics" in Section 1), whom M. Kemal had sent to the region. Britain was hard pressed to suppress the insurgency, having to use all the means at its disposal, including the Royal Air Force. It took Britain a full year after the Lausanne Conference was concluded to pacify and occupy the region.

1. The Question of Mosul at the Lausanne Conference

The negotiations started in Lausanne against this background. At first Ismet Paşa requested that this question be taken up in bilateral negotiations. At these negotiations, Ismet Paşa reminded Lord Curzon that Anatolia was poor and needed the income from petroleum. Lord Curzon claimed that the question of Mosul had nothing to do with oil and suggested that it would be more advisable to seek loans from London rather than insisting on Mosul. He also recommended talking to the oil companies.

When these bilateral talks proved fruitless, the question was taken up at the conference on 23 January 1923.

Britain had a very inflexible position at the negotiations. İsmet Paşa put forward the Turkish arguments while rejecting the validity of Britain's arguments, many of them based on questionable facts. The arguments are summarized below.

The Turkish Position

İsmet Paşa used ethnographic, legal, historical, economic, political, military, and strategic arguments when presenting the Turkish position at the conference.

Turkey's ethnographic argument was that the region's population of about 500,000 was made up of 263,000 Kurds, 146,000 Turks, 43,000 Arabs, 18,000 Yezidis, and 13,000 non-Muslims. Ismet Paşa informed the conference that the Kurds and Turks were a clear majority in the region. Basing himself on the Encyclopaedia Britannica, he claimed that the Kurds were of Turanian origin and that—contrary to Britain's claims—the Turks and the Kurds wanted to live together. He also declared that the government of the TGNA was the government of the Turks as well as of the Kurds and that the Kurdish deputies in the Assembly did not want to see Mosul detached. Since Arabs were a minority in the region, there were no valid grounds for giving Mosul to Iraq.

The legal argument was that Mosul had been occupied after the armistice. This was against international law as well as Wilson's principles. Britain's arguments based on the right of conquest violated the spirit of the time as well as international law. Turkey asked for a plebiscite, which Britain rejected on the grounds that the local population was poorly educated.

The historic argument was that Mosul had been Turkish without interruption since the eleventh century.

İsmet Paşa also reminded the conference that geographically Mosul was an extension of Anatolia. With the construction of railroads to the Mediterranean, Mosul would be linked to Anatolia rather than to Iraq. Economically Mosul's links were with Diyarbakır and Mediterranean ports. Iraq would get Baghdad and Basra, and this would be enough to give the new state economic viability and self-sufficiency.

Mosul was also important for Turkey militarily and strategically, because it provided the link between different parts of southern Anatolia. If the security of Baghdad was important, as Britain claimed, then the same argument applied to İstanbul and the regime of the Straits had to be formulated with Turkey's security in mind. In any case, Turkey had no intention of attacking its neighbors.

In addition to these arguments, the Turkish delegation also drew attention to the inconsistencies in Britain's arguments regarding Mosul. Britain argued that by its agreement of October 1922 with Baghdad it was committed to defending Iraq's territorial integrity. İsmet Paşa recalled that when Britain signed the Sykes-Picot Agreement it agreed to detach Mosul from Iraq and give it to France. He also asserted that the agreement with Iraq could have no validity because it was signed at a time when Iraq was still formally part of the Ottoman Empire.

İsmet Paşa repudiated the argument often used by Britain that it had responsibilities toward the Arabs. He rejected the British approach that Iraq must remain under a mandate regime.

Ismet Paşa gave assurances that the world would not be deprived of its oil resources if Mosul remained within Turkey. He also showed his determination to Lord Curzon by declaring that he would not return to Ankara without Mosul.

The British Position

Britain contested the accuracy of Turkish population figures. It argued that the Turks of the region made up one-twelfth of the total population. According to Britain, there were 455,000 Kurds, 66,000 Turks, and 62,000 Christians in the region.

The main British argument was to refute the Turkish assertion that Turks and Kurds were of the same stock. Britain claimed that the two peoples came from different origins and had different characteristics. Lord Curzon tried to undermine the Turkish thesis by referring to Kurds as a Muslim minority. In addition to this argument, Curzon accused the Turks of mistreating the Armenians and other minorities.

Curzon recalled that under article 8 of the October 1922 agreement with Iraq Britain undertook not to give up any Iraqi territory and leaving Mosul to the Turks would violate this provision.

On the subject of economic viability, Britain maintained that the region's economic links were with the south and the west.

Britain also pointed out that if Mosul went to Turkey the frontier would be only sixty miles from Baghdad and that this would constitute a threat to Iraq's security. Turkey had to insist throughout the conference that it had no designs on those territories that were not included in the National Pact.

Against the Turkish argument that Mosul had been occupied after the signing of the armistice, Britain replied that word of the armistice was late in reaching Mosul and that, in any case, article 7 of the Mudros Armistice allowed for such an occupation. While Turkey referred to its need for petroleum, Britain claimed that Mosul's petroleum had no effect on the British position. Curzon contended that the issue was not the fate of Mosul but the demarcation of the Turkish-Iraqi frontier.

Given Britain's intransigent stand on Mosul and Turkey's wish not to delay peace, İsmet Paşa agreed to having the matter settled with Britain within one year, whereupon the question of Mosul was removed from the conference agenda. Article 3/2 of the Lausanne Treaty was drafted to read as follows:

The frontier between Turkey and Iraq shall be laid down in friendly arrangement to be concluded between Turkey and Great Britain within nine months.

In the event of no agreement being reached between the two Governments within the mentioned time, the dispute shall be referred to the Council of the League of Nations.

The Turkish and British Governments reciprocally undertake that, pending the decision to be reached on the subject of the frontier, no military or other movement shall take place which might modify in any way the present state of the territories of which the final fate will depend upon that decision.

Hence the question of Mosul was referred to the LoN, in line with Britain's wishes. Turkey's acceptance of this formula drew sharp reactions from some deputies in the TGNA and led to heated debates on the subject. M. Kemal found himself forced to defend the arrangement. According to him, Mosul could be taken but hostilities could persist, and that was why a war with Britain should be avoided.

Ismet Paşa's compromise on Mosul was also criticized not only at the time but in later years as well and seen by the critics as a sellout for the sake of Westernization and to earn Britain's friendship.

The Haliç Conference (İstanbul Conference)

After Lausanne, Britain asked the Turkish government in October 1923 to enter into bilateral negotiations to settle the Mosul issue.

The conference met on 19 May 1924 at Haliç (Golden Horn) and therefore came to be known as the Haliç Conference. It is also referred to as the İstanbul Conference. This time the Turkish delegation was led by Fethi Bey [Okyar]. The delegation advanced the arguments that had been employed at Lausanne. Fethi Bey also stressed that the Turks and Kurds were two fraternal peoples who were committed to a united political future and who had established the Republic as equal partners: consequently, the region of Mosul, where these two elements constituted a clear majority, should revert to Turkey. To trace the frontier in any other way would be a cause of permanent insecurity and instability. This time the Turkish delegation introduced a new element into the negotiations by proposing that, as a quid pro quo for Suleymaniyah, Kirkuk, and Mosul remaining within Turkish borders, Turkey would offer Britain a partnership in the region's oil.

The head of the British delegation was Britain's high commissioner for Iraq, Percy Cox. In the course of the negotiations, he came up with the unexpected claim for Hakkari to be relinquished to the Nestorians (see Box 1-22 in Section 1). The British knew that such a claim would be rejected by Turkey. They resorted to this diplomatic maneuver of claiming more than just Mosul in order to block the negotiations so that the matter would be referred to the LoN. After the conference wound up on 5 June, a Nestorian uprising took place in the region of Hakkari on 7 August. This uprising was engineered by Britain and received British support from the air.

3. The Question of Mosul at the League of Nations

When the Haliç Conference reached a deadlock, Britain asked that the question be referred to the LoN in line with the provisions of article 3/2 of the Treaty of Lausanne. As a last resort, Turkey tried to get the Turkish Petroleum Company to use its influence over the British government in favor of Turkey, but this produced no results.

The Council of the League of Nations started its deliberations on the subject on 20 September 1924. Turkey asked for the question to be settled through a plebiscite. The British position was that the issue was not about the future of Mosul but merely a question of tracing frontiers. Britain argued that because the people of the region were mostly uneducated, holding a plebiscite could not be the solution. Instead Britain proposed the setting up of a committee. The head of the Turkish delegation pointed out that the members of the committee could not be familiar with the wishes of the inhabitants and insisted on a plebiscite.

The Committee's Report

In line with Britain's position, the Council of the League of Nations decided to set up a committee made up of three members from neutral states. The committee would have the authority to correspond with the interested states and, when necessary, to engage in fact finding. The committee consisted of Hungary's Count Paul Teleki, the Belgian Colonel Poulis, and the Swede A. Wirsen. When the committee started its work in the region, clashes erupted as a result of Britain's attempt to expand its area of control northward. Therefore the Council of the League met in Brussels and on 29 October 1924 drew a temporary line separating Hakkari from Mosul. This line came to be known as the Brussels Line. At the same time, Britain set out to create an anti-Turkish climate in the region.

Following its investigations in the region, the committee submitted its report on 16 July 1925. It accepted as valid the statistics submitted by Iraq regarding the geography and ethnic composition of the region. The committee concluded that the Kurds of the region were neither Arab nor Turkish and accepted the Brussels Line as the frontier. It acknowledged that for eleven centuries Mosul had been under Turkish sovereignty but declared that most of the region's trade was with Iraq and Syria. It concluded that the inhabitants were hardly eager to join Iraq but were not enthusiastic about joining Turkey either. The sheikhs and tribal leaders of the region had taken a stand against Turkey. To a certain degree, this was due to fear of Britain, but it was also because they expected the region to be more prosperous under a British mandate than as part of a warimpoverished Turkey.

The committee's verdict was as follows. The people want to join neither side. But from the point of view of their interest, the disputed region should not be partitioned. This decision is based on economic grounds. Consequently, the territories lying to the south of the Brussels Line should belong to Iraq under the following conditions.

- 1. The country should remain under League of Nations mandate for twenty-five years (Iraq was freed from the mandate in 1932).
- The judiciary and educational systems will employ Kurds, and Kurdish will be considered an official language.
- 3. If the mandate comes to an end and the Kurds are not granted autonomy, the people will prefer to be with the Turks rather than with the Arabs. Since the condition of Turkey is better than the condition of Iraq, the region will have to be transferred to Turkey.
- 4. If it becomes necessary to partition the territory, the Lesser Zap River could serve as the frontier. (In that case, Mosul would remain in Turkey and Kirkuk in Iraq.)

The Decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice

Britain accepted the committee's report. T. Rüştü Bey, who had replaced Fethi Bey as head of the Turkish delegation, objected on the ground that according to the Treaty of Lausanne the LoN could not make a binding decision on this subject. It could only make the decisions foreseen in the Covenant. Upon this objection, the Assembly of the LoN decided to seek the legal opinion of the Permanent Court of International Justice on the following questions:

- 1. What is the legal status of a decision rendered by the League of Nations Assembly in conformity with article 3 of the Treaty of Lausanne? Is it an arbitral award, a recommendation, or mediation?
- 2. Is unanimity required for such a decision or will a majority of votes suffice?
- 3. Can the parties to the dispute take part in the voting?

Turkey claimed that because the question was political it was not susceptible to a legal solution. It stood against referring the matter to the court and did not participate in its proceedings.

The opinion of the court, dated 21 November 1925, was as follows:

1. Article 15 of the Covenant provides that the Assembly cannot make binding decisions. However, since article

3/2 of the Treaty of Lausanne stipulates that the League of Nations shall decide on the future of the territory, its decision in this case shall be binding.

- 2. In accordance with article 5/1 of the covenant, the decision will have to be unanimous.
- 3. The parties may take part in the voting, but their votes will not be taken into account in determining the existence of unanimity.

In the meantime the Estonian general who was charged with carrying out investigations in the region was not allowed by Turkey to proceed to the areas north of the Brussels Line. In his report to the LoN, the general stated that Turkey was mistreating Christians in the region. At that time, the Sheikh Said uprising also had started (Box 2-6). It was against this background that the Assembly of the LoN decided on 6 December 1925, in Turkey's absence, to award the territory north of the Brussels Line to Turkey and the territory south of it to Iraq. Thus Mosul was awarded to Iraq.

This decision provoked a sharp reaction in Turkey. Turkey recalled its representatives in Geneva. In his address to the Congress of the Republican People's Party (CHP), M. Kemal declared that the Mosul question had revealed clearly that the European states had not given up their wish to oppress the eastern nations. The minister of foreign affairs, Tevfik Rüştü, declared that—since Turkey had not given its consent—its sovereign rights over Mosul would continue. On 17 December 1925, one day after the LoN's decision, Turkey reacted by signing the Treaty of Friendship and Neutrality with the USSR. Turkish public opinion took a strongly anti-British turn. This forced many British companies to close their operations in Turkey.

Why Turkey Lost Mosul

The most important reason for the LoN decision in favor of Britain was that Britain was the most influential member of the organization, while Turkey was not a member. Turkey had rejected the Sèvres Treaty and waged a war of national liberation. It would be unthinkable to expect that Britain and France would allow Mosul to go to a country that had upset their plans, especially since the region contained oil and had a strategic location.

At that time, British agents were spreading rumors about an impending attack by Italy and Greece in Thrace and western Turkey. These rumors caused alarm in Turkey, because of the possibility that it might find itself fighting on two fronts at once.

Furthermore, Turkey's refusal to send its representative to the Permanent Court and to allow the Estonian

Box 2-6. The Sheikh Said Uprising

Numerous Kurdish uprisings occurred from the time the Republic was declared to 1938. The first and most important of these was the Sheikh Said uprising, which erupted in February 1925 and, after spreading to fourteen provinces, was suppressed in April. Although the uprising was launched prematurely, before the necessary preparations had been completed, because of an accidental encounter, the rebels were able to lay siege to Diyarbakir. The uprising forced the Republican government to incur heavy expenditures. It was finally suppressed after the army traveled over the French railroad through Syrian territory and struck at the rebels from the rear. (Article 10 of the 1921 Turkish-French agreement had made provision for such travel by military personnel.) The aftershocks of the uprising continued until 1937 and included the Ağri uprising of 1930 (see Box 2-12 below).

The 1925 uprising has given rise to two important debates: the first on the true nature of the uprising; and the second on the question of Britain's involvement.

There are three contending theses about the nature of the uprising. The first claims that this was a religious movement, a view expressed by Sheikh Said himself at his trial. It is clear that one of the reasons why the Kurds participated enthusiastically in the War of Liberation was to save the caliphate, the other being the fear of the establishment of Armenia. This thesis is based on the argument that the abolition of the caliphate triggered the uprising. The Turkish leadership also agreed with this thesis by describing the uprising as a reactionary move. The regime would use this uprising as a pretext to break down the opposition to the reforms already carried out or contemplated and to silence the opposition through the law on the establishment of public order (Takrir-I Sükun). The first to be arrested under this law were the Communists, although they had been against the uprising.

The second thesis contends that the uprising had feudal roots and was retrograde in its nature. According to this thesis, the Kemalists were carrying out a bourgeois revolution and the backward eastern provinces were reacting to this progressive move. This is the thesis of the Turkish Communist Party and is based on the assumption that bourgeois revolutions get rid of the feudal social-economic order. This argument does not carry much weight, however, because the Kemalists waged the War of Liberation in alliance with the provincial notables and made no move to eliminate the feudal order in the rural regions when they came to power.

The third thesis sees this uprising as a manifestation of Kurdish nationalism. According to this view, only the appearance of the uprising is religious; the real force behind the uprising was the Azadi movement set up toward the end of 1921 or 1922. The leaders of the secret Azadi were regular army officers seeking Kurdish independence. They were forced to use a cleric as a front man because they needed someone to whom the simple tribal Kurds could relate, while they themselves remained in the background. Sheikh Said, a cleric of the Nakshibendi sect, was the brother-in-law of the leader of the Azadi movement, Col. Halit Bey of Cibran. During the trial the judge confirmed that the object of the uprising was Kurdish independence.

Regarding the second debate, those who assume British implication in the uprising cite three pieces of evidence to make their case. First, catalogs of British arms manufacturers were found at Sheikh Said's headquarters. This is not very persuasive, because British manufacturers of arms sold their wares to anyone, even British senemies. Second, the British had instigated and supported the Nestorian uprising of 1924 in Hakkari. Third, the uprising greatly facilitated Britain's acquisition of Mosul in 1926. This is the reason that is most frequently advanced to claim that Britain was responsible for the uprising.

Before reaching a verdict on this issue the following points should be taken into account. The British consulates in Anatolia sent dispatches to London claiming that the uprising was a ruse by Ankara to justify an intervention in Iraq. The uprising originated in the vilayet of Genç, today a part of the vilayet of Bingöl. This locality is very far from Iraq, where the British were in control. Indeed, the published British archives give no hint of British implication in the uprising. In view of the facts at our disposal, the theory of British involvement is a typical case of making assumptions about the causes by looking at the results. It assumes that since Britain benefited from the uprising, it must have had a hand in starting it.

general access to the areas under Turkish control and the allegations that it was mistreating the region's Christians weakened its position.

The occurrence of the Sheikh Said uprising at that particular time also weakened Turkey's hand at the negotiations, while damaging its economy and upsetting its military posture. Turkey's argument that the Turks and the Kurds shared a common destiny was undermined, giving Britain an important bargaining advantage. When Turkey argued that Turks and Kurds belonged to the same race and were destined to live together, Britain was able to counter by pointing out that the two peoples were at war with one another.

Although it was not directly linked to the question of Mosul, the abolition of the caliphate on 3 March 1924 also worked against Turkey. This decision angered Muslims throughout the world. Britain was pleased at this development, because it was always somewhat apprehensive about the possibility that Turkey might use religion to stir up trouble among Britain's Muslim subjects in India as well as in Egypt and the Middle East. British officials referred to Turkey's action as being harmful to its own interests. The abolition of the caliphate was also the immediate cause of the Sheikh Said uprising. Sheikh Said claimed that the abolition of the institution had severed the link that bound the Kurds to the Turks.

As a country that was just emerging from war, Turkey could not risk getting involved in a new conflict. Furthermore, the British public also was tired of war and could not contemplate the prospect of further fighting in the east, but Turkey was held back because it was not sure that it could count on the support of the USSR in case of conflict. Domestic rebellions were another reason to be cautious.

A more important reason for drawing back from conflict was Ankara's desire to reach an understanding with the Western states at an early date, establish secure borders, and get on with the task of carrying out internal reforms. A Turkey with contentious issues with Western states could not aspire to become a Western state. Without settling the Mosul question, Ankara was also finding it difficult to improve its relations with France. For example, the 1926 agreement signed with France failed to be ratified by Paris because of this. Turkey felt compelled to settle this question, which represented a serious obstacle to the Westernization of the country.

4. The 1926 Treaty and Turkey's Acceptance of the Revised Frontier

Although Turkey declared that it did not recognize the LoN decision, it did eventually enter into negotiations with Britain to reach an agreement. In the course of these negotiations Turkey made two demands. It wanted Turkey, Britain, and Iraq to agree to allocate the territory lying south of the Brussels Line to an independent Iraq. This Turkish demand produced no result.

Turkey also demanded a share of the oil wealth of the region. Britain proposed a payment of £500,000 or a royalty of 10% of Iraq's oil income for a period of twenty-five years. Foreign minister Tevfik Rüştü replied that this would not suffice and recalled that in 1909 the Ottoman Empire had received a lump sum of £2,200,000 when giving up Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The negotiations were concluded with the signing of the Treaty on the Turkish-Iraqi Frontier and Good Neighborliness in Ankara on 5 June 1926. The signatories were Turkey, Britain, and Iraq. In tracing the frontier, a slight rectification was made in the Brussels Line in favor of Turkey.

The treaty's first part related to the frontier. The second part, consisting of articles 6 to 13, dealt with good neighborly relations. Article 6 provided that "the High Contracting Parties mutually undertake to resist with all the means at their disposal the preparations by armed individuals or groups to engage in plunder or brigandage along the frontier regions and to prevent these individuals or groups from crossing the frontier." Article 7 stipulated that "when officials receive information regarding preparations by armed individuals or groups to engage in plunder or brigandage along frontier regions, they will speedily inform their opposite numbers." According to article 9: "If armed individuals or groups succeed in taking refuge in the other country after committing a crime in the frontier regions, these shall be arrested in accordance with the law and handed over, with their arms and their loot, to the authorities of the state of which they are nationals." Article 10 described frontier regions as the territory lying within seventy-five kilometers on either side of the frontier. Article 12 provided that "Turkish and Iraqi officials shall refrain from entering into any official or political communication with tribal leaders, sheikhs, or other members of tribes who are nationals of the other country, but who happen to be on their side of the frontier; nor will they allow organizations located in frontier regions to engage in propaganda activities directed at the other country." Article 13 called for the establishment of a frontier commission to meet twice a year to implement the provisions of the treaty. It is obvious that these measures were designed with the activities of Kurdish tribes in mind.

The third part of the treaty contained general provisions. Article 14 stated that "the Iraqi government shall set aside 10% of its oil revenues for payment to the government of Turkey. This shall start on the day the treaty enters into force and last for 25 years." Article 17 provided that the treaty would have a duration of ten years.

As an annex to the treaty, notes were exchanged on 5 June 1926 whereby Turkey was allowed to convert its 10% share of oil revenue into cash within twelve months if it wished to do so. Thirty days after the notification to this effect, the Iraqi government would pay Turkey the sum of £500,000.

No provisions were made in the treaty for granting the Turks (Turcomans) of the region minority rights. The main reason for this was that Turkey was opposed to making distinctions between Turks and Kurds. Had such a request been made by Turkey, Britain might have raised the question of granting minority rights to the Kurds of Turkey.

After the ratification of the treaty, Turkey's relations with Britain and France as well as with Iraq started improving. Turkey and Iraq established embassies in one another's capitals in 1928. After the mandate regime ended in 1932 and Iraq became a member of the LoN, relations continued to develop on a bilateral basis.

When the 1926 treaty expired after ten years, the two sides decided (through an exchange of notes on 8 December 1936) to extend the validity of articles 6 to 13 indefinitely. Each party would be able to give notice of termination two years in advance. On that occasion it was also decided to change the frequency of the meetings of the frontier commission. From then on, the parties would decide when the commission would meet. Britain left Iraq in 1932, so Turkey's counterpart was now Iraq. Britain retained two military bases in Iraq after its departure.

On 29 March 1946 the two countries signed the Treaty of Friendship and Good Neighborliness in Ankara. Article I of the treaty declared that the two countries "undertake to respect the frontier fixed by the 1926 treaty." Article 4 stipulated that "if the territorial integrity or the inviolability of the borders of one of the parties should come under threat of attack or if an attack should occur, the parties commit themselves to notifying immediately the competent organ of the United Nations."

Article 6 mentioned six annexed protocols. Article 1 of the sixth annexed protocol provided that "the parties are agreed to secure the resolution of all incidents and disputes liable to disrupt the stability of the region lying within 75 kilometers of either side of the common frontier." Article 11 of the same protocol stipulated that "the Parties shall reciprocally take whatever useful measures they deem appropriate on their side of the frontier to prevent the use of the frontier regions against the security and territorial integrity of the other Party."

It will be noted that from 1926 on the two countries constantly emphasized the need reciprocally to ensure the security of the frontier regions and prevent the activity of armed bands. This demonstrates that the Kurds of the region have been the most important continuous source of preoccupation from 1926 to the present. Similar arrangements were foreseen in the Sadabad Pact of 1937. These developments acquired increasing urgency in the 1980s and 1990s when it was erroneously claimed that Turkey's hot-pursuit operations in northern Iraq were based on the provisions of these agreements. Turkey and Iraq had concluded an agreement on 29 March 1946, however, by which they ended the validity of articles 6 to 13 of the treaty and the subsequent extension thereto.

The Financial Aspect of the Treaty and Its Consequences

As noted earlier, the sum of £500,000, which Turkey at first considered inadequate, was included in the letter annexed to the treaty with Turkey's consent. Research work and official publications indicate that Turkey preferred the lump sum of £500,000 to a 10% share of Iraq's oil revenues. Hikmet Uluğbay's book The Politics of Oil from the Empire to the Republic (İmparatorluktan Cumhuriyete Petropolitik) challenges this assertion, however. His research on the budgetary legislation and the government's financial accounts calls for a review of this question.

Uluğbay's book shows that Turkey did not give up its share of the royalty for £500,000. On the contrary, its preference was for oil income (an annual royalty payment for twenty-five years, as stipulated in 1926 treaty signed by Turkey, Britain, and Iraq). Turkey had received approximately £3.5 million as royalty payment from Iraq between 1931 and 1955 (Table 2-4). The amounts paid by the Iraqi government were far below 10% of the royalty that Iraq collected from the Iraqi Petroleum Company. Therefore Turkey continued to include a line item in its annual budget revenue estimates as "receivables from Iraqi petroleum." During this period Turkey's share of Iraqi oil royalty amounted to £29,520,000, of which £3,473,996 was collected up to 1954 (Table 2-4). As a result, £26,046,004 remained due; Turkey continued to include a reminder entry in its budget estimates. The 1926 treaty foresaw that the royalty payments to Turkey would start after the ratification. The agreement signed between the Government of Iraq and Turkish Petroleum Company (the previous name of Iraqi Petroleum Company) in 1925, however, indicated that the royalty would start after the completion of the export pipeline, which was accomplished at the end of 1934. There was also a letter exchange between Turkey and Iraq in 1932, which accepted that Iraq would start paying royalty from 1931 onward.

After Turkey and Iraq entered into the Baghdad Pact, relations between the two countries were very cordial in the period from 1954 to 1955. Nevertheless the line item was kept as is until Iraqi general Abdulkarim Kassem's coup in 1958. After this event, the line item was not retained in the revenue estimate tables any longer, but was transferred among the main budgetary articles. This was done because budget paragraphs were considered and approved one by one in the Assembly. The intention was to underline the claim and give it greater exposure to the media.

This practice was maintained until the 1980s. As commercial relations with the Middle Eastern countries and particularly with Iraq improved, however, the competent government agencies decided in 1986 to remove this item from the budget.

The question of Mosul had been settled in a manner that did not give Turkey much cause for satisfaction. Although it left a bitter taste, there were no further differences with Britain. In fact, even when the dispute was most intense, Turkish officials were declaring their wish to entertain cordial relations with Britain. Relations from 1926 to 1929 were uneventful. While Turkey was immersed in its internal reforms, Britain too was involved with domestic questions as well as the situation in Europe arising from the Locarno Pact.

Things began to stir in 1929. The British Mediterranean fleet paid a visit to İstanbul in October of that year and its admiral traveled to Ankara, where he was received by Atatürk. This symbolic event was seen by the government as a move in the right direction and created a positive impression in Turkish minds toward the country with which Turkey had been at war some years earlier and which had seized Mosul from its rightful owner.

C. Developments in the 1930s

In the 1930s Europe and the Middle East entered a period of destabilization. In the Middle East, growing Jewish immigration to Palestine started giving rise to concern among the inhabitants and whipped up Arab nationalism.

In Europe, the coming to power of Mussolini in Italy and Hitler in Germany brought these countries closer in a revisionist front. Germany was systematically violating the restrictions imposed at Versailles, while Italy invaded Abyssinia and started challenging Britain's preeminence in the Mediterranean. Germany's efforts to develop its friendship with Turkey and Italy's intensifying activities in the Mediterranean enhanced the importance of Turkey in Britain's eyes at a time when the clouds of war were gathering on the horizon.

The effects of the financial crash of 1929 gradually diminished throughout the 1930s. At the same time, nations were becoming polarized in opposing camps. The pro–status quo camp led by Britain and France found itself confronted by the revisionist states led by Germany and Italy.

Turkey entered this period with its internal reforms in large measure completed and the problems left over from Lausanne mostly resolved. As the revisionist states grew stronger and made their challenge to the status quo increasingly felt, Britain and France sought to intensify their cooperation with Turkey because of its pivotal position. At that time, Britain feared that Turkey might join the revisionist front. Although Turkey was conscious of not having fully achieved the objectives of the National Pact, it did not make any move to join the revisionists. Italy's aggressive revisionist policies in the Mediterranean basin made Turkey wary of the revisionists and helped in steering it into the status-quo camp.

Two other factors helped to improve Turkey's relations with Britain. Turkey's improved relations with Greece in the 1930s had a positive effect on Britain. The second factor was that the USSR was seeking improved relations with Britain and France.

1. Direct Cooperation

The 1930s witnessed increasing direct cooperation between Turkey and Britain. This cooperation had two dimensions: economic cooperation and political rapprochement, leading eventually to alliance.

This cooperation was stimulated by the developments in Europe and the Mediterranean and their effects on Turkey.

Britain was concerned about the increased German influence in Turkey during the 1930s. Germany had systematically created a zone of influence for itself through the economic ties it had established with the east European and Balkan states. In the case of Turkey, its economic ties involved the purchase of commodities like tobacco and chrome ore and the sale of manufactured goods. Germany's share in Turkey's trade was rising steadily. This situation created concern among Turkish leaders as much as it did in Britain. In 1936 the contract for the building of the Karabük Iron and Steelworks was awarded to the British firm Brassert, even though the German firm Krupp had offered better terms. (The supervision of the construction would be carried out by the Germans, however.) In June 1935 Turkey signed a trade agreement with Britain. British firms would be given preference to carry out maintenance work on the Turkish railroads and would also undertake the construction of irrigation systems. At the Montreux Conference, Britain supported Turkey in a number of instances; and when Turkey regained the right to fortify the Straits, it opted for British firms when awarding the contracts for this job.

In May 1938 Britain extended Turkey a loan of £10 million. This was a part of Britain's efforts to dilute German economic influence in Turkey. Determined to keep Turkey in its economic camp, Germany countered the British move by extending a loan of 150 million marks in October of the same year.

In the summer of 1936 King Edward VIII paid a visit to İstanbul. The visit created a positive attitude toward Britain among the public. The next year, on the occasion of the coronation of King George VI, prime minister İsmet İnönü paid an official visit to London. This was a further sign of how close Turkey's relations with Britain were becoming.

Another event related to Mediterranean security helped bring Turkey closer to Britain and France. In 1937 a number of merchant ships were sunk in the Mediterranean Sea, presumably by Italian submarines. A conference was convened at the initiative of Britain and France in Nyon in September 1937 to consider this question. The USSR, Bulgaria, and Romania also participated at the conference, which was boycotted by Germany and Italy. Turkey worked in close consultation with Britain at the conference and agreed to take joint measures to ensure the safety of shipping in the Mediterranean. On the eve of the outbreak of World War II, Turkey and Britain had taken another step closer.

The Mediterranean Pact between Turkey and Britain

The Mediterranean Pact was the first important indicator of direct cooperation between Turkey and Britain in the 1930s. Being wary of Italian intentions, Turkey was seeking an alliance with Britain to ensure its security. But Britain still entertained hopes of drawing Italy away from Germany, so it was reluctant to get involved in alliances with states in southeast Europe.

When Italy started fortifying the Aegean islands and attacked Abyssinia in 1935, the danger that Italy posed in the Mediterranean became manifest. This drew Turkey and Britain closer. Turkey decided to join the states applying sanctions imposed by the LoN on Italy following its attack on Abyssinia. This led the Italian government to threaten Turkey, along with Yugoslavia and Greece. The British government promised to come to the aid of France, Yugoslavia, Turkey, and Greece should any of them be attacked by Italy for applying sanctions. This alliance was based on article 16, paragraph 3, of the Covenant and came into being through an exchange of notes. Turkey joined this alliance on 22 January 1936. Britain invalidated the alliance unilaterally on 27 July 1936, however, after the sanctions on Italy were lifted earlier that month.

Although Britain had for a short time given certain Mediterranean countries, including Turkey, multilateral guarantees, it was not ready to respond to Turkey's desire to conclude a formal bilateral pact. Britain was not sure that it could shoulder the commitments such a pact would impose; nor did it want to alienate Italy, which it still hoped to draw into its camp.

Atatürk's personal inclinations also played a part in Turkey's policy of getting closer to Britain. At that time, Atatürk had established ties of personal friendship with the British ambassador, Sir Percy Loraine, and directly conveyed to the ambassador his desire to enter into an alliance. The appointment of Fethi Okyar, a close friend of Atatürk, as ambassador to London also demonstrated the importance that Turkey attached to its relations with Britain.

3. The Road Leading to the Tripartite Alliance of Turkey, Britain, and France (The Ankara Pact)

Despite the revisionist policies of Germany and Italy in Europe, the Neville Chamberlain government formed in 1937 pursued a policy of appeasement. In their desire to avoid war, the British people supported this policy. The policy of appeasement helped accelerate Germany's plans to overturn the order established at Versailles. In March 1939 Germany annexed Czechoslovakia's Sudetenland. Hitler was gradually carrying out his long-term policy of first breaking the chains of Versailles, to be followed by the creation of a single nation and a single state (Ein Volk, Ein Reich). The third stage would be the creation of living space (Lebensraum) for the Germans. Such policies were proof that Hitler would never be restrained through the policy of appeasement.

As already noted, Turkey was seeking to move closer to Britain and France as well as to the USSR to bolster its security against the German-Italian threat. At that time, the USSR was holding talks with the representatives of Britain and France within the context of the collective security concept that it had formulated. Turkey's actual preference was not to become involved with blocs, but the political circumstances of the time were making it difficult to pursue such a line. In September 1938 France communicated its proposal for an agreement to the Turkish Embassy in Paris.

Following preliminary consultations, France submitted the first draft of an agreement to the Turkish side in November 1938. The draft envisaged the harmonization of the policies of the two countries on subjects of common interest and the development of Turkish-British relations in step with the development of Turkish-French relations. Britain had been kept informed about the course of the Turkish-French consultations. At that time, the British foreign secretary, Edward F.L. Wood, Lord Halifax, was seeking to find out from the newly appointed Turkish ambassador, Tevfik Rüştü Aras, the degree of Turkish support that Britain could count on in the event of war. Britain was still reticent about getting involved with Turkey in an alliance. Britain believed that such a pact would also have to involve Greece and that the emergence of a four-country alliance might elicit a negative reaction from Germany and Italy.

The Italian aggression against Albania in April 1939 demonstrated that the revisionists were prepared to use force even in Europe. Britain now had tangible proof that the policy of not taking a firm stand against Italy's aggression in Abyssinia had failed. Germany and Italy were expanding toward southeast Europe, and this was threatening Britain's imperial routes through the Middle East. Italy's attack on Albania proved that it could not be drawn into the circle of pro-status quo countries. This situation forced Britain and France to pay more attention to security in the Mediterranean and to the guarantees to be given to Greece and Turkey. In fact, on 13 April 1939 Britain and France issued a unilateral declaration that gave guarantees to Greece and Romania in the event of an attack. Britain and France intended to bring Turkey under this guarantee umbrella. They also felt that Bulgaria should be included within a Balkan cooperation system or, failing that, rendered neutral. Ankara was of the opinion that Britain's response to Albania's occupation by Italy was unsatisfactory and that a one-sided guarantee would not properly ensure Turkey's security.

The Italian occupation of a Balkan country gave rise to concern in Turkey and led it to insist that the British-French guarantee be in the form of a treaty of alliance. In a meeting of the cabinet presided over by İsmet İnönü, a formal decision was made to strengthen relations with Britain and France. The cabinet also decided to pursue negotiations with the USSR.

In the course of the contacts that followed, Turkey submitted to the British government a proposal for an agreement that would ensure Britain's cooperation with Turkey in the event of war in the Mediterranean and the Balkans. The Turkish proposal stressed the need to complete and balance the Turkish-British agreement with separate Turkish-Soviet and British-Soviet agreements. Turkey was keeping the USSR informed of these developments at a time when Moscow itself was in contact with Britain and France. The declaration that was issued, however, did not mention the Balkans, because Britain was not willing to assume any responsibility in the region. Nor was it possible to conclude a Turkish-Soviet agreement.

Franz von Papen, who arrived in April 1939 in Ankara as German ambassador, tried hard to stop Turkey from entering into an alliance with Britain and France. In April of that year, the Soviet deputy foreign minister, Vladimir Potemkin, arrived in Ankara to hold talks on a possible Turkish-Soviet agreement, but the talks proved inconclusive. Turkey felt that a Turkish-Soviet Treaty in combination with a Turkish-British Treaty would help forge stronger ties between Britain and the USSR, even if only indirectly. But in actuality the USSR had come to the conclusion that it could not reach an agreement with Britain and France. As a matter of fact, it suspected that the two allies were inciting Germany to confront the USSR, so it sought ways of gaining time and preparing for war by itself reaching an agreement with Germany.

Eventually, on 12 May 1939, a Turkish-British Declaration was signed in Ankara and read out by British prime minister Chamberlain in the House of Commons and prime minister Refik Saydam in the Turkish Grand National Assembly. The key provision was in article 3: "Pending the conclusion of a final agreement, the Government of Turkey and the Government of Great Britain stand ready to engage in active cooperation and to assist one another with all the means at their disposal in the event of an act of aggression in the region of the Mediterranean leading to war." Article 4 made clear that the declaration was not directed against any state. Article 6 provided that "the two Governments are agreed on the necessity of ensuring security in the Balkans, and shall remain in close contact with one another to secure this end."

At this point negotiations were still going on with France over the question of Hatay, so it was necessary to wait for the conclusion of these negotiations before such a joint declaration could be signed with France. Eventually a declaration was signed with France in Paris on 23 June 1939. As war approached, Britain had been urging France to relinquish Hatay to Turkey. The two declarations signed with Britain and France were the stepping stones that led to the alliance that would follow.

After the declaration, negotiations proceeded with Britain to conclude a treaty of alliance and to secure financial aid and arms. While talks were taking place in Ankara between the Chief of the General Staff, Fevzi Çakmak, and British officials, General Kazım Orbay was in London to negotiate arms purchases. The commander-in-chief of French forces in the Middle East, Gen. Maxime Weygand, arrived in Ankara to discuss the issue of arms sales. As the danger of war in Europe grew more imminent, Ankara would be able to argue that financial aid to Turkey would help in freeing its economy from excessive dependence on Germany.

As the talks continued with Britain and France to transform the joint declarations into a treaty of alliance, the USSR was simultaneously holding talks with Britain and France on the one hand and Germany on the other. The USSR reacted positively to the declaration, while the Axis powers felt uncomfortable. Germany claimed that Turkey had joined the camp of those who wanted to unleash a war.

Although Turkey had opted for Britain and France in its foreign policy, it was still careful not to allow its relations with the USSR to take a turn for the worse. While Turkey kept Moscow informed about its talks with Britain and France, the USSR did not reciprocate by keeping Turkey informed about its contacts with Germany. When the USSR signed a nonaggression pact with Germany on 23 August 1939, Turkey was taken by surprise. Yet Turkey continued to seek ways of reconciling its efforts to forge an alliance with Britain and France with its desire to reach some kind of agreement with the USSR.

In the meantime Germany invaded Poland on 1 September 1939, and on 3 September Britain and France declared war on Germany. This signaled the beginning of World War II. Turkey found it particularly alarming that the Soviet Union, acting in accordance with the Nazi-Soviet Pact, invaded Poland on 17 September and partitioned that country with Germany. Ankara feared that Turkey might meet a similar fate.

Upon the invitation of the Soviet government, the minister of foreign affairs, Şükrü Saracoğlu, went to Moscow on 24 September 1939 to have talks with the Soviet leaders. In the contemplated agreement, the Soviets wanted an arrangement for the Straits to be defended jointly by the two countries. They also wanted to reserve their position on Germany. After spending three fruitless weeks in Moscow, Saracoğlu left for home on 17 October.

The Turkish-British-French negotiations were concluded while Saracoğlu was still on his way back from Moscow, and the tripartite treaty of alliance was signed on 19 October 1939.

One day after that, economic and financial agreements were signed with Britain and France. These two countries wanted to strengthen Turkey as the war got underway and therefore provided Ankara with a twenty-year loan of £25 million. After this, Turkey's relations with the two countries, and especially with Britain, developed very positively. Contacts intensified and became very cordial.

As World War II started, Turkey's relations with the Soviet Union, which had been friendly since Turkey's War of Liberation, cooled off. Against this, Turkey had succeeded in its long-lasting efforts to conclude a treaty of alliance with Britain and France. Just as Turkey established its alliance with the British, however, Britain was entering a period of decline; its strength and influence in absolute and relative terms were sharply reduced as a result of the war and the changes occurring in the international arena. After this, Turkey's foreign policy would concentrate on staying out of the war, while its traditional aim of conducting a balanced foreign policy would be abandoned. Turkey's alliance with Britain had only been achieved in wartime and in circumstances that were unfavorable to Turkey.

II. RELATIONS WITH FRANCE

After the National Struggle, the most pressing issues with France were the question of debt and the even more serious question of Hatay. France was important for Turkey as the first Western state to reach an agreement with the Ankara government. At the Lausanne Conference and subsequently—as in the case of the Mosul question—France sided with Britain, however, and rendered Turkey's task more difficult. Nevertheless, Turkey strove to give its balanced foreign policy a Western tilt; in this context France had an important place in Turkey's foreign relations. As the German threat increased in Europe, France also made an effort to keep Turkey on friendly terms.

A. Developments after Lausanne

At Lausanne, the French delegation acted in concert with its Western partners, much to the chagrin of Turkish officials. France was particularly difficult on the issues of the abolition of the capitulations and the Ottoman debt. As a matter of fact, when M. Kemal and Franklin-Bouillon held their talks, most of the time was spent on the capitulations. The Turkish delegation at Lausanne argued that the intransigent French stance was in violation of the 1921 agreement, but to no avail. France took this tough position because of the size of French investments and commercial interests in Turkey. The question of debts and their repayment would continue to vex the two countries well into the 1930s.

The first important question that arose in relations with France after Lausanne was the demarcation of Turkey's frontier with Syria, which at the time was under French mandate. Under the terms of article 8 of the agreement of 20 October 1921, a commission consisting of the representatives of the two sides was to meet within a month of the signing of the agreement to demarcate the frontier. It took until September 1925 for the commission to undertake this task. When the commission's work proved fruitless, the French high commissioner in Syria and Lebanon, Henri de Jouvenel, came to Ankara, where he initialed a convention with the minister of foreign affairs, Tevfik Rüştü, on 18 February 1926. France delayed signing this convention, however, out of consideration for its relations with Britain, which at that time was involved in the issue of Mosul. But when the Mosul question was finally settled, the convention was signed in Ankara on 30 May 1926, eliminating another obstacle on the way to establishing smooth relations between the two countries.

The Bozkurt-Lotus case came up at this time, but relations between the two states were unaffected, because the case was referred to international adjudication (Box 2-7).

A question of lesser importance arose in connection with the French missionary schools in Turkey. When the question was taken up at Lausanne, İsmet Paşa indicated that he could make no commitments regarding the establishment of new schools and refused to accept exemption from customs duties in favor of these institutions (see Box 1-32 in Section 1). At Lausanne, it was provided that foreign scientific, religious, and charitable institutions would refrain from propaganda, teach the Turkish language and history, and operate under Turkish laws. When the Turkish government decided that courses in all foreign schools would be in Turkish and that the curricula would be determined in line with Turkish national viewpoints, the French government made an attempt to intervene on behalf of the institutions. The Turkish government took a firm stand in refusing to admit French interference in the matter, however, and the French government decided not to insist.

Box 2-7. The Bozkurt-Lotus Case

On 2 August 1926 the French merchant ship Lotus was involved in a collision with the Turkish freighter Bozkurt about six miles off the coast of the island of Lesbos. The Bozkurt sank as a result of this collision, with a loss of eight lives. The masters of the two ships were arrested upon their arrival in Istanbul, on the grounds of having negligently caused the deaths of the victims of the collision. In September 1926 the court sentenced the Turkish captain to four months and the French captain to eighty days of Imprisonment for negligence.

France claimed that the Turkish court had no jurisdiction in this case and demanded the release of the Frenchman. Turkey contested this view. Therefore the two states decided to refer the question to the Permanent Court of International Justice. In the compromise document the two sides agreed to ask the court to rule on whether Turkey had acted contrary to international law by trying the French national in violation of article 15 of the Convention Respecting Conditions of Residence and Business and Jurisdiction signed at Lausanne.

France contended that the law applicable in this case could not be the Turkish Penal Code. Under international law and the principle of the freedom of the high seas, a crime committed on board a merchant vessel would have to come before the courts of the state where the vessel was registered.

Turkey claimed that the place of the crime was the Boz-kurt, a Turkish-flag vessel. The charges against the French captain were not related to transport but had to do with a public case; consequently, the Turkish court had jurisdiction.

The Permanent Court declared on 7 September 1927 that Turkey had not acted contrary to international law. Its justification rested on the fact that the Turkish court was not trying the French captain for violating the rules of navigation but for causing death by negligence. The verdict of the Permanent Court was split, six votes for and six against, with the presiding judge breaking the tie by deciding in favor of Turkey.

B. The Question of the Ottoman Debt

Although the question of the Ottoman debt concerned a good number of countries, it became a contentious issue primarily with France. Most of the Ottoman bonds had been sold in France, making that country Turkey's main creditor. It will be recalled that under article 46 of the Lausanne Treaty the principle of distributing the Ottoman Empire's debts among the successor states had been accepted. Article 47 provided that the Council of the Ottoman Public Debt would determine the share of each successor state, while article 49 made provisions for a commission to meet in Paris to determine the conditions of repayment.

There were differing views within the Turkish delegation at Lausanne over this issue. İsmet Paşa favored repayment with banknotes, while Cavit Bey, the economic advisor of the Turkish delegation, favored gold. After Lausanne, the negotiations went on until 13 June 1928, when an agreement was signed by the Turkish ambassador in Paris, Fethi Okyar, and the representative of the Ottoman Public Debt. Under the terms of this agreement, Turkey agreed to repay 62% of the debts incurred prior to 1912 and 73% of the debts incurred subsequently. This amounted to a total of 107,528,461 gold liras (82,456,377 was principal, with the remainder being accrued interest). Subsequently it was discovered that an error had been made in the calculations, and the amount of the repayment was reduced. Turkey agreed to repay 2,000,000 gold liras annually up to 1936, 2,800,000 from 1936 to 1942, 2,780,000 from 1942 to 1947, 3,180,000 from 1947 to 1952, and 3,400,000 from 1952 on.

Turkey paid its first installment on time; but with the global economic crisis of 1929, there were difficulties with the annuity, which amounted to 14% of the state budget. All states were suffering from the effects of the crisis. In these circumstances Turkey deposited 6,000,000 TL in banknotes in the Ottoman Bank on 25 November 1930 and suspended repayments. Talks were held between the officials of the two countries both in Ankara and in Paris. Turkey wanted to carry out the repayments in a manner that would not affect its general economic situation.

Eventually, after difficult negotiations lasting over a year, the repayment schedule was revised in Turkey's favor on 22 April 1933 (Tekeli and İlkin, pp. 43–45). The repayment of the Ottoman debt came to an end on 25 May 1954 with the payment of the last installment.

C. The Question of Sancak (Hatay)

Before we examine the question of Sancak (Hatay), it will be useful to clarify the origin of the region's name. In Ottoman times the region was known as the Sancak (subdivision of a vilayet) of Iskenderun. After the administrative reform of 1856, it became a mutasarrıflık (administrative division) but continued to be called the Sancak of Iskenderun or often just Sancak in all Turkish and international documents. The region, which includes the cities of İskenderun and Antakya and their surrounding districts, was renamed Hatay by Atatürk in 1936. When the question of the region became topical, the name "Hatay" was selected to underline the Turkish character of the place. This was the period when the Sun-Language Theory (according to which all languages stemmed from Turkish) was very much in vogue, and the name was designed to prove the correctness of the theory. The Turkish names Eti, Ata, Hata, and Hatay were all derived from the same root: the ancient state of Hatay in Central Asia. The Turkish origin of the Anatolian civilization of the Hittites was being confirmed in this way, while the inhabitants of Iskenderun and Antakya were dubbed Turkish.

In this section (which is based on sources from OTDP, and Soysal, pp. 531–81) we refer to the region as Sancak up to the time when it was officially designated as Hatay.

1. Developments in Sancak after Lausanne

At the time when the Mudros Armistice was signed, British forces were to the south of Iskenderun, but Sancak was still in Ottoman hands. On 9 November, ten days after the armistice, British forces occupied Sancak, based on article 7 of the armistice agreement. Subsequently they transferred Sancak to France under the terms of the wartime secret agreements. France had already occupied Urfa, Antep, Adana, and Mersin. Sancak was within the frontiers traced in the National Pact. When the opportunity came up to sign a separate peace agreement with France, however, the Syrian border was drawn by the Turkish-French Agreement of 20 October 1921, leaving Sancak on the Syrian side but with special arrangements for its administration. In this way the Syrian frontier was traced before Lausanne.

At Lausanne, the Syrian frontier was hardly discussed and created no problems. Because the Ankara Agreement had not been ratified by the French parliament, Ankara wanted this matter to be confirmed at Lausanne. It was opposed to having only article 8 of the 1921 agreement (the article that traced the frontier with Syria) included in Lausanne, because it felt this would weaken the other articles of the agreement, including those relating to the special administration for Sancak.

France argued that the 1921 agreement was local in character and would acquire a different character if incorporated in toto in the Lausanne Treaty. France declared that it had scrupulously implemented all the provisions of the 1921 agreement and would continue to do so in the future. It added that legally the agreement had been signed by France on behalf of its mandate Syria and therefore did not require ratification by the French parliament. Finally, France said that it was prepared to give guarantees that it would continue to implement the agreement in full.

Eventually agreement was reached on this subject. Article 3 in the Peace Treaty of Lausanne declared that the Syrian frontier would be "the frontier described in Article 8 of the Franco-Turkish Agreement of 20 October, 1921." On 24 July 1923, the day the Lausanne Treaty was signed, the government of France submitted a letter confirming that the Peace Treaty of Lausanne did not affect the provisions of the 1921 agreement in any way. It also issued a declaration to the effect that the necessary steps had been taken to ensure that the 1921 agreement would remain in effect in its entirety. Thus the Turkish-Syrian boundary as traced in 1921 and the arrangements made for Sancak at the time were reconfirmed at Lausanne.

The stand taken by the Turks living in Sancak influenced Ankara's policies. The Turks of Sancak were in contact with Ankara and conveyed their wish to unite with their motherland. To this end, starting in 1921 and, when necessary, in alliance with Arab nationalists, they conducted guerrilla warfare against French forces.

On 24 July 1922 the LoN granted France mandate powers over Syria. The treaty to this effect came into force on 29 September 1923, soon after the Lausanne treaty was signed. France started reinforcing its administration in Syria, including Sancak. It divided Syria and Lebanon into four states: Aleppo, Damascus, Lebanon, and Alevi Latakia. In addition, there was the autonomous Sancak of Iskenderun, attached to Aleppo. While pursuing this policy of divide and rule in Syria, France was establishing a highly centralized system dependent on its administration in the new states. This caused much resentment among the inhabitants, and in 1925 Arab nationalists started an uprising that spread rapidly to all the regions of the country. France suppressed the uprising by using Armenian units. As a result of these events, France understood the need to take administrative measures to lessen discontent and merged the states of Aleppo and Damascus on 1 January 1925. One day prior to this, France had issued a decree by which Sancak was attached to the Syrian state (that is, to Damascus), although the special regime of the region would be preserved.

These measures, designed to placate Arab nationalists, gave rise to disturbances in Sancak. The Arabs of Sancak wanted full union with Syria. The Turks, Alevis, and Armenians, who did not speak Arabic, reacted negatively to the new arrangements. It looked like the resistance would be led by the Turks, who made up the largest element. The pro-independence movement of the Sancak Turks found no echo in Ankara, however, which at the time was preoccupied with the Sheikh Said revolt and the Mosul question.

The Turkish-French Convention of 30 May 1926

The full title of this convention signed on 30 May 1926 is the Convention on Friendship and Good Neighborly Relations between the Republic of Turkey and the Republic of France Acting as the Authority over Syria and Lebanon Based on International Compacts. The convention was initialed on 18 February, but the signing was postponed because of the Sheikh Said uprising and the tension with Britain over Mosul. Once the Mosul question was ripe for settlement, the convention was signed, to be followed six days later by the Turco-British agreement on Mosul

The convention consisted of fifteen articles and had five protocols and one letter annexed to it. Article I read as follows: "The Republic of Turkey and the countries that were detached from the Ottoman Empire and that are now under the Mandate of the Republic of France undertake to entertain friendly and good neighborly relations on a permanent basis. They will not attempt to revise the frontiers fixed under the present Convention. They will refrain from encouraging or assisting any act of aggression directed at one of the parties." Article 7 was significant: "The High Contracting parties undertake...to take the necessary measures to prevent and suppress actions emanating from their territory directed at the other." This article referred to the actions of the Kurds who had fled from the Sheikh Said camp into Syria and were continuing their fight from there.

The convention was concluded for a term of five years with automatic one-year extensions until denounced by one of the parties. The provisions relating to the frontier would be amended in the course of the settlement of the Hatay question.

The first protocol annexed to the convention consisted of a detailed demarcation of the frontier. Protocol No. 2 related to extradition. Protocol No. 3 contained the details with regard to the provisions of article 7. The protocol, entitled "Measures at the Frontier," consisted of nineteen articles. Article 1 provided that "the parties shall take all the measures necessary to prevent armed individuals operating in the frontier region with the intention of engaging in brigandage or pillaging from carrying out their activities or crossing the frontier." Article 4 made it mandatory for the frontier authorities "to arrest individuals who after committing a felony or a misdemeanor manage to cross the frontier and to deliver them to the authorities of the country of which they are nationals together with their loot and their weapons." Article 6 described the region where the convention would apply as "the entire frontier separating Turkey from Syria and the adjacent region to a depth of 50 kilometers on either side of the line." Article 9 dealt with tribes who traditionally grazed their herds across the frontier. These tribes had to notify the competent authorities fifteen days in advance of their intention to cross the frontier, indicating the exact location and the number of herders involved. This information would be relayed to the authorities on the other side of the frontier. At the time of the Sheikh Said uprising, Ankara feared for the stability of the new state and took all the necessary measures to deal with the emergency.

Another annexed protocol stated: "This Convention supplements the Ankara Agreement of 20 October 1921 but in no way amends any of the terms of that Agreement." This provision ensured that the special administrative regime for Sancak as foreseen in that agreement would continue to apply.

As relations with France improved following the signing of the 1926 convention, the condition of the Turkish inhabitants of Sancak improved too. During this period these Turks started closely following the new developments in Ankara and implementing all the reforms being carried out in Turkey. Early on, they established the Popular Party and secured greater discipline in their organization. These developments received French support. France wanted to use the Sancak for its own purposes in its struggle with those in Damascus who opposed the French administration. Things took an unexpected turn, however, when Britain granted independence to Iraq in 1930. This excited the Syrian Arabs, which in turn stoked nationalist fires among the Turks of Sancak. Separate provisions were introduced in connection with the special regime of Sancak in the Syrian Constitution of 14 May 1930. In this way France gave satisfaction to the Sancak Turks, while the Syrian Arabs were reminded of the special status of Sancak and thereby given a warning.

As it became clear that the French presence in Syria would be coming to an end soon, the conflicting interests of Syria, Turkey, and France in Sancak began to affect their relations with one another. In 1934 the governor of Gaziantep paid a visit to Sancak. On that occasion the warm reception of the governor by the Sancak Turks and their demonstrations, waving Turkish flags, gave an indication of what was coming. In 1936 the matter came up formally among the three states.

The Franco-Syrian Preliminary Agreement of 1936 and Its Effect on Sancak

The developments taking place in the international environment in 1936 were very disturbing. Italy had invaded Abyssinia a year earlier and was now adopting an aggressive posture in the Mediterranean. Germany under Hitler was busy discarding the fetters imposed on it at Versailles. It had remilitarized the Rhineland. In this perilous environment France wanted to become focused on Europe and announced that it would end the mandate regime in Syria. France calculated that it would be better for its security to conclude an alliance with a friendly Syria, to which it would grant independence. The alternative was to rule directly over a nation that harbored hostile sentiments toward its rulers, which was far from being a satisfactory solution. Furthermore, the expenses incurred in Syria were a drain on the weak French economy. In 1936 the Popular Front came to power; the new Socialist prime minister, Léon Blum, in line with his ideology, was in favor of granting independence to French colonies and mandated territories, despite the opposition of the conservatives and the military. Also, French hopes of finding oil in Syria had been dashed, so Syria held little attraction for France in 1936.

The Preliminary Agreement between France and Syria was signed on 9 September 1936. It was designed to end the mandate regime in Syria and to come into force three years after ratification by the French and Syrian parliaments, when Syria would become a member of the LoN. Although there was no reference to Sancak in the agreement, article 3 contained the following provision: "When the Mandate regime comes to an end, the High Contracting Parties will take all the necessary measures to transfer to the Syrian government all the rights and obligations emanating from treaties, conventions, and other international commitments concluded by France on Syria's behalf or relating to Syria." This clause appeared to jeopardize the status of the Sancak Turks. The agreement caused a furor in Turkey.

When Syria declined to discuss the matter with Turkey, the minister of foreign affairs, Tevfik Rüştü Aras, made a statement at the Council of the League in which he declared that France had a duty to conclude an agreement with the people of Sancak similar to the one that it had made with Syria. He called for "the people of Sancak to be given the same rights as the Syrians had been given to run their own affairs."

The French reply was that such an agreement would result in the partition of Syria, which was excluded under the convention establishing the mandate.

The Sandler Report

When the parties concluded that they could not reach an agreement, they decided to refer the matter to the LoN. On 14 December the Council of the League appointed Rickard Sandler, a Swedish national, as rapporteur and decided to dispatch a team of three observers to Sancak.

At this juncture the international situation was developing in a direction that enhanced the importance of Turkey. As a result of the pressure of British foreign secretary Anthony Eden, who felt deeply troubled by Germany's expansionist policies designed to wreck the order imposed at Versailles, France relented and agreed to abide by whatever decision the Council of the League would make, including treating Sancak as a separate entity. In any case, by now it was clear that the 9 September 1936 agreement would not be ratified by the French parliament, because the deteriorating situation in Europe had added to the strategic importance of overseas possessions. Furthermore, French conservative circles feared that granting independence to Syria might constitute a precedent for French colonies, especially for those in North Africa (Syria obtained its independence only in 1946).

Sandler submitted his report to the Council of the League, where it was unanimously adopted on 27 January 1937. The report made the following recommendations.

- I. A committee of experts would draft a status and a Constitution for Sancak, which would be regarded as a "distinct entity" with internal autonomy but dependent on Syria for its foreign relations. Syria would not be allowed to restrict Sancak's independence without the permission of the Council of the LoN.
- 2. Sancak would be in a customs and monetary union with Syria, and common duestions would be dealt with by special officials who would be charged with assuring coordination.
- 3. The official language of Sancak would be Turkish, and the question of a second official language would be decided by the Council of the LoN.
- 4. A French national would be appointed as a delegate to oversee, on behalf of the council, the implementation of the status and Constitution of Sancak.
- Sancak would have no armed force other than a sufficient number of police officers and gendarmes.
- 6. Turkey and France would respect the recommendations of the council and would sign a treaty that would ensure the territorial integrity of Sancak.
- 7. A treaty would be signed by Turkey, Syria, and France to ensure the inviolability of the Turkish-Syrian frontier and prevent any provocation.
- 8. Provisions would be made in the Status of Sancak to enable Turkey to use the port of İskenderun.
- 9. The Status and Constitution of Sancak would come into effect by a decision of the council. The council's decisions with respect to Sancak would be taken by a two-thirds majority.

Demonstrations broke out in Syria as soon as the council adopted the Sandler Report. France was accused of betraying Syria. In statements made in Damascus, Jamil Mardan, prime minister of Syria, stressed that Sancak was an integral part of Syria.

Turkey wanted full and unconditional independence for Sancak. France held that independence would violate the mandate regime established by the LoN and that Sancak could only enjoy the regime of autonomy foreseen in the Ankara agreement of 1921. This Turkish-French agreement was an interim formula pending Syrian independence. It was approved by the Council of the League because it was not contrary to the Mandate regime (Soysal, p. 534).

4. The Documents of 29 May 1937

In accordance with the Sandler Report, a five-man committee of experts prepared the Status and Constitution of Sancak. These documents were submitted to the council and unanimously approved on 29 May 1937, whereupon Sancak legally became a "distinct entity." On the same day, two treaties were signed by Turkey and France. The documents of 29 May are examined here under three headings: the international compacts establishing the Sancak of Iskenderun as a "distinct entity"; the treaty guaranteeing the territorial integrity of Sancak; and the agreement guaranteeing the Turkish-Syrian frontier.

a. The International Compacts Establishing the Sancak of İskenderun as a "Distinct Entity"

Sancak became a "distinct entity" through three documents adopted by the LoN: the frontiers of the Sancak of Iskenderun; the Status of Sancak; and the Constitution of Sancak.

The Frontiers of the Sancak of İskenderun

The line traced in this document became the Turkish-Syrian frontier, apart from minor changes, after Hatay joined Turkey.

The Status of Sancak

Article 1 of this document declared: "In its internal affairs, Sancak is a fully independent distinct entity... Sancak's external relations are the responsibility of the Syrian State."

Syria's responsibilities were diluted with many exception clauses. Article 15 provided: "No international agreement of the Syrian State that in any way affects its independence and sovereignty can apply to Sancak without the prior and official consent of the Council of the League of Nations." Article 16 declared: "When the Sancak Government found it necessary...it had a right to request any international agreement to be subjected to a special examination before it was signed."

Although article 1 provided that "Sancak and Syria would be within a single customs and monetary system," a number of exceptions were also introduced. Article 34: "Sancak and Syria shall have separate customs administrations." Article 36: "An agreement between Sancak and Syria shall determine Sancak's share of customs revenues... In no case shall Sancak's share be less than onetenth of total customs revenues." Article 39: "Sancak shall join an agreement that Syria shall conclude with a Central Bank. This agreement shall provide Sancak similar benefits to those enjoyed by Syria and shall protect its special rights and interests... Upon the request of one of the Governments, one part of the banknotes may bear the marks of Syria and the other part that of the Sancak." Article 40: "The share of Sancak in all the benefits and profits derived from the right to issue currency cannot be less than onetenth of the total benefits and profits." Article 41: "Syria and Sancak shall be allowed to mint identical coins." Article 54: "Sancak has the right to issue valuable postal papers for domestic use." All of these articles were of a nature to transform Sancak, already independent in its domestic affairs, into a state within a state.

In addition, the Turkish Republic itself had a considerable presence in Sancak. Article 43: "Turkey shall have the right to make full use of the port of İskenderun for its transport requirements. For this purpose, Syria shall lease Turkey the necessary port facilities. The rent agreement shall be for a period of 50 years and the annual rent shall be 1 gold Syrian pound." Article 44: "This area to be called Turkish Free Zone shall be a part of the Sancak territory and shall be under its police and juridical jurisdiction. However, since this area will be a Turkish zone, it will be under the management of the customs authorities of the Republic of Turkey." Article 45: "All of the employees and agents of the Turkish Free Zone shall be appointed by Turkey." Article 47: "[All economic activities] in the free zone shall be undertaken by the Turkish Government. Taxes and charges for the use of buildings and installations shall be imposed by the Turkish Government and this Government shall be the recipient of revenues derived from these taxes and charges."

Article 22 of the Status of Sancak demilitarized Sancak. Articles 25 to 31 gave racial, linguistic, or religious minorities rights that were almost identical to the minority rights that Turkey had undertaken to respect under the provisions of articles 38 to 43 of the Peace Treaty of Lausanne. Whereas article 44 of Lausanne placed the rights of non-Muslim minorities under the guarantee of the LoN, article 33 of the Status provided the same guarantee to racial, linguistic, or religious minorities.

The Constitution of Sancak

Article 2 of the Constitution stipulated that this document would be interpreted, implemented, and amended without prejudice to the provisions of the Status. Article 5 of the Constitution provided that "[1]egislative power shall be exercised on behalf of the people of Sancak by an Assembly consisting of 40 members, elected for a term of 4 years."

The people would vote for the electors who would, in turn, elect the deputies of the Assembly. Voters would indicate their community when registering with the following choices: Turkish, Alevi, Arab, Armenian, Greek Orthodox, Kurdish, and Other Communities (article 9). According to article 10, "the number of voters registered for each community would determine how many deputies and how many electors that community would be allocated." The electors would be responsible for electing the deputies. In other words, the registration of voters was a kind of election census that would determine everything.

Article 10 also provided that "whatever the results of the electoral process, the minimum number of deputies each community will have in the assembly is 8 for the Turks, 6 for the Alevis, 2 for the Arabs, 2 for the Armenians, and 1 for the Greek Orthodox." These figures give an indication of how France perceived the ethnic makeup of the population of Sancak.

Article 19 declared that "[e]xecutive power shall be exercised, on behalf of the inhabitants of Sancak, by the President of Sancak and the Executive Council." "The President will be elected by the Assembly for a term of 5 years. During his term, the President will receive an emolument, which cannot be changed in his favor, plus compensation." Although elected by the Assembly, the president enjoyed extensive powers. He could refrain from promulgating laws and send them back to the Assembly within one month (article 22), dissolve the Assembly after consulting the Executive Council (the government) (article 23), and designate the president of the Executive Council (article 24).

Article 26 provided that "no power can rectify or amend decisions of the judicial power." Article 27, however, stated that "the Superior Court and other courts are not empowered to consider the constitutionality of laws."

The Constitution had a section on fundamental rights of the individual that was very advanced for its time.

the Treaty Guaranteeing the Territorial Integrity of Sancak

Under this treaty signed by Turkey and France, the two countries guaranteed the territorial integrity of Sancak (article 1) and undertook to inform the Council of the LoN without delay, severally or jointly, of any threat to the integrity of Sancak's territory (article 2). "If a threat emerges against Sancak or in the event of any attack requiring urgent preventive action, the two Parties undertake to eliminate the threat with all the means at their disposal" (article 3).

,c. The Agreement Guaranteeing the Turkish-Syrian Frontier

This is another document that was signed by Turkey and France on this occasion.

According to article 1, the two countries recognized the definitive character of the Turkish-Syrian frontier and guaranteed its inviolability. Article 2 provided that "the two Parties [would] take all necessary measures to forestall the preparation or the carrying out of any action on either the Turkish or Syrian side of the frontier aimed at the political administration or security of the other state." This article was formulated with the threat of Kurdish insurgencies in mind.

On 3 June the Syrian Parliament adopted a resolution by which it condemned these documents purporting to remove a part of Syrian territory from Syrian sovereignty. The resolution also declared that the Syrian nation would reject any solution that would bring harm to its unity and its rebirth and that it was determined to defend itself with all its strength derived from its faith and its righteousness. But Syria's protests had no effect on Ankara, Paris, or the LoN at Geneva.

5. The Creation of the State of Hatay and the Decision to Join Turkey

When Sancak was accepted as a distinct entity, its population was 219,000, according to French statistics. Of this population, the Turks accounted for 39.7%, the Alevis for 28%, the Armenians for 11%, the Sunni Arabs for 10%, and the Greek Orthodox for 9%, with the remaining approximately 3% consisting of Kurds, Circassians, Jews, Ismailis, and Albanians.

The election was scheduled for 15 April 1938. To arrange and supervise the election, the LoN sent an election committee to Sancak. The committee worked throughout the summer of 1937 in cooperation with French officials. Very soon the work of the committee started drawing criticism from the Sancak Turks and from Turkey itself. There were disturbances that heightened the tension. The main difficulty had to do with the registration of voters. As the registers were based on both ethnic origin and religion, the election committee was able to make decisions that went against the interests of the Turks. The problems originated mostly from the Alevis, some of whom spoke Turkish while others spoke Arabic as their mother language and thus could easily be persuaded to register as Turks, Arabs, or Alevis.

Since the time this question emerged, Atatürk had declared that Hatay was a matter of personal concern for him. On 29 October 1937 he told the French ambassador that he was not interested in territorial expansion and was not the one who would endanger peace. But he would insist on Turkey's right that derived from treaties; he was determined to obtain it. He had given his word to the nation from the pulpit of the parliament. If he should fail to deliver, he could not face the nation that had put its trust in his word; nor could he stay at his post. In this way Atatürk conveyed to the ambassador his absolute determination on the issue. In his speech inaugurating the new session of parliament on 1 November 1937, Atatürk declared that "the development of Turkish-French relations in the direction that we desire will depend largely on the manner in which the Hatay issue unfolds." In this way he emphasized that the course of Turkish-French relations would be determined by the Sancak question.

When the election committee prepared the regulations for the election and submitted the document to the Council of the LoN without first consulting Ankara, Turkey's reaction was swift. On 29 December 1937 it denounced the Turkish-French Treaty of Friendship of 1930. Disregarding his failing health, Atatürk went to Mersin and Adana on 29 May 1938 to inspect army units in the south. A force of 30,000 men was redeployed to the southern frontier.

Turkey was fully determined on the Sancak issue. At the same time, the revisionist countries' aggressive intentions made it essential to woo Turkey into an alliance in the Mediterranean. This situation and Britain's prodding forced France to step back. The Council of the LoN made the necessary revisions in the regulations governing the election to give satisfaction to Turkey. The election committee resumed its work, but Turkey was still not satisfied. It entered into bilateral talks with France, and the two countries applied jointly to the council with an appeal to halt the work of the election committee. The election committee left Sancak on 29 June. The election was no longer under international supervision.

The Military Treaty

Another result of the Turkish-French talks was the conclusion of a military treaty. Atatürk was in his sick bed when, at his insistence, the French MFA sent instructions on 3 July 1938, which happened to be a Sunday, for signing the military treaty in Antakya. This treaty provided for the measures to be taken in the event of an attack on Sancak. There would be an equal number of Turkish and French troops in Sancak, and if necessary their strength could be increased by agreement between the parties. In the event of an attack from Syria or by sea (this denoted the fear of an Italian attack) to Sancak, the level of troops to deal with such an attack and their operational plans were also foreseen in the treaty. A protocol annexed to the treaty provided that a Turkish military contingent consisting of 2,500 men under the command of a colonel would enter Sancak on a date to be agreed jointly, follow a predetermined route, and encamp in specified locations. The protocol also provided that the French garrison in Sancak would be reinforced to reach a level of up to 2,500 men.

Although the treaty stipulated that the date for the introduction of the Turkish contingent would be agreed upon jointly, at Turkey's request the Turkish army contingent entered Sancak the next day (4 July 1938) under the command of Col. Şükrü Kanatlı. A new treaty of friendship between Turkey and France was signed in Ankara. Because of the speed with which events were unfolding, the treaty was not ratified by either parliament and never went into effect. The treaty provided that in the event of an attack on one of the parties, the other would maintain its neutrality. On the occasion of the signing of the treaty, a joint communiqué was issued that contained a phrase of significance in the context of the Sancak issue: "In putting into effect and implementing the Status and Constitution of the Sancak of Iskenderun, the Parties recognize the preponderance of the Turkish element in Sancak... However, they continue to remain bound by the Ankara Agreement of 20 October 1921, which declares that the Sancak issue is not a territorial question for Turkey." By reconfirming the validity of the Ankara Agreement, France was seeking to prevent Turkey, whose troops had been introduced into Sancak, from carrying out an annexation.

After Turkish-French relations were restored to normalcy, the election process got underway on 22 July. With the conclusion of the registration of voters on 1 August, it was revealed that there were 35,847 Turks, 11,319 Alevis, 5,504 Armenians, 1,845 Arabs, and 2,098 Greek Orthodox on the register. In accordance with these figures, there would be 358 Turkish, 113 Alevi, 55 Armenian, 18 Arab, and 20 Greek Orthodox electors.

The election took place on 24 August. Of the forty seats in the Assembly, twenty-two would be held by Turkish deputies, with the Alevis getting nine seats, the Armenians five, and the Arabs and the Greek Orthodox two seats each. The government appointed Cevat Açıkalın as envoy extraordinary to Sancak.

When the new Assembly was convened on 2 September, all the deputies took the oath in Turkish. Abdülgani Türkmen was elected as Speaker of the Assembly, Tayfur Sökmen as head of state, and Abdurrahman Melek as prime minister. Until then the state had been known internationally as Sancak. This was changed to Hatay. A flag was selected that bore a striking resemblance to the Turkish flag.

Members of the Turkish Nationalist Movement of Hatay had taken up the highest positions in the land, which demonstrated clearly that the State of Hatay would not have a long life. It was a question of waiting for the appropriate moment to join Turkey. Many Turkish laws were enacted as Hatay's laws. As Hatay started moving into Turkey's orbit, the Arab and Armenian elements of Hatay, led by Arab nationalists, began moving to Syria.

In 1939 Europe was rapidly drifting toward war. On 15 March Germany occupied Czechoslovakia and denounced its nonaggression pact with Poland. It entered into the Pact of Steel with Italy on 22 May. These developments were alarming the pro-status quo powers and in particular Britain. In its search for allies to shore up security in the Mediterranean, Britain issued a Joint Declaration with Turkey on 12 May 1939. This was the first step in the direction of establishing an alliance. Turkey wanted a similar declaration with France, however; in fact it wanted a tripartite alliance, on condition that Hatay would be absorbed into Turkey. France acceded to this request at Britain's insistence and also under pressure from its own military. French diplomats and politicians were against any retreat from overseas territories, which they regarded as symbols of French power. According to them, a step in this direction would set a precedent and create problems in the colonies, and especially in Algeria. But the French General Staff was aware of the seriousness of the situation in Europe and was also conscious of the importance of an alliance with Turkey, so it pressed the government to relent in Hatay.

The Union with Turkey

On 23 June 1939, when the second step toward the Tripartite Alliance was taken with the release of the Turkish-French Joint Declaration, the Turkish minister of foreign affairs, Şükrü Saracoğlu, and the French ambassador in Ankara, René Massigli, signed the Agreement Regarding the Final Settlement of Territorial Questions between Turkey and Syria.

Article 1 of the agreement included Hatay in Turkey, with this provision: "France agrees to the following modification being made in the previous frontier demarcations of 1926, 1929, and 1930." These territories "shall be evacuated by 23 July 1939, and, on that day, the responsibilities of the French authorities will come to an end." In article 7 "Turkey undertakes to declare the frontier modified by the present agreement as the definitive frontier." The article went on to declare that Turkey "condemns any action against Syria's territorial integrity and undertakes to prevent and, if necessary, punish any action of this kind." Clearly France was concerned about irredentism in Europe and feared that Turkey might go even further with its claims.

Article 9 contained the usual provisions against Kurdish insurgents: "Turkey shall take all necessary measures on its territory and France on Syrian territory to prevent...activities directed against the security and the regimes of the neighboring states."

Even before this treaty came into effect, the Hatay Assembly unanimously adopted a decision on 29 June to unite with Turkey. By a law dated 7 July, Turkey established the province of Hatay and completed the legal formalities for the union. The French army evacuated the territory. Once the parliamentary procedures were completed, the treaty between Turkey and France was published in the LoN's official register of treaties.

Following the union of Hatay with Turkey, the Speaker of the Syrian Assembly sent protest telegrams to the French government and the Council of the League. He declared that Hatay was an inseparable part of Syria's territory, that the decisions made and the act of union were unacceptable, and that the treaty violated the decisions taken in Ankara in 1921, in Lausanne in 1923, and again in Ankara in 1926 as well as the frontier protocol of 1930 and the decision of 1937. On the day Syria declared its independence, it sent a circular note to all foreign embassies stating that it respected all international commitments entered into by France on its behalf. Syria never accepted the union of Hatay with Turkey, however.

Rome also objected to Hatay's union with Turkey. As a participant in the San Remo talks of 1920, Italy submitted a note to France on 10 July, complaining that it had not been consulted and its consent had not been obtained prior to the conclusion of the treaty and declaring the treaty to be in violation of the mandate and the wishes of the inhabitants of the territory.

Appraisal of the Hatay Issue

The union of Hatay with Turkey raises certain questions about Turkish foreign policy in the interwar years. The general impression is that, although the international situation was extremely favorable, Ankara followed a prostatus quo policy and refrained from seeking territorial expansion through the use of force. Despite this generally held view, the Hatay episode can also lead to the conclusion that, like other revisionist states, Turkey was capable of massing troops on the border and acquiring territory by threatening to use force. It should not be forgotten, however, that at all stages Turkey maintained diplomatic contacts, respected the decisions of the LoN, sought revision of decisions that it found unacceptable through diplomatic demarches, refrained from the direct use of force, and always "played by the rules."

Despite these facts, the Hatay event remained etched in people's minds. When the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus was declared independent in 1983, Turkey's opponents cited this example to prove Turkey's expansionist proclivity. The same example was used by those who wanted Turkey to grab Mosul in the 1980s and 1990s. It was also the cause of Syria's permanent hostility to Turkey.

In the period from 1923 to 1939 Mosul and Hatay were two basic issues of Turkish foreign policy in the Middle East, and there are interesting similarities between them. Both regions were included in the National Pact but had to be conceded at Lausanne. When the issues came to the negotiating table, they were referred to the LoN. In both cases there was no resort to force, though troops were deployed to the border. Mosul was the story of a failure, while Hatay was a success.

There are two important reasons for this. First, it was known that Mosul contained oil, while it eventually became clear that Hatay had no such riches. Second, the international and Turkish domestic circumstances of the 1920s differed fundamentally from the circumstances of the 1930s. In the 1920s Britain had emerged all powerful from the war, while Turkey was weak, having just emerged from long wars, with a newly created state trying to survive, modernize itself, and cope with internal unrest. In the 1930s France was threatened by revisionist states, buffeted by economic and political turmoil, and subject to British prodding. Turkey, in contrast, had reinforced its foundations, and its government enjoyed the full backing of a united nation. In the 1920s the West was the guardian of the Versailles order. In the 1930s this order had collapsed; and as World War II approached, the West badly needed Turkey to strengthen its security.

III. RELATIONS WITH ITALY

Italy was one of the occupying powers in Anatolia and İstanbul between 1919 and 1922, but, as mentioned earlier, it was well disposed toward Ankara. Although it had evacuated Anatolia in 1922, Italy started displaying expansionist tendencies in its foreign policy after Mussolini acceded to power. Nevertheless, relations between the two countries up to the early 1930s were relatively relaxed and smooth.

Italy's expansionist policy became more manifest, in both its rhetoric and its implementation, after 1934. Italy thus became one of the Western countries that most profoundly affected Turkey's foreign policy in the interwar years. Italy was in control of the Dodecanese Islands off Turkey's coast, and from this position it was a direct threat to Turkey's security. That is why Turkey took careful note of all Mussolini's declarations and actions.

A. The Period from 1923 to 1934

Mussolini was convinced that Italy had been dealt with unjustly in the postwar arrangements and was determined to remedy this situation. When Britain offered Italy some territories in Africa, Mussolini reacted angrily and rebuffed Britain by asserting that "Italy is not a collector of deserts" (Akşin, p. 218). In 1923 he declared to the Italian parliament that the Adriatic could not satisfy Italy, that it had to expand into the Mediterranean. During Turkey's struggle for liberation, Italy's dissatisfaction with the postwar arrangements worked in Turkey's favor. But subsequently this became a major source of concern for Ankara.

Italy declared the eastern Mediterranean and the Balkans to be its areas of expansion. These were precisely the areas that were important for Turkey's security. Italy's occupation of Tripolitania in 1911–12 was still fresh in Turkish minds. During the mid-1920s Italy started asserting its influence in the Balkans. The targets of Italy's expansionist policies were Yugoslavia, Albania, and Greece. Italy forced Yugoslavia to make frontier adjustments in its favor, occupied the Greek island of Corfu, and brought Albania under its economic and political control. In order to monitor developments more closely, Turkey felt the need to establish an embassy in Tirana and a consulate in Avlonya (Vlore) in 1925.

At a time when Turkey's relations with Britain were strained in 1926 because of Mosul, rumors started circulating to the effect that Italy was about to invade western Anatolia. It was claimed that these rumors were deliberately circulated by the British intelligence services to create a diversion for Turkey. But Ankara really became concerned about Italy's intentions when Mussolini visited Tripolitania in 1926 and made declarations expressing his expansionist aims. Turkey was openly critical of such statements, and Italy kept reassuring Ankara that it had no designs on Turkish territory.

Parallel to the improvement in Turkish-British relations following the settlement of the Mosul question was a similar improvement in Turkish-Italian relations. In the late 1920s, when Italy was not feeling very strong, it sought to enhance its influence in the eastern Mediterranean by drawing Turkey and Greece into an alliance. Meanwhile Yugoslavia had signed a treaty of alliance with France in 1927 because it too was uneasy about Italian intentions. France had persúaded Czechoslovakia, Romania, and Yugoslavia to set up the Little Entente, and Italy wanted to establish a system that would rival and help counterbalance this alliance. For this purpose Italy was seeking to bring Greece and Turkey closer together.

It was in these circumstances that the minister of foreign affairs, Tevfik Rüştü, met with Mussolini in Milan in 1927. At that meeting Mussolini proposed the conclusion of a treaty of friendship and neutrality involving Greece, Turkey, and Italy, with Bulgaria to join this group at a later date.

The next year Turkey and Italy signed a Treaty of Neutrality, Conciliation, and Judicial Settlement on 30 May 1928 in Rome. In conformity with the usual practice in such treaties of neutrality, the first article provided that "the High Contracting Parties undertake not to take part in any political or economic action directed at one of the Parties," while the second article stipulated that "[i]f one of the High Contracting Parties, despite its peaceful posture, finds itself under attack from a state or group of states, the other Contracting Party undertakes to maintain its neutrality throughout the duration of the conflict." Article 4 provided that "[i]f differences should emerge in the interpretation or the implementation of the present treaty, these differences shall be referred directly to the Permanent Court of Justice at the Hague upon a request to that effect."

After this treaty was concluded, Mussolini made statements praising Turkey and expressing satisfaction with the state of Turkish-Italian relations, which helped put Turkey at ease. A year later Tevfik Rüştü returned to Rome, where he was warmly received. But when a dispute arose over the status of the island of Meis (Kastellorizo) and some other islands, the two countries signed a protocol on 30 May 1929 referring the matter to the Permanent Court of International Justice in compliance with the provisions of the 1928 treaty. In 1932 prime minister İsmet İnönü visited Rome, where the 1928 treaty was extended for three years. It was also decided that a convention would be signed concerning the ownership of the islands Meis and Kara Ada (off the coast of Bodrum), which made it unnecessary to refer the matter to the international court at the Hague.

In article 1 of this convention signed in Ankara on 4 November 1932 about twenty islands and rocky islets mentioned by name were ceded to Turkey. Article 2 declared: "The island of Kara in the bay of Bodrum shall belong to Turkey." Article 3 left the island of Meis (Kastellorizo) and twelve other islets in its vicinity to Italy. These islets were described in article 3 as falling within a circle with its center located at the dome of the church in the city of Kastellorizo and its radius extending as far as Cape San Stephano. Article 5 demarcated the line separating the territorial waters of Meis and Anatolia in detailed fashion and clearly designated the islands and islets belonging to each party.

Although Turkey perceived Italy as a threat to its security during this period, that did not prevent its bilateral trade with that country from expanding. From 1924 to 1930 Italy became Turkey's main trading partner. In the peak year of 1926 Italy accounted for 27.8% of Turkey's exports and 15.8% of Turkey's imports. After 1931 Italy's share started declining, and Germany replaced Italy as Turkey's main trading partner. The main reason for the high volume of trade between Turkey and Italy was that some Greek businessmen from Anatolia settled in Trieste after leaving Turkey and used their Turkish connections in carrying out their business activities. Furthermore, Italy was importing a large proportion of the cotton produced in Anatolia.

B. The Period from 1934 to 1939

The development of relations with Italy took a turn for the worse in the 1930s as a consequence of Mussolini's expansionist policies. In January 1933 the Nazis came to power in Germany. Fascism was on the rise in Spain with Francisco Franco. With this favorable international environment, Italy's foreign policy became more aggressive. What caused the greatest consternation in Turkey was Mussolini's speech at the second Fascist Congress, held in March 1934, when he declared that Italy's historic aspirations lay in Asia and Africa. Two months later, in an interview given to the Daily Telegraph newspaper, Mussolini said that Italy was a maritime power and that it required 29 million tons of grain to feed its population, while its domestic production amounted to only 6 million tons. This made it necessary for Italy to expand. During this period Mussolini started using the expression "Mare Nostrum" when referring to the Mediterranean. To pacify Turkey, Italian officials and Mussolini himself made reassuring statements. Mussolini told the Turkish ambassador in Rome that he considered Turkey to be a European country and that he felt great admiration for the revolutionary reforms being carried out there.

As a matter of fact, Italy even proposed the creation of an alliance in February 1935 consisting of Italy, Turkey, and Greece. Turkey perceived this proposal as an attempt to subvert the Balkan Pact established in 1934 and to cause rifts among the Balkan countries, so Italy's offer was rejected. At that time, Turkey and Italy were pursuing contradictory policies in the Balkans. Turkey was seeking an alliance among the Balkan states, while Italy sought to bind the Balkan states to Rome through bilateral agreements. Turkey's objective was to unite the Balkan states to counter a possible Italian threat, while Italy opposed any type of union in the Balkans.

Meanwhile France and Britain were becoming increasingly more apprehensive about the rising German threat and doing their best not to alienate Italy. In April 1935, when Germany reintroduced conscription, Britain and France signed the Stresa Agreements with Italy. A year later, however, Italy concluded a treaty with Germany and denounced the Stresa arrangements that were aimed at Germany. Nevertheless, Britain continued its policy of wooing Italy.

Meanwhile Italy was increasing its military activities in the Dodecanese Islands even as it was proposing an alliance with Turkey. Such activities had always created uneasiness in Turkey. When they were combined with bellicose statements that had emanated from Rome in the past, Turkey's concern started to grow. Italy's invasion of Abyssinia in 1935 helped in providing an explanation for the intensified activities around the islands, but this did not mitigate Turkey's anxieties. With Italy's attack, the LoN imposed sanctions on Italy in conformity with article 16/1 of the covenant, which reads as follows:

Should any Member of the League resort to war in disregard of its covenants...it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other Members of the League, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a Member of the League or not.

Although Italy had an important place in Turkey's economic relations, Turkey joined in this decision as a new member of the LoN. In November 1935 Italy protested Turkey's action through a note verbale. Furthermore, it threatened Turkey and claimed that Turkey had been coerced to follow British policies. In the preparation of the reply to the Italian note, Turkey took the initiative in securing joint action with the Balkan states in the form of a common text handed to Italy. Turkey also consulted with Britain and France to ensure that the content of its reply was similar to their note. In this way Turkey conveyed the message that it was not acting in isolation and that its policies were a reflection of the sense of the international community.

In joining the action of the LoN, of which it had become a member three years earlier, Turkey severed its economic ties with Italy. Because of the importance of these ties, Turkey suffered serious losses. The sanctions on Italy were lifted upon Britain's initiative on 6 July 1936, shortly after their introduction. Britain took this course because Italy started inciting the inhabitants of Palestine and Egypt against British rule and because it still harbored hopes of drawing Italy away from Germany. It was in Britain's interest to allow Mussolini freedom of action in Abyssinia, a place of relatively minor importance from Britain's strategic and economic perspective.

In 1936, when Italy started fortifying the Dodecanese Islands and building air bases there, Turkey's uneasiness began to mount once again. The Turkish leadership described the Dodecanese Islands as "a loaded gun pointing at Turkey's heart." Atatürk never had a very high opinion of the Italian army's fighting capacity, but at the time the course of events gave rise to concern in Ankara. These developments led Turkey to seek stronger ties with Britain. As the danger of Italian supremacy in the Mediterranean grew, Britain was also motivated to come closer to Turkey. With Turkey and Britain drawing closer, Italy felt the need to give assurances to Greece and Yugoslavia as well as Turkey in July 1936 and confirmed that it remained bound by the 1928 treaty.

In January 1937 Britain entered into a gentleman's agreement with Italy by which both countries undertook to preserve the status quo in the Mediterranean. In any case, Britain reigned supreme in the Mediterranean, as it held the outlets of this sea both at Gibraltar and at Suez and had back-up bases in Malta and Cyprus. Nevertheless, it still had worries about the status quo being upset. This agreement helped ease Turkey's concerns.

In February 1937 Turkish minister of foreign affairs Tevfik Rüştü Aras went to Milan, where he held talks with his Italian counterpart, Count G. G. Ciano. At these talks Aras tried to mend relations with Italy and sought to get Italy to sign the Montreux Convention, which Italy had refused to do to protest Turkey's participation in the sanctions imposed on Italy. Actually, it was Turkey's feelings of insecurity in the face of aggressive Italian intentions that had led Ankara to seek a revision in the regime of the Turkish Straits. Ciano agreed to sign the Montreux Convention if Turkey would legally recognize Italy's African conquests. He also attempted to take advantage of the circumstances to draw Turkey into the Italian-German camp. Although Turkey refused to accede to Italy's demands, the joint communiqué issued following the talks did reaffirm that both states considered themselves bound by the May 1928 treaty. There was no mention of Italy's accession to the Montreux Convention, however, even though it was one of the principal users of the Straits. Italy eventually acceded to the Montreux Convention on 2 May 1938.

Italy's invasion of Albania in April 1939 alarmed Turkey, which considered the preservation of the status quo in the Balkans of utmost importance to its security. From then on, Turkey would tilt increasingly toward Britain and France.

The salient feature of Turkish-Italian relations in the interwar years was Turkey's concern over Italian policies, especially in the 1930s. As in the case of Germany, the large volume of trade did not result in the stabilization and development of political relations. Turkey perceived Italy as the most serious threat because of Italy's expansionist policies.

IV. RELATIONS WITH GERMANYA. The Weimar Period (1923–1933)

Because of the conditions imposed at Versailles, Germany was facing all kinds of economic, political, and social problems. Its payments of huge war reparations to Britain, France, and other European countries were making postwar conditions in Germany unbearable, leading to hyperinflation and high levels of unemployment. These adverse conditions were giving rise to movements in favor of "breaking loose from the chains of Versailles," but until the 1930s Germany was too weak to carry this out. As its economic condition improved, however, its foreign policy would gradually turn more effective as well as more aggressive. (The developments of this period have been compiled from Koçak 1991 and Özgüldür.)

The Establishment of Diplomatic Relations and Subsequent Political Relations

Like Turkey, Germany was feeling isolated in the immediate aftermath of World War I. Although Turkey too had made certain concessions at Lausanne on issues such as the Straits and some other specific questions, the Weimar Republic was overwhelmed by the restrictions imposed at Versailles on both its domestic policies and its international relations. As recent allies, Turkey and Germany were readily able to establish relations and had no historic burden to overcome, as in the case of Turkey's relations with Britain or France. For Turkey, Germany was important as a European country that involved no psychological obstacles in bilateral relations.

Unlike Britain and France, Germany was not disturbed by Turkey's efforts to maintain good relations with the Soviets in the 1920s. All three countries were cold-shouldered and felt left out. By signing the Rapallo Treaty with the Soviet Union in February 1922, Germany was trying to overcome its sense of isolation.

After Lausanne, there were attempts to restore relations between Turkey and Germany. But Germany preferred to delay this in order to avoid incurring the displeasure of Britain and France. Negotiations between the two states started in early 1924 and ended with the conclusion of a Turkish-German Treaty of Friendship on 3 March 1924 and the restoration of diplomatic relations. Unlike Britain and France, Germany agreed to locate its embassy in Ankara, which helped create goodwill in Turkish circles.

Although relations remained limited in the 1920s, numerous German experts came to Turkey to alleviate the acute shortage of skilled personnel. Most of the experts were in the fields of agriculture, animal husbandry, and engineering. Germany was eager to develop its economic relations with Turkey and was glad to provide workers in these fields. At the same time, Turks were being sent to Germany to pursue their education.

During the interwar years an important aspect of Turkish-German relations was military cooperation. The first development in this sphere was the arrival of German officers to take up duties within the Turkish army. Germany had been deprived of its army under the terms of the Treaty of Versailles, and German officers found themselves unemployed. Some of these unemployed officers took jobs under contract in Turkey to provide basic training as well as to teach in the War College. Turkish officers also went to Germany to further their education.

An important aspect of this cooperation was Germany's part in providing weapons and contributing to the establishment of defense industries in Turkey. At the bilateral negotiations undertaken to develop this cooperation, Germany was at first reticent because of the unresolved Mosul issue. Although it was in Germany's economic and political interest to develop such ties, it preferred to bide its time.

In April 1929 the minister of foreign affairs, Tevfik Rüştü, visited Germany. Among the subjects taken up during the talks were developments in the Balkans, membership in the LoN, and relations with Italy. In those years Turkey wanted to see a stronger Germany and approved of Germany's foreign policy. At these talks T. Rüştü conveyed the message that Turkey was a new state and that its foreign policy was not expansionist (Koçak, 1991, pp. 31–36).

2. Economic Relations

In those years, economic relations were at the center of bilateral relations. With the implementation of the Dawes Plan and the rescheduling of Germany's reparation payments in 1924, Germany started attracting large amounts of foreign funds. By 1927 Germany's exports had reached the prewar level.

The first important transaction between the two countries was the signing of an agreement with the German firm Junkers in August 1925 for the setting up of an aircraft factory in Kayseri. Junkers was in financial difficulties, and the German government was ready to support the contract for political reasons. Another reason for the German government's support was that the Versailles restrictions prevented Germany from developing its defense industries. By building such factories in foreign countries, Germany was able to preserve its research and technological development skills without violating the letter of the Versailles Treaty. As a consequence, a joint Turkish-German company was set up to produce aircraft and aircraft engines (TOMTAŞ in Turkish and TOMTASCH in German, derived from Tayyare ve Motor Türk Anonim Sirketi). The factory was completed in one year. This was Turkey's first attempt at building an aircraft industry, which led eventually to the establishment of the facilities to manufacture the F-16 fighter in the mid-1980s.

While building the aircraft factory, Germany was also assisting in setting up an air transport system in Turkey. The project involved the establishment of an airline linking Berlin and Baghdad via İstanbul and Ankara. Because full agreement could not be reached among the parties and the circumstances were not favorable, only part of the project was realized. In 1930 Lufthansa inaugurated the Berlin-İstanbul air link (Koçak 1991, pp. 66–82).

The developing economic ties acquired a legal basis when the two countries signed a commercial convention in Ankara on 12 January 1927. Soon this convention was unable to respond to the greatly expanded volume of trade, so the two countries signed a new trade treaty in May 1930. This treaty had a most-favored-nation clause and provided for customs reductions on certain products. Germany applied the customs reductions to raw materials imported from Turkey. There was a gradual but steady increase in Turkish-German trade until 1933. Germany's share in Turkish imports rose from 6.4% in 1923 to 23.2% in 1932. While Germany took 9% of Turkey's exports in 1923, this figure rose to 13.5% in 1932. Turkey's share in Germany's total trade hovered around 2% during this time, however.

Bilateral relations during this period developed without major problems in an atmosphere in which both countries sought to come closer to one another. When Hitler came to power, these relations underwent a radical transformation, especially in the economic sphere. As Germany's domestic scene changed, these changes were reflected in German foreign policies.

B. The Nazi Period (1933-1939)

When the National Socialist Party under Hitler's leadership came to power in January 1933, sharp changes took place in Germany's domestic and foreign policies. Because of this process, the two countries drifted apart as their foreign policy objectives started to diverge. It is interesting that economic relations maintained their intensity and developed even further in spite of these increasing differences in foreign policy.

As Turkey came closer to Britain and France in the 1930s, Germany was entering a period of tension in its relations with these countries.

1. Political Relations

The first official contact with the Hitler administration occurred in July 1933 with the arrival in Berlin of a Turkish parliamentary delegation. In the course of the talks held on that occasion, Hitler told the parliamentarians that the Turkish War of Liberation was a source of inspiration for him, while the other German officials drew parallels between Hitler and Atatürk. The aim was to create a perception of common traits between the two countries and prepare the ground for an alliance between Turkey and Germany.

But the divergence between Turkish and German foreign policies was gradually becoming more obvious. Actually, Turkey was not too comfortable with some aspects of the postwar order and looked upon Germany's efforts to free itself from the shackles of Versailles with some sympathy. Furthermore, in the beginning Germany's potential areas of expansion appeared to be in Eastern Europe, quite some distance away. Turkey did not approve of Germany's attempts to change the status quo by the use of force, however.

One of the contentious issues between the two countries was the Balkan Pact of 1934, in the formation of which Turkey had played a leading role. Germany saw this region as its zone of influence and did not approve of Turkey taking an active interest in this region. As Turkey drew closer to Britain and France, Turkey's expanded role in the Balkans meant an increased role for these two countries in the area. France had already established an alliance with Yugoslavia and Romania through the Little Entente. Germany was bothered by a pact that had as one of its objectives the containment of its World War I ally Bulgaria. Like Germany, Bulgaria pursued revisionist policies in its region.

Another issue that bothered Germany was the Montreux Convention. Germany realized that Turkey had, despite some disagreements, changed the status of the Straits with the cooperation and approval of Britain. It perceived this as another sign of rapprochement between Turkey and Britain. Although Germany was not a signatory of the Lausanne Treaty and therefore not invited to the Montreux Conference, it was uncomfortable with the changes being made in that document. In particular, Germany objected to the clauses of the convention regarding the passage through the Straits of auxiliary naval vessels and the right of Soviet warships to gain access to the Mediterranean. Germany wanted a bilateral treaty to regulate navigation in the Straits but failed to achieve its objective, despite persistent attempts.

In spite of these questions, no serious problems emerged in bilateral relations, and high-level diplomatic contacts did take place from time to time. Turkey was against Germany's expansionist policies but was careful to avoid a direct confrontation. When Germany was carrying out its Lebensraum policy, it wanted to draw Turkey closer or at least prevent Ankara from getting involved in an alliance with Britain and France. This was the main reason for Germany's carefully calibrated policy toward Turkey. Because of the Hatay question, Germany regarded Turkey as a revisionist state and considered it to be a natural ally of a revisionist Germany. The Germans often recalled that the two countries had been comrades in arms in the recent war and kept alluding to their wartime alliance, even though this had produced such ruinous consequences for Turkey.

As tensions grew and Europe came closer to war, the stand that Turkey might take in the event of war became ever more important. Germany started taking active steps to pull Turkey into the revisionist camp. In July 1938 the German minister of foreign affairs, Ribbentrop, held talks with the secretary general of the Turkish MFA, Numan Menemencioğlu. Ribbentrop called on Turkey to join the revisionists. His argument was that Turkey's policies on Hatay and the regime of the Straits were revisionist in character, and he proposed that the two countries conclude a treaty of neutrality. Menemencioğlu replied that Turkey had concluded such treaties only with its neighbors and did not have such an agreement even with Britain. However, Turkey did not fail to give Germany verbal assurances on various occasions that it would not enter into any commitments directed against Germany.

When Italy attacked Albania in April 1939, Turkey's concern over the intentions of the Mussolini administration increased sharply. Germany's indirect support for Italy's actions deeply affected the development of Turkish-German relations. Germany wanted to allay Turkey's fears and prevent Ankara from drawing closer to Britain and France. To this end Germany proposed sending former prime minister Franz von Papen to the embassy in Ankara, which happened to be vacant at the time. But neither Atatürk nor İnönü wanted to see this politician, who had engineered the forcible annexation of Austria, in Ankara as ambassador (Güçlü, p. 70). This appointment took effect only in April 1939 at Germany's insistence. Von Papen noted Turkey's concern about Italy's intentions and realized that this was driving Turkey toward Britain and France. He informed Berlin that Turkish anxieties might be relieved if Mussolini gave Turkey assurances.

At this point Turkey was engaged in negotiations with both Britain and the Soviet Union to conclude treaties with those countries. The Germans were aware of these developments and worried about Ankara's intentions. Von Papen's actions designed to relieve Turkey's anxieties over Italy's policies proved fruitless. Germany was not prepared to press Italy over the issue, because Berlin's foreign policy attributed greater importance to having Rome on its side. Ankara did not want to antagonize Germany, so it kept giving Berlin evasive responses about its negotiations with Britain and France.

Turkey's increasing friendship with Britain finally drew Germany's ire, and Ribbentrop ordered the suspension of the deliveries of German arms and military equipment to Turkey. In fact, the German leadership even contemplated using trade as a bargaining tool and considered cutting off trade relations with Turkey. But this option was rejected because Turkish supplies of chromate were essential for Germany's defense industries. Turkey had already indicated to Germany that the suspension of arms deliveries would be met with the suspension of chromate sales. Both sides were being very careful in exercising their options in an unsettled environment.

After the signature of the Pact of Steel between Italy and Germany on 22 May 1939, Turkey's concerns were seen to be justified. Germany was opposed to the inclusion of the Balkans in the guarantees to be provided by a possible Turkish-British Treaty. Berlin wanted to keep Turkey from getting involved in the Balkans. Its immediate goal was to allow Italy maximum freedom of action in the Balkans to ensure its long-term goal of establishing German hegemony in the region. Meanwhile Turkey was seeking to ensure the security of the Balkans and the Mediterranean, which it considered to be within its security zone, through treaties to be concluded with Britain and France. These were the issues that were creating tension between the two countries on the eve of the outbreak of war.

The signing of the Nazi-Soviet Pact of 23 August 1939 brought additional complications in Turkish-German relations. While Turkey was seeking to get closer to Britain and France and trying to reconcile this with a Turkish-Soviet Treaty and maybe even draw the Soviet Union closer to Britain, the Nazi-Soviet Pact brought these efforts to an abrupt end, much to Turkey's concern.

When Germany attacked Poland on 1 September, unleashing World War II, Turkey informed the German ambassador that it would maintain its neutrality. But Ankara continued to worry about Italy joining the war, thus causing hostilities to spread to the Mediterranean.

2. Economic Relations

Turkish-German relations also had important economic and cultural dimensions. As Germany recovered from the ravages of the war and the postwar turmoil, its recovery was given a further boost by the American-sponsored Young Plan of 1929. This enabled Germany to make its weight felt in Eastern Europe and the Balkans. Turkey was one of the countries that came within Germany's economic sphere. The countries attracting Germany's attention were endowed with natural resources and could be classified as agricultural economies. Under the foreign trade policy devised by Hitler's minister of economics, Hjalmar Schacht, German industry was to draw its raw materials mostly from the countries of Eastern Europe and the Balkans and supply these countries with their requirements for finished products through barter arrangements. German firms were actively encouraged by the state to enter into these arrangements. Turkey fitted neatly into this pattern and ended up by becoming a supplier of raw materials for Hitler's Germany and a market for its goods. Through these policies Germany was able to accelerate the growth of its economy while bringing the countries that had become its trading partners under its political influence.

Germany's expansion into Eastern Europe and the Balkans coincided with the adoption of statism in Turkey. After having sought in vain to develop its economy through private enterprise during the 1920s, Turkey undertook large, state-sponsored industrialization projects in the 1930s. This required large-scale injections of capital and technology. Germany appeared on the scene as the country that could provide these inputs. Germany started providing loans for Turkey while also investing in the Turkish economy. In 1934 the negotiations with a visiting trade delegation led to the granting of a long-term loan equivalent to 20 million liras. Germany also provided experts (Güçlü, p. 51). Among the German projects in Turkey, in addition to the aircraft factory mentioned previously, were the paper factory at Izmit, new investments by German electrical equipment industries, and the construction of the ports of Samsun and İskenderun. When war broke out in 1939, the number of German experts in Turkey had reached 2,000.

The volume of trade between the two countries was also expanding fast. Germany purchased agricultural products and raw materials and sold industrial products through a clearing system. For a country chronically short of foreign exchange, the clearing system that allowed industrial goods to be procured by delivering agricultural products and raw materials had certain attractions. But in reality the system worked against Turkey. For political reasons Germany was purchasing agricultural commodities at prices above the prevailing market price. This would render the Turkish economy dependent on Germany. Against this, Germany was able to overcharge for its industrial exports. So Germany was able to derive both political and economic benefits from its trading system. After a while Germany became almost the sole purchaser of specific commodities, whereupon it was able to dictate the price. This led to problems in trade relations. In the 1930s Turkey relied almost exclusively on Germany for rail, air, and maritime transport. Practically all of the major German steel, electrical implements, and chemical goods producers had business connections with Turkey. Their commercial transactions were financed largely by Deutsche Bank and Deutsche Orientbank.

Eventually Ankara began to get concerned about this excessive dependence on one country in the field of foreign trade. At a certain point Germany was taking 51% of Turkey's exports and supplying 45% of Turkey's imports. As noted earlier, Turkey awarded the contract for the Karabük Iron and Steelworks to the British firm Brassert even though Krupp's terms were more favorable. Germany was prepared for such an eventuality and sent economics minister Hjalmar Schacht to Ankara to try to persuade the Turks. Despite this, the contract for the fortifications on the Dardanelles was awarded to a British firm. Britain and France were also concerned about the German hold on Turkey's foreign trade. This led Britain to negotiate a clearing agreement with Turkey in September 1936, with France following suit in June 1937.

Turkey became aware that the clearing arrangement with Germany was working against its interests and raised the issue at the negotiations. Furthermore, Germany was late in settling its debts to Turkey under the clearing arrangement.

Ankara was also feeling uneasy about German propaganda and its efforts to use economic, cultural, and military ties with Turkey to enhance its influence. This led Ankara to enter into negotiations with Britain and France to expand trade. As noted earlier, Britain extended a loan of £10 million to Turkey in May 1938. Not wanting to lose its privileged place in Turkey's economic life, Germany agreed (during the visit of economy minister Walter Funk to Ankara) to extend a loan of 150 million marks to Turkey, to be repaid over ten years. The agreement was signed in Berlin on 16 January 1939. The annual rate of interest of the loan would be 5%. This loan was to be used by Turkey to purchase military equipment and industrial products.

Cultural Relations and German Propaganda Activities in Turkey

In the 1930s Germany's propaganda activities in Turkey and the cultural exchanges between the two countries were an important aspect of bilateral relations. Intensive German propaganda started in 1933 with the publication in Istanbul of the Türkische Post newspaper. The German Embassy and consulates in Turkey maintained close links with the press corps. A group of Turkish journalists was invited to visit Germany. German firms were placing advertisements in Turkish newspapers and supplying them with cheap newsprint, undercutting British and French suppliers.

An association called Teutonia was established in Istanbul to serve German propaganda objectives. The primary theme of German propaganda was the historic friendship between the two countries and the military alliance during World War I. Members of German youth organizations as well as military delegations visited Turkey, and German officers serving in Turkish military academies sought to influence their Turkish colleagues. During this period Turkish officers still recalled the times when they were comrades in arms with the Germans and spoke highly of German military capabilities and discipline. Germany was also striving to make Turkey dependent on German armaments and military equipment.

After 1933 the Turkish government invited numerous German academics and artists who had lost their jobs because of their differences with the Nazi administration to come to Turkey to help in carrying out the reform of Turkish universities. These academics and artists settled in Istanbul and Ankara and made significant contributions to Turkey's academic and artistic life. Toward the end of the 1930s Germany claimed that these expatriates were engaged in espionage on behalf of Britain and called for their expulsion. Turkey appreciated the valuable services of these expatriates, however, and refused to accede to Germany's request (Box 2-8).

To sum up, Germany's Turkish policy in the interwar years was to keep Turkey under its grip if possible, or at least to prevent it from moving into the Anglo-French camp. Germany followed three courses to achieve these objectives: increasing Turkey's economic dependence on Germany, influencing Turkish public opinion through propaganda and intensified cultural exchanges, and rendering Turkey dependent on German military equipment while seeking to create a nucleus of pro-German elements within the officer corps.

Turkey was able to avoid being dragged behind Germany after Hitler came to power, but it needed Germany's help in the fields of technical assistance and economic relations during the 1930s. Despite its dependence on Germany in its trade relations, Turkey was able to use the limited diplomatic and political means at its disposal and avoid getting trapped in Germany's zone of influence like some other Eastern European and Balkan countries.

The major factor that contributed to Turkey's not being drawn into the German camp before the war was that Turkey had been able to break free of the Sèvres arrangement and negotiate the Lausanne Treaty. Questions that had not been satisfactorily settled at Lausanne (such as Mosul, the status of the Straits, and Hatay) were successfully dealt with through negotiations and in compliance with international law. In its Westernization efforts, Turkey gave priority to its relations with Britain and to a certain extent with France. A rapprochement with Germany would have been interpreted as a divergence from Turkey's goal of Westernization. The dire consequences of Turkey's alliance with Germany during World War I were still fresh in people's minds, and the mistake would not be repeated despite Germany's blandishments.

v. Turkey and the Issues of International Security

After the catastrophe of World War I, the international community set about establishing a new order that would prevent the recurrence of such a conflict. The LoN was established to secure this objective and was the brainchild of U.S. president Woodrow Wilson. A Permanent Court of International Justice, disarmament conferences and agreements, the Kellogg-Briand Pact, and the Soviet-sponsored collective security system were some of the principal instruments devised to achieve this objective and ensure the peaceful settlement of international disputes.

From the date of its establishment, the Turkish Republic gave priority to carrying out its internal reforms. Turkey followed the development of the policies of Italy and Germany with deep concern and made every effort to resolve the question of Mosul with Britain and the question of Hatay with France. It was natural for such a country to attach importance to international efforts to achieve collective security. As a country with a pro–status quo foreign policy, Turkey gave its support to the diplomatic processes aimed at achieving international security and participated actively in the arrangements designed to attain this goal.

A. International Security, Disarmament Efforts, and Turkey

One of the initiatives designed to strengthen international security in the interwar years was the signing in 1928 by French minister of foreign affairs Aristide Briand and U.S. secretary of state Frank Kellogg of a pact outlawing war as an instrument of national policy. This was open to other states, and Turkey acceded to the pact in January 1929 when invited to do so.

Other initiatives in this direction were the disarmament conferences of this period. There was a widespread belief that the prewar arms race and the accumulation of

Box 2-8. Academics Who Sought Refuge in Turkey

In line with the old Ottoman practice, Turkey offered asylum to the German Jews and liberal dissidents who fled from Nazi repression during the 1930s. Germany attempted to prevent Turkey from providing asylum to these Jewish refugees by appealing to "traditional German-Turkish friendship" or by resorting to veiled threats. Turkey ignored the German requests and went ahead and opened its doors to the refugees, even employing those with special qualifications in public services and universities. This policy led to raising the academic level of universities in Turkey.

This was the time when the University of Istanbul (Darulfünun), representing scholasticism, was being transformed into an institution imparting the contemporary values of the enlightenment. The influx of mostly Jewish refugees from Hitler's Germany and Mussolini's Italy came at this juncture, including the prominent mathematician Richard Courant, the physicists Max Born and James Franck, the philosophers Ernest von Aster and Hans Reichenbach, the Jurist Ernst Hirsch, and the musicians Paul Hindemith and Carl Ebert. These academics and artists took an active part in Turkey's academic restructuring by establishing new faculties and chairs at the universities. They also helped introduce new teaching methods and aided in the establishment of libraries, the publication of scientific journals, the designing of new buildings, and the training of academic personnel. They made a major contribution to all aspects of the revolution in the field of university education in Turkev.

The close cooperation established between Turkish and German scholars and artists during these years continued after the German scholars left Turkey and provided the cultural basis for the resumption of cooperation between Turkey and Germany in the postwar period.

vast arsenals both precipitated the war and contributed to its intensity. Because Germany was considered the main culprit in starting the war and causing it to spread, the Versailles Treaty contained detailed provisions to secure complete German disarmament. The Covenant of the LoN also contained provisions regarding disarmament. Article 8 declared that the maintenance of peace required the reduction of national armaments.

In 1922 the LoN decided to secure a general agreement on disarmament. A Permanent Disarmament Committee was set up for this purpose. During the deliberations of the committee, the opposing French and British positions were debated at great length. The committee finally concluded its work in 1924 and prepared the Geneva Protocol. The protocol stated that security depended directly on disarmament and stipulated the acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of International Justice to achieve this. Britain refused to accept this protocol.

In 1925 the General Assembly of the LoN set up the Committee for Preparing Disarmament and issued invitations to a disarmament conference. Turkey participated in the work of the committee that got underway in March 1928. In the committee the USSR proposed the elimination of all armaments, much to the astonishment of the Western states, and Turkey supported this position.

Subsequently Turkey was to support the gradual reduction of armaments. The reduction was to be not in absolute terms but in relative terms. If a general reduction was carried out by all armies, states with relatively weak armies would find themselves at a disadvantage. As a matter of fact, Turkey did not believe that a generalized elimination of armaments could be realized but considered that it would be in its interest even if only partial success could be achieved. Both Turkey's resources and its military forces were very limited at that time, and Ankara felt that generalized disarmament would enhance its overall security.

After long preparations the Conference on the Reduction of Armaments and Disarmament opened in Geneva on 2 February 1932. The conference was under the control of Britain and France. Turkey proposed that upper limits be placed on armaments and men, with the requirement that those countries exceeding the limit gradually reduce their forces. Turkey also introduced some radical ideas like the elimination of air forces, tanks, and heavy artillery. Factories producing armaments were to be distributed among states and were to meet orders by producing equal amounts for each state. In the voting, the Soviet proposal for eliminating all armaments was rejected as well as Turkey's proposal for every country gradually to reduce its armaments to the same level. The conference concluded its work without achieving any tangible result.

B. Turkey's Membership in the League of Nations

After its establishment following World War I, the LoN to a considerable extent came under the control of Britain and France and tended to serve the interests of these two countries.

Once the Mosul question had been disposed of, Britain advised Turkey to become a member of the LoN. This would signify that Turkey had become a pro-status quo country. But Turkey had not made any such commitment either at Lausanne or at subsequent negotiations. M. Kemal had once mentioned membership in the LoN in a speech in 1924. Under the Treaty of Lausanne, Turkey had agreed to recognize the competence of the LoN in certain areas. These were the question of Mosul in article 3/2, the protection of minorities in articles 42 and 44, the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal in article 92, and sanitary issues in articles 116 and 118. There were also references to the LoN in articles 13, 15, and 18 of the Straits Convention and article 4 of the Convention Respecting the Thracian Frontiers.

Turkey was reticent about LoN membership for a number of reasons. For one thing, the league was completely under British influence on the question of Mosul and decided against Turkey. This created much disappointment and bitterness both among the Turkish public and among the leadership. The organization was regarded as a tool of France and Britain and its future looked uncertain, so there was no great enthusiasm to join.

Another factor was the USSR's approach to the organization. For long years the USSR regarded the LoN as the political and organizational extension of imperialism. Under the terms of the 1929 protocol extending the treaty of December 1925, Turkey was bound to consult the USSR on the subject of membership.

In the light of developments in the international arena and in Turkish relations with Britain and the Soviet Union, Turkey started giving signs in early 1932 that it was ready to consider LoN membership. Turkish diplomats went to Geneva to examine the way in which the LoN operated. In 1928 minister of foreign affairs Tevfik Rüştü participated in the meeting of the Disarmament Committee. He made a statement indicating Turkey's readiness to become a member of the LoN. At the time, the lines were being drawn between the revisionist and pro-status quo states in Europe. Since Turkey sided with the pro-status quo group, its membership would confirm its leanings and also serve as a vehicle for enhancing its security.

As Britain sought to persuade Turkey to join the LoN, Turkey kept replying that it would consider membership only on condition of being given a permanent seat in the council. Only major powers had permanent seats in the council, so it was clear that Turkey would not be admitted as a member. In a statement on the subject of membership, İsmet Paşa said that the USSR would show understanding if Turkish membership in the LoN came with a seat in the council, but a plain membership was bound to offend the Soviets.

As Turkey drew closer to Britain in the early 1930s, its views on LoN membership started to evolve. The Mosul question had revealed the disadvantages of nonmembership. As the balance in Europe started shifting, the USSR began to favor an eventual Turkish membership in the LoN. During their trips to the USSR, Ismet Paşa and Tevfik Rüştü had been able to soften Moscow's position vis-à-vis Turkish membership, and Turkey's leaders eventually obtained Moscow's assent in accordance with the 1929 protocol.

When the time came to join the LoN, M. Kemal wanted membership to be not upon Turkey's request but upon an invitation from the LoN. In compliance with this wish, the Spanish delegate proposed, with the support of Greece, that Turkey be invited to join the LoN. At the meeting of 6 July 1932 the Spanish proposal was unanimously approved. During the consideration of this item, those who took the floor, including Greece, made statements praising Turkey and its foreign policy and dwelling on the positive impact that Turkey's membership would have on the LoN. Turkey accepted this invitation by a decree of the council of ministers on 9 July 1932. This was transmitted to the secretary-general of the LoN by Tevfik Rüştü, whereupon the General Assembly of the LoN approved Turkey's membership with the unanimous vote of its forty-three members on 18 July 1932.

At the time of its membership Turkey registered certain reservations. One of these had to do with Turkey's particular circumstances, while another concerned its relations with the USSR and commitments emanating from treaties. The precedent for Turkey's action was Germany, which had also registered reservations with respect to the restrictions imposed by the Treaty of Versailles. Turkey referred to the restrictions imposed by Lausanne (namely, the demilitarization of the Straits). Turkey would participate in the sanctions foreseen in article 16 only to the extent that they were compatible with its military situation.

Turkey's second reservation arose in the context of its relations with the USSR. Turkey reserved its position with respect to the sanctions provisions of articles 16 and 17 and formally notified Moscow of its decision. If the USSR became involved in hostilities with another country, Turkey would not consider itself bound by these articles but would make its own decision regarding the identity of the covenant-breaking state. Turkey wanted to make sure that it was free to make its own decision with respect to participating in sanctions that might be directed against the USSR.

In the course of its membership, Turkey was active in the LoN. Two years after its admission, it placed its candidacy for the seat in the council vacated by China. On 17 September 1934 Turkey was elected to the council with forty-eight votes and exercised its membership from 1935 to 1937. In 1937 minister of foreign affairs Tevfik Rüştü Aras presided over the work of the council.

Turkey's active participation in the work of the LoN became more apparent during Italy's occupation of Abyssinia. Turkey did not hesitate in taking part in the sanctions imposed on Italy. This stand drew the criticism of certain circles within the country. It led to substantial economic losses, given Italy's important share in Turkey's foreign trade. Turkey accepted the risk of provoking an Italian reaction to its policies. Turkey joined the Committee of Five together with France, Poland, Britain, and Spain, set up to help Abyssinia. Turkey also provided direct aid to Abyssinia through the Turkish Red Crescent.

The LoN was unable to prevent Italy's occupation of Abyssinia or Japan's occupation of Manchuria. Neither was it effective in preventing Germany from flouting the provisions of Versailles. But Turkey was able to make its mark on the activities of the world organization, and ten years after its establishment it had earned a good reputation among the family of nations. This was reflected in the manner of its admission to the organization and its election to the council.

In addition to the LoN, the Permanent Court of International Justice had been set up at the Hague in 1922. Turkey recognized its jurisdiction in settling disputes and also agreed, at Lausanne and in certain bilateral conciliation and arbitration treaties, to assign certain specific roles to the court. Turkey acceded to the Permanent Court's Charter in 1935. It accepted the court's compulsory jurisdiction under the following conditions: (1) there must be reciprocity; (2) it would be for a term of five years; (3) the dispute and its causes must not predate Turkey's accession; (4) the dispute must relate to the following cases mentioned in article 36 of the charter (a) the interpretation of a treaty; (b) a subject connected with international law; (c) a subject that, if determined to exist, would negate an international rule; (d) the nature and amount of reparations arising from the carrying out of an international commitment.

In addition, Turkey included in its protocol of accession the following reservation: if an agreement or convention to which Turkey is a party has provisions regarding the method of settling a dispute arising directly or indirectly from the implementation of these accords, this dispute must not be included in the four cases mentioned above.

The Permanent Court of International Justice considered some cases of interest to Turkey in the interwar years. It rendered an advisory opinion in connection with the établi question with Greece (see "Relations with Greece" below) and the Mosul question with Britain. It also considered the Bozkurt-Lotus case in 1926.

C. The Mediterranean Security Conference of Nyon

In 1937 some merchant ships were torpedoed and sunk in the Aegean and Mediterranean seas. This brought uncertainty to maritime transport and caused tension in international relations. It was suspected that Italian submarines were responsible for these acts of aggression. Security concerns were particularly acute because some of the attacks occurred in the vicinity of Bozcaada, just off the Turkish coast.

Britain and France arranged a meeting in Nyon, Switzerland, to consider measures to deal with such attacks and invited countries with interests in the Mediterranean to attend. The meeting began on 10 September 1937 with the participation of Turkey, the USSR, Romania, and Bulgaria. Italy, Spain, Germany, and Albania were absent. Articles 2 and 3 of the agreement signed at the meeting contained the warning that any submarines in the vicinity of a merchant ship under attack would be fired upon. The Mediterranean was divided into eastern and western sectors and would be patrolled by the British and French navies.

Subsequently the parties met on 17 September in Geneva and extended the warning issued to submarines to include warships and military aircraft. Turkey was among the signatories of both documents.

Relations with the USSR

I. THE BACKGROUND OF RELATIONS Turkey

This was the period when the new Republican regime was getting established and social restructuring was taking place. Reconstruction in an open economic environment was tried in the years from 1923 to 1929 without success. With the advent of the global economic crisis in 1929, the country changed course to protectionist-statist industrialization in the 1930s. Protectionism was introduced in 1929, and statism came in 1932. During these years Turkey was receiving loans from Britain and Germany as well as from the USSR and was making one-half of its trade exchanges with Germany, which affected the country's foreign policy. Once Turkey's problems with Europe were settled and it had been admitted to the LoN, its relations with Europe developed rapidly.

In foreign policy, the 1920s were the years when the problems left over from Lausanne were sorted out while in the 1930s the main concern was preparing for the approaching conflict in Europe.

In the course of its political restructuring, Turkey steered clear of communism and political Islam. The wholesale arrest of Communists between 1923 and 1929 caused friction with the USSR. This was balanced by Turkey's pro–status quo policies, which found their expression in the dictum "Peace at home, peace in the world." This signified that Turkey would not be involved with Turkic communities outside Turkey, including those within the USSR. This approach helped in keeping bilateral relations on a steady course.

The USSR

As indicated earlier, in 1921 the USSR started losing hope that its revolution would merge with another Communist revolution in Europe. When the German uprisings were finally suppressed in 1923, the Soviet hopes were dashed for good. After these events Stalin began to build his own administration in the Soviet Union. He took control of the party and started running the state with the help of the secret security organizations. In this he was helped by Lenin's absence from the administration after the attempt on his life in 1922 and during his long illness, leading up to his death in 1924. Stalin eliminated all opposition within the party from 1920 to 1928 and gradually established Soviet control in Central Asia. Starting in November 1923, Soviet foreign policy came under his full control.

Until the mid-1920s Soviet foreign policy was focused on gaining the recognition of other states and establishing good relations with neighbors. In 1924 the USSR was recognized by Italy, Norway, Austria, Greece, Sweden, and Denmark in quick succession. The Soviet-German Treaty was signed on 24 April 1926 and the Litvinov Protocol in 1928.

Toward the end of the 1920s the USSR abandoned the New Economic Policy (NEP). From 1928 to 1932 it carried out the First Five-Year Plan, during which collectivization of farms was achieved and the rich landowners (the kulaks) were liquidated as a class. Through the creation of farm machinery and tractor stations, the party's control over the production process was tightened. The five-year plan inaugurated a period of fast growth that would last until 1941. The system of production was transformed, and the process of converting peasants into farm workers was accelerated. The role and importance of the bureaucracy within the state apparatus increased during this period. In February 1934 the Seventeenth Party Congress approved and adopted the Second Five-Year Plan.

On 16 September 1934 the USSR was admitted to the LoN, two years after Turkey. Membership in the LoN was of significance to the USSR. When the LoN first came into being, the Soviets had described the organization as a "gang of plunderers bound by a holy capitalist alliance to suppress the workers' revolution" (Deutscher, p. 180). The USSR had come a long way from 1917 to 1934. It entered into negotiation with European states for the purpose of concluding alliances. When these negotiations proved fruitless, the USSR signed a treaty of nonaggression with Germany to gain time and territory.

II. COOPERATION (1923-1936)

A. The Treaty of Friendship and Neutrality of 1925

The first notable event in Turkey's relations with the USSR following Lausanne was the Treaty of Friendship and Neutrality signed on 17 December 1925 in Paris by the foreign ministers, Dr. Tevfik Rüştü [Aras] and G. V. Chicherin.

From Turkey's point of view, the main reason to conclude this treaty was the negative outcome of the Mosul question on 16 December 1925. While the Mosul issue remained unsettled, the outbreak of the Sheikh Said uprising in February 1925 left Turkey in a very delicate situation both domestically and externally. At a time when Turkey's relations with the Western countries remained precarious, Ankara regarded the USSR as a source of support.

There was a similar perception in Moscow. The Locarno arrangements of 1 December 1925 assured the stability of Germany's western frontiers, but no provision was made for its eastern frontiers. Moscow perceived this as an anti-Soviet move. Although Western countries were gradually recognizing the Soviet regime, they were still excluding the USSR when making arrangements among themselves. This was causing concern in Moscow.

In September 1924 the Soviet ambassador in Ankara, Iakov Z. Surits, made a proposal to İsmet Paşa to conclude a treaty that would develop the 1921 treaty and guide bilateral relations. But the treaty remained unsigned because of the ongoing negotiations between the USSR and Britain and the unresolved Mosul question. After the Locarno Treaties were concluded and the Mosul question was resolved, the Turkish-Soviet Treaty was signed in Paris on 17 December 1925 and came into effect on 26 June 1926.

The treaty consisted of three articles, three protocols, and one secret letter.

Article 1: "In the event of a military attack on one of the contracting parties by a third state or several states, the other contracting power undertakes to maintain its neutrality."

Article 2: "Each contracting party undertakes to refrain from any attack on the other. Each contracting party undertakes not to participate in any alliance or political agreement directed against the other contracting party by a third state or several states; nor shall it participate in any alliance or agreement directed against the other contracting party's security from land or sea by a third state or several states. Furthermore, each contracting party undertakes not to participate in any hostile act directed against the other contracting party by a third state or several states."

Article 3: "The treaty shall become effective immediately after ratification and will remain effective for a term of 3 years. If one of the contracting parties does not give notice of its intention to terminate the treaty 6 months prior to the expiration of the term, the treaty will be automatically extended for another year."

In addition to the treaty and protocols, Commissar Chicherin handed over a letter to Tevfik Rüştü that was kept secret. The letter contained this passage: "Mr. Minister, in furtherance of the treaty signed by the two governments today, I would like to declare that the sincere friendship prevailing between the two sides since the signing of the 16 March 1921 treaty in Moscow shall continue unaltered and shall remain the basis for their relations should one of the contracting parties find itself at war with a third state or several states."

İsmail Soysal points out that the letter was a unilateral Soviet initiative and was designed to provide Turkey with some, although insufficient, assurance at a time when Turkey's relations with Britain were very strained (Soysal, p. 265).

The 1925 treaty was the first of its kind concluded by the two states. The USSR signed similar treaties with Afghanistan on 31 August 1926, Lithuania on 28 September 1926, and Iran on 1 October 1927. This treaty introduced into international practice the system of securing neutrality and nonaggression through bilateral agreements and helped in strengthening peace in the Middle East (Vandov, p. 69).

In addition, the 1925 treaty was the legal and political determinant for the bilateral relations of the two countries in subsequent years when it was extended in 1929, 1931, and 1935 and also when it was denounced in 1945.

B. The Trade Agreement of 1927

The USSR established its first trade office in Turkey in 1922. The status of the office as well as its Communist propaganda activities created problems between the two governments. Given that in the USSR only the state could engage in international trade, the personnel of the trade office consisted of state employees, who expected to enjoy diplomatic immunity. Furthermore, in February 1926 the USSR introduced some restrictions on the import of certain Turkish goods. In May the port of Odessa was closed to imports from Turkey. This question was the main item on the agenda of the talks between Chicherin and Tevfik Rüştü when they met in Odessa in November 1926. The negotiations led to the signature on 11 March 1927 of the Agreement on Trade and Navigation.

This agreement achieved the following results.

- 1. The status of the Soviet Trade Offices in Turkey was clarified. Henceforth the trade representatives, their assistants, and the premises would enjoy diplomatic immunity. Trade offices would be allowed in Istanbul, İzmir, Trabzon, Mersin, Erzurum, Konya, and Eskişehir. The request to open offices in Kars and Artvin was turned down.
- 2. The parties agreed to allow goods shipped to a third country to transit their country without paying customs duties. This would allow Turkish products to use the port of Batum in transit to their final destination outside the USSR.
- 3. A ceiling was placed on the annual value of Turkish products to be exported to the USSR.

The agreement failed to eliminate all contentious issues between the two countries. One of the reasons for this was the economic difficulties that Turkey was facing following the 1929 economic crisis. In this period Turkey's trade exchanges with the USSR never exceeded 6 or 7% of Turkey's total trade.

c. The 1929 Protocol

The 1925 treaty was extended for two years by the protocol signed in 1929. This was an important development in the relations between the two countries. Before examining the protocol, it will be useful to review the positive and negative developments affecting bilateral relations.

The most positive development was the opening of the new Soviet embassy building in Ankara on 29 April 1926, followed by the signing of a protocol relating to the demarcation of the frontier between the two states. Although the talks between Chicherin and Tevfik Rüştü held in Odessa in November 1926 did not lead to a trade agreement immediately, the two men did have useful exchanges of views on LoN membership and the political situation in the Balkans. Following the talks, Chicherin wrote a letter to M. Kemal, assuring him that the USSR would take no action in the Balkans that might damage Turkish interests in that region. After these talks, Turkey declared that it would not accept membership in the LoN unless it received a permanent seat on the council. It was clear that Turkey would not be given a permanent seat, so this declaration was an indication that Turkey would not become a member of the league.

After this, and at the suggestion of the USSR, Turkey was invited to the disarmament conference of the LoN in March 1928. The two countries acted in unison in connection with the Kellogg-Briand Pact and the Litvinov Protocol.

The negative developments in relations can be listed as follows.

- 1. The signing in 1928 of the Treaty of Friendship and Neutrality between Turkey and Italy.
- 2. Turkey's agreement in 1928 with creditor Western countries to settle the Ottoman debts. This agreement embarrassed the Soviet Union, which adamantly refused to repay tsarist Russia's debts.
- 3. The visit of the British Mediterranean fleet to Istanbul on 12 October 1929 and the fleet commander's visit to Ankara, where he was received by M. Kemal.
  - 4. The wholesale arrest of Communists.

It was against this background that the Protocol Extending the Duration of the 1925 Treaty was signed on 17 December 1929 when deputy people's commissar for foreign affairs of the USSR L. M. Karahan visited Ankara. The protocol, which came into effect on 28 July 1930, consisted of three articles and an annexed protocol that was kept secret.

Article 1: "The Treaty of Friendship and Neutrality between the Republic of Turkey and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics concluded in Paris on 17 December 1925 is extended for a term of two years starting on the day of its expiration. However, if one of the Contracting Parties does not give notice of its wish to terminate the Treaty 6 months prior to the expiration of the 2-year term, the Treaty shall be automatically extended for a new term of 1 year."

Article 2: "Each party declares that it has entered into no agreement, other than those made public, with a direct neighbor, by land or sea, of the other party. Each party undertakes not to enter into any negotiation that would lead to a political agreement with states that are direct neighbors, by land or sea, of the other party without informing it and further undertakes not to enter into such agreements without the approval of the other party."

In the secret annexed protocol, the neighbors of Turkey and the USSR were listed, so as to leave no room for doubt.

The neighbors of the Republic of Turkey: Iran, Iraq, Bulgaria, Greece, Italy, the British Empire, and the authority acting on behalf of Syria [meaning France];

The neighbors of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: Iran, Afghanistan, China, Mongolia, Japan, Finland, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Romania, and the British Empire.

The 1929 protocol was seen by some as bringing Turkish foreign policy under the sway of the USSR to a very considerable extent (Soysal, p. 266), based on the need to seek prior approval before concluding an agreement with a neighbor. But it should not be forgotten that the undertaking was reciprocal. Those who held this view also emphasized that during the 1930s Turkish foreign policy was able to shift from its fixation with the USSR and start improving its relations with the Western states.

Another view is that, whereas Turkey lived up to its commitments as provided in the protocol, the USSR failed to consult Turkey when concluding a Mutual Assistance Treaty with France in 1935 or when it entered into alliance talks with Bulgaria in 1940. This view is well founded, because these states were listed among the neighbors. If the USSR had sought Turkish approval in 1935 and 1940, it would have deprived Turkey of any cause for complaint. When Turkey was signing a pact with France and Britain in October 1939, it gave prior notice to the USSR and even sought amendments in the document to secure Soviet consent.

To summarize, it can be said that the 1929 protocol was an indication of how close Turkish-Soviet relations were in the early 1930s.

D. Relations in the First Half $\phi$ f the 1930s

In the 1930s the relations between the two states were based on cooperation. This was in reaction to developments in the international environment. In examining Turkish-Soviet relations, some claimed that Turkish foreign policy had become subservient to the USSR through the 1929 protocol, while others considered that in the 1930s, and especially after Turkey joined the LoN in 1932, a balance had been struck in relations. Such a balance was made possible because of the rivalry between the USSR and the Western states. Turkey's problems with the West were now resolved, and the status-quo powers were seeking to block the possibility of Turkey moving toward the revisionist camp. As regards bilateral relations, they represented neither "dependency" in 1929 nor "balance" in the 1930s. The best characterization of the relations up to the mid-1930s is to describe them as based on "cooperation."

Protocol to Limit Naval Forces

In 1930 minister of foreign affairs Tevfik Rüştü paid a visit to the USSR, which resulted in the joint declaration of 3 October 1930. Subsequently, on 17 March 1931, Ambassador Surits and Tevfik Rüştü signed two protocols in Ankara. These were the Protocol to Limit Naval Strength in the Black Sea and Adjacent Seas and the protocol that extended the 1925 treaty by five years. The first protocol was described as an integral part of the 1929 protocol. It provided that "[e]ach High Contracting Party shall refrain from laying the keel of any warship that would strengthen its navy in the Black Sea and adjacent seas; nor shall it place orders for the construction of such a vessel in foreign shipyards nor take any other measure that would result in raising the present-day strength of its naval forces in these seas without informing the other Contracting Party 6 months in advance."

The protocol related to navies came into effect on 22 July 1931. The protocol extending the 1925 treaty was approved on 30 October 1931 during Litvinov's visit to Turkey.

Prime Minister İsmet Paşa's Visit to the USSR

Prime minister İsmet Paşa visited the USSR from 25 April to 10 May 1932. During this visit he traveled to the cities of Odessa, Moscow, Leningrad, and Kharkov. In his talks with Soviet officials, he took up the following subjects.

- 1. Expansion of cultural cooperation.
- Cooperation in the international arena. Turkey informed the USSR about its Balkan policies and secured Soviet consent to its wish to become a member of the LoN.
- Cooperation among countries with differing political systems.
- 4. The granting of Soviet loans to Turkey. The interest-free loans would amount to $8 million and would be repaid over twenty years with agricultural products. The factories to be built with the loans would be supported with Soviet technology and experts.

This visit is significant because Turkey persuaded the USSR regarding its membership of the LoN. It was after this visit that Turkey joined the league on 18 July 1932, reserving its position with regard to the USSR. In connection with article 16 of the Covenant regulating sanctions, Turkey notified the LoN that it would not participate in the sanctions that might be applied by third states against the USSR if the USSR was not the aggressor.

Some have expressed the view that Turkey's membership in the LoN resulted in the deterioration of bilateral relations with the Soviet Union. This view can be refuted by recalling that Turkey's membership in the LoN was with the consent of the USSR, as Tevfik Rüştü himself pointed out. It should be recalled that when the USSR finally became a member in 1934 the two countries continued their cooperation within the LoN.

The visit is also significant because of the Soviet loan. As Turkey adopted the statist model for its economic development, Soviet experts made a major contribution to the preparation of Turkey's First Five-Year Industrialization Plan. The loan covered a third of the cost of the plan. The protocol for the loan and the technical assistance was signed in Ankara on 21 January 1934. With this support, the Kayseri and Nazilli textile mills were opened in 1934 and 1935. The Soviet loan also served as a precedent for the loans on favorable terms that would be extended to Turkey in the late 1930s by Britain and Germany to earn Ankara's friendship and support.

During the visit Ismet Paşa was at the Kremlin to follow the 1 May celebrations along with the Soviet leadership, a far cry from the low point reached by Turkish-Soviet relations during the Cold War.

A year later, during the celebration of the tenth anniversary of the Turkish Republic, İsmet Paşa's visit would be reciprocated by the USSR. Although not at the level of prime minister, a large Soviet delegation headed by the commissar for defense and the navy, Gen. K. Y. Voroshilov, came to Turkey to underline, once again, the support of the USSR for the new Turkish state.

In September 1934 a meeting between Stalin and Atatürk at Sochi was contemplated. This was of some significance, because Atatürk had never left the country after becoming president. It was envisaged that on the occasion of this visit the 1925 treaty would be extended for ten years. But this visit never took place. The 1925 treaty was extended through a protocol signed on 7 November 1935.

To summarize, the relations between the Turkey and the USSR states in the first half of the 1930s were on the basis of close and friendly cooperation:

- 1. Arrangements regarding navigation in the Straits: in January 1930 the USSR transferred some units of its Baltic Fleet to the Black Sea through the Straits. No prior permission was sought from the Straits Commission for this transfer. Although Romania applied to the commission to express its opposition, it was not able to obtain satisfaction.
- 2. Cooperation in the international arena and within the LoN: at the Geneva Disarmament Conference that met in February 1932, Turkey supported the USSR. Turkey became a party to the agreement on the definition of aggression signed in July 1933, and the Balkan Pact was signed after consultations with the USSR. When the negotiations were in progress in Belgrade in January 1934, the USSR asked for the inclusion of an article in the annexed protocol. This is known as the Litvinov formula. In line with this formula, Turkey signed the Balkan Pact with the following reservation: "The Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs has made the following communication to the Russian Commissar for Foreign Affairs: On behalf of the Republic of Turkey, I have the honor to declare that Turkey shall not participate in any action directed against the Soviet Union."

3. In the economic sphere: as indicated above, the $8 million loan extended by the USSR to Turkey played a major role in Turkish economic development and helped in attracting similar loans from Western states.

III. THE PARTING OF WAYS (1936–1939)

A. The Montreux Conference

In line with changes in the international scene, Turkey started canvassing in the early 1930s to secure the revision of the regime of the Straits set up at Lausanne. The question was raised in an international platform for the first time by the minister of foreign affairs on 23 May 1933 at the Disarmament Conference meeting in London. The question was also raised in the LoN in connection with the reintroduction of conscription by Germany in April 1935 and when the issue of measures to be taken against Italy was being discussed in November 1935. Bilateral talks were also conducted with the USSR and Britain. When Voroshilov came to Ankara in 1933, one of the important agenda items was the regime of the Straits. Before the Montreux Conference the secretary-general of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Numan Menemencioğlu, went to Moscow on 1 May 1936 to exchange views with Soviet officials.

On 11 April 1936 Turkey sent notes to the interested states to inform them of its wish to make changes in the regime of the Straits and invited them to attend a conference to discuss the issue.

Along with the other states, the USSR responded positively to Turkey's invitation on 16 April. The USSR was also unhappy with the regime established at Lausanne and was in favor of revisions being made. At the conference the USSR wanted the Straits to be closed to the warships of non–Black Sea states, while it called for free navigation through the Straits for warships belonging to littoral states. It also supported the Turkish request to refortify the Straits and declared its readiness to provide the necessary arms for this purpose. But this Soviet proposal was not accepted. Eventually, the Straits Convention of Montreux was signed on 22 July 1936.

After the convention was signed, the USSR proposed at the meeting of the General Assembly of the LoN in October 1936 that the USSR and Turkey enter into an alliance. At that time, the USSR's concern was over which country would carry out the fortification of the Straits.

The USSR wanted to be entrusted with the fortification job. It also wanted Turkey to undertake to prevent the passage of a force that might attack the USSR through the Black Sea. Turkey asked the USSR to make a commitment to come to Turkey's assistance in the event of an attack from the Mediterranean with forces commensurate with the level of the attacker's forces. The Soviets refused to make such a commitment and proposed that the question be negotiated in Moscow. At this point Turkey informed Britain about the Soviet proposal. Britain declared that any alliance that would go against Montreux would nullify the convention, while an alliance that complied with the terms of Montreux would be superfluous.

The USSR claimed that the negotiations had failed because of Britain's meddling. On 19 November Litvinov bluntly told ambassador Zekai Apaydın: "It looks like you are awaiting another state's approval and can say nothing in the meantime" (Türkiye Dış Politikasında 50 Yıl, p. 141). This development strained relations. It was not just Britain's advice that was keeping Turkey from concluding an alliance with the USSR. There were also economic reasons. Turkey did not consider such a course to be in its interest without a package of economic aid. İnönü made these remarks: "At present, our economic relations depend on the German market. If these relations were to be destabilized for any reason, we would suffer grievously." Although the idea of a meeting between Atatürk and Stalin was raised once again to relieve the tension, the meeting never took place. Finally, Tevfik Rüştü Aras went to Moscow on 13 July 1937. The agenda included the expansionist policies of Germany and Italy and the situation in the Middle East. The Sadabad Pact had been signed on 8 July. The Turkish delegation was not received well in Moscow; nor was it able to get an audience with Stalin. On 16 July a joint communiqué was issued, which purported to give third states the message that bilateral cooperation was continuing. After Montreux, bilateral relations were no longer that warm.

B. Preparations for War

In the final years of the 1930s Turkey and the USSR, like other countries, were getting ready for the approaching war. This situation affected bilateral relations. With the visit of Minister of Foreign Affairs Saracoğlu to Moscow in September 1939, the relations between the two countries entered a new phase.

Turkey's Preparations

Atatürk gave a warning of the approaching conflict when he declared: "At the end of this war, the conditions of the world and existing balances will be totally transformed. The slightest error on our part could land us in troubles worse than the ones we went through during the period of the armistice [1918–23]" (Aydemir, p. 87). Turkey took the following steps to prepare for the war that seemed inevitable.

1. The first initiative was to secure the revision of the Convention of the Straits at Montreux. This allowed Turkey to ensure the safety of what it considered to be its soft underbelly.

2. In 1937 the sinking of merchant vessels in the Mediterranean by pirate submarines created concern. On 17 and 19 August two Spanish republican ships were torpedoed off the approaches of the Dardanelles. When the Turkish press reported that the ships had been sunk by Soviet submarines, relations became strained. On 10 September 1937 a conference was convened in Nyon, Switzerland, to consider the question of ensuring security in the Mediterranean. The participating countries were Britain, France, Turkey, the USSR, Romania, Bulgaria, Greece, Yugoslavia, and Egypt. The members of the Balkan Pact took an anti-USSR stand at the conference. It ended with a decision to tighten security in the Mediterranean. The idea of Turkey and the USSR jointly patrolling the northern Aegean Sea was not adopted, because it was felt that this might drag Turkey into war with Italy. Atatürk held the view that Turkey would consider it a duty to come to the assistance of Britain and France, while Prime Minister İnönü held that such a course could force Turkey into war and should be avoided. This difference was one of the reasons why İnönü was replaced by Celal Bayar as prime minister.

Turkey sought to insure itself by seeking alliances. Some of these efforts achieved results, while others came to nothing. (a) When Tevfik Rüştü Aras went to Milan in February 1937 to hold talks with Italian leaders, this led to misgivings in the USSR. (b) On 23 June 1939 the joint declaration with France was issued. (c) Following on the cooperation established with Britain at the Montreux Conference, the contract for the fortification of the Straits was awarded to that country, with the job of supervising the construction going to Germany. Britain also received the contract for the construction of the Karabük Iron and Steelworks. After the signing of the Sadabad Pact, Britain extended Turkey a loan in the amount of £3 million. A further British loan of £16 million was extended to Turkey on 27 May 1938. (d) At the end of the 1930s Germany had become Turkey's principal trading partner. In 1938 Germany's loans to Turkey amounted to 87 million TL (at the time the lira was roughly on a par with the dollar).

This sum amounted to 48% of Turkey's total foreign debt stock. On 8 October 1938 Turkey signed an agreement with Germany for a loan of 150 million marks.

4. With the settlement of the Hatay question, another problem dating from Lausanne had been resolved.

The USSR's Preparations

In the USSR under Stalin all opposition had been effectively silenced. In 1936 a new Constitution was adopted, which put into practice the principle of "socialism in a single country." The purges within the party were designed to impose this policy, while the purges in the army were part of the preparations for war. The generals of the Red Army who had carried out the revolution were replaced by a younger generation of energetic officers who could take charge of the battlefield in the approaching war.

After Japan's invasion of Manchuria in 1931, the USSR felt itself under threat from the East and later in the 1930s from the West and took appropriate steps to deal with these threats.

- 1. In 1934 the USSR obtained membership in the LoN.
- 2. At Montreux in 1936 and later at bilateral talks, it sought to revise the security arrangements in the Straits to its advantage. Moscow considered this important to strengthen the security of its southern flank.
- 3. In preparation for war, the USSR reduced the number of its foreign trade offices and consulates. In this context, the Soviets closed their consulates in İzmir and Kars, while Turkey closed its consulates in Odessa, Baku, Yerevan, and Leninakan. The Soviet Union maintained its consulate in İstanbul, while Turkey kept its consulate in Batum.
- 4. Another sign of change in Soviet foreign policy was the replacement of Litvinov, who was Jewish, with V. M. Molotov. This was done to give satisfaction to Germany.
- 5. On 23 August 1939 the USSR signed a Nonaggression Pact with Germany. Soviet attempts to establish cooperation with the Western countries proved fruitless, and through this pact Moscow sought to preempt the Western policy of inciting Germany's fascism to attack the USSR. At the same time, it reached an agreement with Germany for the partition of Poland, thus gaining space and time in case of conflict. The pact also served to alleviate the pressures arising from the feeling of being hemmed in on two fronts.

The Saracoğlu Mission

As World War II got underway, the last high-level contact between Turkey and the USSR occurred during the visit of minister of foreign affairs Şükrü Saracoğlu to Moscow. Saracoğlu arrived in Moscow on 25 September and stayed on for twenty-three days. He held four meetings with his Soviet counterpart, at which the treaty initialed by Turkey, Britain, and France, the Soviet-German rapprochement, and the status of the Straits were discussed at length. The meetings ended with no agreement.

As a result, the initiative undertaken on 15 April 1939 aimed at concluding a Mutual Assistance Pact between Turkey and the Soviet Union ended in failure on 16 October.

This failure did not upset the USSR. Turkey was able to maintain its nonbelligerent status and, according to the Montreux Straits Convention, could exclude the warships of belligerent states when it was not at war.

In 1919 Moscow and Ankara found themselves confronted by a common foe in the form of Western imperialism. These circumstances resulted in a perception of shared destiny, which led the way to cooperation from 1923 on. Starting in 1936, the preparations for war changed the foreign policy priorities of the two countries. Relations deteriorated rapidly after the war.

At this point, it should be emphasized that the deterioration of relations cannot be attributed exclusively to the Soviet demand for bases in the Straits. The USSR had already proposed at Montreux in 1936 a separate arrangement between the two states and in 1939 openly asked for revisions in the Montreux Convention. As will be seen below, the demands of 1945 should be considered a repeat of the 1936 and 1939 demands, but in completely transformed circumstances when the Soviet Union had emerged victorious from the war and held sway over Eastern Europe. The USSR was also acting in line with wartime decisions taken at Yalta with Britain and the U.S. The Soviet demands, coming at a time when the Cold War was in its initial stages, had an extremely negative effect on bilateral relations.

I. RELATIONS AT THE LAUSANNE PEACE CONFERENCE

Shortly after the Turkish army retook İzmir, the Allies met in Paris on 21-22 September 1922 and reappraised the situation. On 23 September a joint note was sent to Mustafa Kemal, in which they proposed a conference to be convened in Venice to discuss the conditions for peace between Turkey on the one hand and the Allies and Greece on the other. The Ankara government had İzmir in mind as the venue for such a conference. The change of government in Britain accelerated the peace process. Prime minister Lloyd George, who had given his unconditional support to Greece during the Anatolian war, resigned and was replaced by Bonar Law. The new foreign secretary, Lord Curzon, was eager to get the peace conference in motion without any delay to satisfy the British public's yearning for peace. As soon as the Mudanya Armistice was signed on 27 October 1922, Britain, France, and Italy handed the Istanbul representative of the TGNA a note verbale, proposing the convening of a peace conference in Lausanne on 13 November.

The proposal was conveyed to the Istanbul government as well. Ankara was as much in need of peace as the Allies were and accepted the offer on 30 September, suggesting Izmir as a venue for ease of communications.

- A. Turkey and Greece on the Eve of Lausanne In the brief consisting of fourteen articles given to the Ankara delegation leaving for Lausanne, the following articles dealt with Greece.
- 1. The islands: the delegation will adopt a position depending on how the negotiations develop. Islands in close proximity to the Turkish coast shall be claimed; and if the claim meets opposition, instructions will be sought from Ankara (paragraph 4).
- 2. The Thracian frontier: the delegation shall strive to obtain the 1914 frontier (paragraph 5).

- 3. Western Thrace: reference shall be made to the National Pact (paragraph 6).
- 4. Minorities: the aim shall be the exchange of minorities (paragraph 9).
- 5. Ottoman debts: debts are to be shared out among the states breaking away from the Ottoman Empire, with reparations to be received from Greece to be set aside for the payment of annuities. If this cannot be obtained, a grace period of twenty years shall be sought (paragraph 10).

On the eve of Lausanne, the political situation in Athens was very different from the situation prevailing in Ankara. As the Greek army evacuated Anatolia, about a million Anatolian Greeks had fled to Greece. This amounted to roughly one-fourth of Greece's population at the time, and there was no strong government to cope with the economic and social turmoil caused by an influx of this magnitude. The Greek military units that sought refuge in the islands of Chios and Lesbos after the disaster of Asia Minor (Mikrasiatiki Katastrofi) had mutinied on 10-23 September under the leadership of a revolutionary committee. The declaration of the revolutionary committee bearing the signature of Stylianos Gonatas reached Athens on 26 September. The declaration called for the abdication of the king and the dissolution of the parliament. King Constantine abdicated in favor of his son on that day, and parliament was dissolved. The revolutionary committee had effectively seized power. After King Constantine left the country on 30 September, a group of sympathizers of Elefterios Venizelos intent on getting rid of monarchist opponents started legal proceedings against those allegedly responsible for the defeat in Anatolia. On 28 November six politicians and officers were found guilty of treason and condemned to death, while another two officers received life sentences. The political scene in Athens had been temporarily purged of monarchists, but the division of Greek society into two camps consisting of monarchists and supporters of Venizelos would continue to destabilize the country for many years.

The revolutionary officers acting on behalf of Venizelos suppressed the opposition and allowed him to take charge of the country's foreign policy. The revolutionary committee sent a cable to Venizelos, who was living in Paris at the time, and asked him to take charge of the Greek delegation at the Lausanne Peace Conference. Venizelos was to represent Greece at Lausanne, along with Dimitrios Kaklamanos. Unlike other delegates, Venizelos had been empowered to discuss and sign any document at his discretion on behalf of Greece. A weak government was thus represented by a strong delegate empowered to 'decide on questions bearing on Greece's future. Having signed the Lausanne documents as the sole authority for Greece, Venizelos was to remain loyal to its spirit and become the architect of the Turkish-Greek rapprochement of the 1930s during his term as prime minister.

B. The Basic Questions at Lausanne and Their Settlement

The Lausanne Peace Conference was inaugurated on 20 November 1922. The Turkish-Greek questions considered at the conference can be grouped under three basic headings: (1) territorial questions and frontiers; (2) humanitarian questions; and (3) financial questions and reparations.

1. Territorial Questions and Frontiers

The territorial questions and frontiers between Turkey and Greece were taken up in the first committee under two parts: Thrace and the northern Aegean islands.

The Frontier in Thrace

When the committee took up the frontier in Thrace at its meeting of 22 November, İsmet Paşa presented Turkey's position regarding Eastern and Western Thrace in two parts.

- (a) The frontier of Eastern Thrace from the Black Sea to the mouth of the Meriç River on the Aegean Sea shall be the line drawn at the İstanbul Treaty of 1913 between Bulgaria and the Ottoman Empire following the Balkan Wars. Consequently, the portion of the İstanbul-Edirne railroad west of the Meriç River consisting of the Kuleliburgaz–Mustafa Paşa section and Karaağaç must remain in Turkey.
- (b) A plebiscite should be held in Western Thrace to determine its future.

Venizelos, with the support of the Allies, put forward the Greek position on these issues.

- (a) The frontier between Greece and Turkey in Thrace shall be the Meriç River.
  - (b) Turkey can have no claim on Western Thrace.

Turkey understood at the outset of the Lausanne Conference that it would not be possible for the Allies to agree to Turkey's views on Western Thrace, which had been lost in 1913. Hence Turkey agreed to the frontier being drawn along the course of the Meriç River, on condition that the frontier region be demilitarized.

Article 2 of the Treaty of Lausanne provided that the frontier between Turkey and Greece would be the course of the Meric River. The convention respecting the Thracian frontier signed at Lausanne stipulated that Turkey's frontiers with Bulgaria and Greece would be demilitarized on both sides of the frontier up to a depth of thirty kilometers. As we shall see below, this arrangement was invalidated in 1938.

Islands of the Northern Aegean Sea

Turkey maintained that the islands were bound to Anatolia and were important from the point of view of Anatolia's security and stability. The islands were divided into two categories by the Turkish delegation.

- (a) Those islands within the territorial waters of Turkey should be under Turkish sovereignty as a matter of legal imperative in addition to considerations of geography and security.
  - (b) As regards the larger islands:
- (i) İmroz (Imbros) and Bozcaada (Tenedos) were left under Turkish sovereignty by the joint note of the major powers dated 14 February 1914. Consequently, there was no need to discuss the status of these islands.
- (ii) Semadirek (Samothrace) should, by right, stay under Turkish sovereignty because of its proximity to the Turkish coast and to the entrance of the Dardanelles.
- (iii) Although the major powers had awarded Limni (Lemnos), Midilli (Lesbos), Sakız (Chios), Sisam (Samos), and Nikarya (Nicaria) to Greece, Turkey could not accept this decision.

Turkey recalled that recent events had proven that a Greece driven by imperialist ambitions could use the islands to threaten Anatolia. Turkey held the view that to ensure peace it was essential that these islands be demilitarized and that their sovereignty not pass to Greece. Instead the islands of the northern Aegean Sea should be made a neutral and independent entity.

In the Greek view, the islands that had been under Greek sovereignty for some time should not be in the same category as the islands whose fate had not been decided by a treaty. Greece held that Turkish sovereignty over these islands, including Imroz and Bozcaada, could not be maintained on the following grounds.

- (a) Most of these islands have populations that are almost exclusively Greek.
- (b) In the last military operation Greece dispatched its troops to İzmir directly from the Greek mainland and did not use the islands as a stepping stone. Consequently, Greek possession of these islands would constitute no direct threat to Anatolia.

Speaking on behalf of the Allies, Lord Curzon replied to Turkey by pointing out that the Cretan precedent showed that autonomy for the islands was not the solution. He proposed that the status of İmroz, Bozcaada, and Samothrace be discussed in conjunction with the question of the Straits and that the question of the demilitarization of the remaining islands be referred to military experts.

At the meeting held on 29 November, the conference considered the report of the military experts. The report included Lemnos among the islands controlling the approaches of the Dardanelles and called for its status to be determined in conjunction with the status of the Straits. The proposal of the military committee to demilitarize the northern Aegean islands was approved.

Articles 12–14 of the Peace Treaty of Lausanne made the following provisions for the northern Aegean islands. Article 12:

The decision taken on the 13th February, 1914, by the Conference of London, in virtue of Articles 5 of the Treaty of London of the 17th—30th May, 1913, and 15 of the Treaty of Athens of the 1st—14th November 1913, which decision was communicated to the Greek Government on the 13th February, 1914, regarding the sovereignty of Greece over the islands of the Eastern Mediterranean, other than the islands of Imbros, Tenedos and Rabbit Islands, particularly the islands of Lemnos, Samothrace, Mytilene, Chios, Samos and Nikaria, is confirmed, subject to the provisions of the present Treaty respecting the islands placed under the sovereignty of Italy which form the subject of Article 15.

Except where a provision to the contrary is contained in the present Treaty, the islands situated at less than three miles from the Asiatic coast remain under Turkish sovereignty.

As a consequence of this article, Lemnos, Samothrace, Mytilene, Chios, Samos, and Nicaria and the lesser islands of the eastern Mediterranean are awarded to Greece. Although the article's language is not very clear, the six islands awarded to Greece are demilitarized by virtue of the provisions of the treaties mentioned in the article. Lemnos and Samothrace are also explicitly demilitarized by virtue of article 4 of the Convention of the Straits.

Article 13 makes a concession to Turkey by explicitly demilitarizing those islands situated in close proximity to the Anatolian coast (Mytilene, Chios, Samos, and Nikaria). This article stipulates:

- (1) No naval base and no fortification will be established in the said islands.
- (2) Greek military aircraft will be forbidden to fly over the territory of the Anatolian coast. Reciprocally, the Turkish Government will forbid their military aircraft to fly over the said islands.
- (3) The Greek military forces in the said islands will be limited to the normal contingent called up for military service, which can be trained on the spot, as well as to a force of gendarmerie and police in proportion to the force of gendarmerie and police existing in the whole of the Greek territory.

As article 13 makes a concession to Turkey, so article 14 does the same for Greece. "The islands of Imbros and Tenedos, remaining under Turkish sovereignty, shall enjoy a special administrative organization composed of local elements and furnishing every guarantee for the native non-Moslem population in so far as concerns local administration and the protection of person and property. The maintenance of order will be assured therein by a police force recruited from amongst the local population by the local administration above provided for and placed under its orders." This article not only exempts the local population from the exchange of populations but, in addition to the exemption enjoyed by the other "established" (établi) persons under the exchange of populations convention of 30 January 1923, provides them with the right to set up their own special administration. İmroz and Bozcaada, along with Lemnos and Samothrace, were demilitarized under article 4 of the Lausanne Straits Convention. This restriction would come to an end for İmroz and Bozcaada in the 1936 Montreux Straits Convention. Greece claimed that this also applied to the demilitarization of Lemnos and Samothrace.

In the course of the deliberations, a proposal was made to appoint an LoN official to oversee the implementation of article 14, but Turkey rejected this proposal.

The local administration foreseen for the islands never materialized.

2. Humanitarian Questions

The humanitarian questions between Turkey and Greece at Lausanne were related to the exchange of populations and the patriarchate.

a. The Exchange of Populations

The Turkish delegation went to Lausanne with the intention of securing the acceptance of the Turkish nation-state by the international community. It had binding instructions to conduct its negotiations with the objective of obtaining an exchange of populations that would involve the Orthodox Greeks of Turkey and the Muslims of Greece.

During the retreat of the Greek armed forces from Anatolia and Thrace, around 1 million ethnic Greeks had already migrated to Greece; but there still remained an important Greek presence in İstanbul, then under Allied control. The Turkish delegation wanted to involve as many people as possible in the exchange in order to prevent a recurrence of the foreign meddling that went on throughout the nineteenth century and also because a homogeneous population was considered essential for a nation-state. Greece was under the heavy burden of serious economic and social problems, however, as it struggled to cope with a million displaced persons. Therefore Greece sought to restrict the exchange, to avoid having to cope with the extra economic, social, and political burdens that would be imposed on it by a new wave of mostly better-off people from the Greek bourgeoisie of Istanbul. It also wanted to avoid having to abandon for good a city that over the centuries had been regarded as the ideological and cultural center of Hellenism.

The Turkish delegation was uneasy about the possible reaction of the Allies to its wish to see an all-inclusive exchange, but the question was raised unexpectedly by the Allies themselves at the meeting of the first committee held on 1 December 1922, when the question of the repatriation of prisoners of war was being discussed. At that meeting Lord Curzon invited Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, the LoN's expert on refugee questions in the Middle East, to take the floor. Dr. Nansen started by depicting the difficult conditions of the refugees and recommended that a solution be found through an agreement between the two countries to relieve the burden on their economies. He explained that once the legal situation of these people had been clarified, they could be resettled quickly. This was essential for them to be able to sow their fields so that they could become productive and self-sufficient by the following year. He concluded by noting that his contacts with the two governments had revealed that both were in favor of an exchange of populations.

Dr. Nansen's views came as a surprise to the Turkish delegates, who were delighted with his recommendations. The Turks had come with strict instructions and were uneasy about how the Allies would react to their stance. When they heard the Allied position as expressed by Dr. Nansen, Rıza Nur exclaimed: "This is a godsend!" After Dr. Nansen, İsmet Paşa took the floor and demanded that the exchange be compulsory and include all of the ethnic Greeks, including those of İzmir and İstanbul. The goal, though it went unmentioned, was to create an independent, homogeneous Turkish nation-state that could engage in active nation building. The biggest impediment to achieving this objective was the presence of the ethnic Greeks, the largest Christian community in the country. If the objective of drastically reducing their numbers could be achieved, the justification—or pretext—for interfering in the country's internal affairs would be removed, and Greek irredentists would be blocked from carrying out their designs.

Venizelos agreed to the question being considered by a subcommittee. His position was that the exchange should be on a voluntary basis and should exclude the Greeks of Istanbul. As a matter of fact, Greece needed such an exchange as much as Turkey did. It had been forced to admit 1 million refugees and needed empty land to resettle these people. After the exchange, there would be enough homes and farms vacated by the departing ethnic Turks to allow relatively painless resettlement. His reasons for insisting on the exchange being carried out on a voluntary basis and not including İstanbul's Greeks were obvious. (a) A new wave of refugees would pose additional problems for the Greek economy. Venizelos indicated that Greece could not bear the additional burden and would be forced to ask the U.S. to increase the immigration quota for Greece. This was a veiled threat directed at the U.S. (b) It would be a tremendous disappointment to the Greek nation, nurtured for years with the dreams of the Megali Idea, to see the Greeks of İstanbul departing from their ancestral homes. (c) If Istanbul lost its ethnic Greek population, the patriarchate would be left without its flock; this would force it to move, creating all sorts of conflicts with the national Greek Orthodox Church.

Speaking on behalf of the Allies, Lord Curzon declared that the only way to end the question of minorities in the Near East was to accept the principle of compulsory exchange of populations but that further consideration of the special circumstances of the Muslims of Western Thrace and the ethnic Greeks of İstanbul would be necessary. He added that the commerce of the Western countries would be seriously disrupted if the İstanbul Greeks were forced to leave, which would also have negative effects on Turkey's economy.

Eventually it was decided to establish a subcommittee to consider the exchange of interned civilians and prisoners of war as well as the exchange of populations. As a result of the deliberations at the subcommittee, agreements were reached on both questions. The documents were signed on 30 January 1923, six months before the Lausanne Treaty itself was signed.

The Agreement between Greece and Turkey respecting the Reciprocal Restitution of Interned Civilians and the Exchange of Prisoners of War

During the deliberations at the subcommittee the Turkish delegation declared that the Greek army carried away 4,000 civilian Turks as it retreated from Anatolia, whereas the Turkish side had no civilian Greeks under detention. The Turkish delegation wanted these civilians to be released and repatriated right away. Turkey's delegation asked for the immediate return by Greece of all Turkish prisoners of war. It added that Greek prisoners of war held by Turkey might be repatriated before the conclusion of a peace treaty, provided Greece demonstrated its goodwill. The Greek side's main objection was to Turkey's claim that it held no Greek civilian detainees. Greece alleged that Turkey was holding civilian Greek citizens in the interior of Anatolia.

After long discussions an understanding was reached, and the Agreement between Greece and Turkey Respecting the Reciprocal Restitution of Interned Civilians and the Exchange of Prisoners of War was signed. To contribute to the spirit of reconciliation, both governments undertook to declare an amnesty for all civilians and prisoners of war in their custody without regard to any crime they might have committed.

The Convention concerning the Exchange of Greek and Turkish Populations

The question of the exchange of populations was the subject of protracted negotiations in the subcommittee. There were three principal contentious issues relating to the following questions: (1) Will the exchange be compulsory or voluntary? (2) Which groups will it include? (3) What are the outer limits of the city of Istanbul?

Turkey wanted the exchange to be on a compulsory basis, while Greece favored a voluntary exchange. The principle of a compulsory exchange was adopted when the Allies, and in particular Lord Curzon, gave their support to this option.

The second question was who would be included in the exchange. The Turkish delegation wanted it to include all of the Muslims in Greece except the Muslims of Western Thrace, plus all the ethnic Greeks residing in Turkey, including those in Istanbul. The Turks pointed out that it would not be possible to resettle the Muslims coming from Greece unless the Istanbul Greeks were included in the exchange.

The Greek delegation noted that it would not be economically or socially feasible for Greece to accommodate the Greeks from Istanbul because it had already received close to a million refugees, so it wanted this group exempted from the exchange. The Allies also wanted to exempt the ethnic Greeks of Istanbul, with whom they had direct commercial links. After some tough negotiations, the Turkish delegation agreed that the Greek inhabitants of Istanbul would not be included in the exchange but set the following conditions:

- 1. All ethnic Greeks who are not Turkish nationals or those who are but were not born in İstanbul are to be included in the exchange.
- 2. Members of Greek associations and organizations that displayed hostility to Turkey over the last three years are to leave for Greece.
- 3. The privileges to be granted to the İstanbul Greeks will be applicable only to the Greeks of the Beyoğlu, inner İstanbul, and Üsküdar districts.
- 4. The Ecumenical Patriarchate is to be removed from İstanbul, with all of its councils and subsidiary organs.

During the negotiations at the subcommittee Greece accepted the second condition, and Turkey did not insist on the other conditions except the last one. As a result, the Greeks of Istanbul who had Greek nationality were also not included in the exchange. Agreement was reached in the subcommittee on all the questions except the one relating to the fate of the patriarchate, which was referred to the first committee. This question is examined below.

On the question of the limits of the city of Istanbul, Turkey wanted a restrictive approach and proposed Erenköy (a suburb of Istanbul) as the limit, while Greece wanted to extend the limits all the way to Izmit. Eventually the limits set by the Municipality Law of 1912 were accepted as a compromise.

Because of the pressing nature of this question, the Convention and Protocol concerning the Exchange of Greek and Turkish Populations was signed on 30 January 1923 without waiting for the negotiations on the peace treaty to be concluded.

Article 1 of the convention reads as follows:

As from the 1st May, 1923, there shall take place a compulsory exchange of Turkish nationals of the Greek Orthodox religion established in Turkish territory, and of Greek nationals of the Moslem religion established in Greek territory.

These persons shall not return to live in Turkey or Greece respectively without the authorization of the Turkish Government or of the Greek Government respectively.

Article 2 contains the exceptions to the rule established in article 1:

The following persons shall not be included in the exchange provided for in Article 1:

- a) The Greek inhabitants of İstanbul.
- b) The Moslem inhabitants of Western Thrace.

Article 2 also describes the Greek inhabitants of İstanbul (the established [établi]) and the Muslims of Western Thrace:

All Greeks who were already established before the 30th October, 1918, within the areas under the Prefecture of the City of İstanbul, as defined by the law of 1912, shall be considered as Greek inhabitants of İstanbul.

All Moslems established in the region to the east of the frontier line laid down in 1913 by the Treaty of Bucharest shall be considered as Moslem inhabitants of Western Thrace.

By this arrangement, a balance was being struck between Turkey and Greece with respect to minorities.

The convention provided in article 5 that the rights of property and monetary assets of the people who would be subject to the exchange would not be prejudiced. Article 8 provided that the emigrants were free to take with them all of their private movable property as well as the movable property belonging to their communities without paying any export or import duty or any tax. Articles 9 to 14 made the following provisions with regard to property left behind. Movable property left behind, as well as immovable property, would be evaluated and liquidated by a Mixed Commission. The proceeds of the sale would, in principle, be owed by the government of the country where the property was located to the government of the country that received the emigrants, and the emigrant would receive property corresponding to the property left behind when migrating. Should one of the governments remain with outstanding debts after the final liquidation of all the properties, this debt would be settled in cash. Should the debtor government make a request for a post-ponement, provision was made for this to be granted under certain conditions.

According to article 1 of the convention, the criterion for the exchange of populations was the religion of the individual. In this arrangement, Catholic and Protestant Greeks were exempted from the exchange while the Turkish-speaking Orthodox people of central Anatolia (the Karamanlı) were forced to relocate. There were no religious qualifications for the Greeks of İstanbul, so all the established Greeks, whatever their religion or nationality, were allowed to stay. The Turks agreed to this under pressure from the Allies, who wanted to see a maximum number of Greeks remaining in İstanbul.

Turkish nationalists wanted a nation-state consisting exclusively of Muslims and accepted the İstanbul Greeks as the exception. In this sense, it accepted as its criterion the Ottoman "millet system." Greece was striving to convey the impression to its people that its links with the center of the Megali Idea remained, by securing the exemption of the largest possible number of Istanbul Greeks from the exchange of populations. The minorities that remained in both countries found their numbers drastically reduced. Their rights would be guaranteed by articles 37 to 45 of the Peace Treaty of Lausanne.

The implementation of the exchange convention was not as easy as establishing its rules. As we shall see, it was a harrowing experience for many of those involved in the exchange. It created many economic and social problems in both countries. But most of all its implementation created misunderstandings, leading to serious political questions and tensions between Turkey and Greece. The question had to be referred through the LoN to the Permanent Court of International Justice and was finally settled only in 1930 through a treaty concluded by the two states (Box 2-9).

b. The Question of the Patriarchate

On its way to Lausanne the Ankara delegation had received no directive whatsoever concerning the patriarchate. The question of the patriarchate was introduced by the Turkish delegate Dr. Rıza Nur at the subcommittee on exchange of populations on 16 December. In a written statement he expressed the Turkish view that the patriarchate had to leave Turkey. This was a necessity for

Box 2-9. Different Types of International Agreement

In international practice, documents reflecting an accord between two or more states are given different names. The name does not affect the binding character of the document, however. Although a hierarchy exists between a treaty and the implementation agreements or protocols relating to that treaty, there is no hierarchy among the other types of documents.

The most frequently used form is a treaty. A treaty reflects an accord of wills and denotes a document that requires ratification from the point of view of domestic legislation. An agreement is a relatively less important document that requires fewer official formalities. Although international organizations can also conclude treaties, it is usual to refer to their accords as agreements. A convention is an important multilateral document that establishes rules. A charter is a multilateral treaty that relates to basic rules of international relations, the basic document of an international organization, an international document that is not legally binding, or a document that lays down the basic principles of an idea. A protocol is an agreement of limited scope that supplements a treaty, while a final act is the document that emanates from a congress or a conference. A statute is a document that determines the working rules and conditions of an international organ. Treaties that establish military organizations or are military in nature are referred to as pacts. A document that refers a dispute to the International Court of Justice is a special agreement or compromis.

Turkey, but it would also be a relief for the members of the minority community. By separating the caliphate and the state and establishing a democratic order, the Turkish government had also put an end to the privileges of the non-Muslim communities that the Ottoman Empire had recognized. From now on, the relations between the state and the charitable, educational, and social institutions of the minorities would be conducted directly, without intermediaries. Clerics, including the person at the top of the hierarchy, must henceforth confine their activities to spiritual matters. The patriarchate, which had always been a political institution, would no longer enjoy political privileges. Since all the institutions that had formerly been organically linked to the patriarchate had ceased to exist, the patriarchate had lost its raison d'être.

These views, as expounded by Riza Nur, met with sharp objections from the Allies, who stressed the universal character of the patriarchate and its importance to Christendom. France proposed that the patriarchate remain in Istanbul on condition that it sever all administrative and political links with the other autocephalous Orthodox churches as well as with the future Istanbul church, that the patriarch be selected from among candidates approved by the Turkish government and that in his capacity as the leader of the Orthodox his authority be confined to spiritual matters, and finally that the Turkish government supervise his activities to make sure that they were indeed confined to spiritual matters. The French proposal was rejected by Greece.

Riza Nur had introduced the subject of the patriarchate as a negotiating tactic and, as he wrote in his memoirs, felt that it would be better if this institution was under the control of the Turkish government. The Turkish delegation was under strong pressure to accept the principle that members of minorities be exempt from military service. and the Turkish delegation took advantage of the issue of the patriarchate to gain room for maneuver. The question of removing a venerable and historic institution like the patriarchate from İstanbul created consternation among Christians around the world. Lord Curzon's assistant, Harold Nicholson, approached Rıza Nur and asked him not to press this issue. Riza Nur responded by pointing out that he would have to offer Ankara something tangible for allowing the patriarchate to remain in Istanbul. In the course of these negotiations Nicholson indicated that Lord Curzon would not insist on exemption from military service for members of minorities. In this way the fate of the patriarchate was settled in informal consultations before the first committee met on 10 January. The patriarchate would be able to remain in Istanbul as a strictly spiritual institution, stripped of all its political rights and responsibilities.

When the question of the patriarchate was taken up at the first committee, Lord Curzon declared that the removal of the patriarchate from Istanbul would deeply wound the civilized world and repeated the proposal to keep the institution at its historic seat as a strictly religious entity devoid of its political character and without its administrative responsibilities. Venizelos supported Lord Curzon's proposal and declared that Greece was ready to facilitate the early retirement of the incumbent. İsmet Paşa then indicated Turkey's readiness to take back its proposal to evict the patriarchate from Istanbul on the understanding that it would conform to the conditions and limitations agreed upon at the negotiations. The patriarchate would remain in Istanbul as an exclusively religious institution. İsmet Paşa's declaration regarding the future of the patriarchate was considered sufficient, and no formal provisions were inserted in the Peace Treaty of Lausanne. The status of the institution would be regulated by Turkish domestic law.

At the time of the ratification of the peace treaty in the TGNA, deputies expressed their displeasure that the patriarchate had been allowed to remain in İstanbul. They criticized the lack of provisions in the treaty regarding the patriarchate on the grounds that this would make it difficult to take appropriate measures if patriarchs got involved in political activities once again. In his reply to this criticism, Riza Nur explained that a patriarchate relocated at Mount Athos would be constantly engaged in anti-Turkish activities, whereas an institution in Istanbul, stripped of all of its temporal powers, would be under the full control of Turkey. But the question of the patriarchate would not end at Lausanne. As we shall see below, it would continue to be a source of tension in Turkish-Greek relations until 1925.

Financial Questions (The Question of Reparation)

The question of reparation came up at the second stage of the Lausanne Conference. The Allies and Greece proposed a mutual renunciation of all reparation claims by the two countries. The Turkish reply to this proposal was that Turkey owed Greece no reparation because it had not inflicted any damage to that country, whereas Greece had devastated parts of Anatolia and had to pay compensation. Turkey proposed that the two countries try to settle this question in direct negotiations and that the matter be referred to arbitration if they failed to reach an agreement. Turkey knew that the state of the Greek economy did not allow for reparation payments, and it did not want the conclusion of a peace treaty held up because of this. In the course of the negotiations Turkey indicated its willingness to give up all claims for compensation in return for Karaağaç, a territory that had been awarded to Greece. The railroad linking Turkey to Europe passed through this territory. Given the dire state of its economy, Greece readily accepted this proposal, and the question of reparation was settled on these terms.

Article 59 of the Peace Treaty of Lausanne declares that "Greece recognizes her obligation to make reparation for the damage caused in Anatolia by the acts of the Greek army or administration which were contrary to the laws of war. On the other hand, Turkey, in consideration of the financial situation of Greece resulting from the prolongation of the war and from its consequences, finally renounces all claims for reparation against the Greek Government."

Instrument number 15, signed on the same day as the peace treaty, provided for the return of the territory of Karaağaç to Turkey. This instrument was the "Protocol relating to the Karagatch territory and to the islands of Imbros and Tenedos signed by the British Empire, France, Italy, Japan, Greece and Turkey on the 24th July, 1923."

Although the fundamental questions between Turkey and Greece were settled at Lausanne, this did not signify that problems between the two countries disappeared for good. The implementation of the agreements reached at Lausanne was creating new disputes between the two countries struggling with postwar political, economic, and social questions and was preventing a climate of friendship and trust from replacing the hostility that had reigned between them for years. It would take until 1930 to resolve all the problems and establish relations based on friendship between the two states.

II. THE PERIOD OF TENSION (1923–1928)

The Peace Treaty of Lausanne heralded a new era in Turkish-Greek relations. Turkey had won the right to independence and to establish its nation-state by force of arms, and this right was now being recognized by the international community and confirmed by international law. In a sense, Lausanne was the founding charter of the new state. For Greece, the migration of the ethnic Greeks from Anatolia signaled the end of the Megali Idea as an objective of foreign policy. After this, both nations would engage in efforts to restore their economic and social lives after long years of war and seek to achieve political stability.

A. Turkey and Greece in the 1920s

In the 1920s Turkey carried out political and social reforms while seeking to develop economically by creating a national bourgeoisie. This process started with the establishment of the Republic. The impoverished population was quick to oppose this process, and this opposition found its expression in the Progressive Republican Party (Terakkiperver Cumhuriyetçi Fırkası). The Sheikh Said uprising soon after the establishment of an opposition party forced Ankara to resort to repressive measures.

The efforts to create a national bourgeoisie increased the pressure on the non-Muslims who controlled most of the commerce in Istanbul. These pressures were felt especially by the ethnic Greeks. Law No. 788 (dated 18 March 1926), regulating the conditions for public service, decreed that "only Turks" could be employed as public servants without specifying citizenship. This provision was later amended by article 48 of Law No. 657 (dated 14 July 1965), currently in force, which declared that "only Turkish citizens" could be employed in the civil service. Law No. 788 not only closed the civil service to non-Muslims but also made it more difficult for ethnic Greek lawyers, doctors, and so forth to exercise their professions or to become members of professional associations (Alexandris 1983, pp. 105–12 and 131–35). Furthermore, while Turkish firms were supported with loans on easy terms, firms owned by ethnic Greeks were confronted with bureaucratic obstacles. These firms were compelled to hire Muslim employees. Law No. 805 (dated 22 April 1926) regarding the use of the Turkish language by commercial institutions required all firms to conduct their transactions and correspondence within Turkey in Turkish as well as keep their books in Turkish. The process of Turkification reached its peak with Law No. 2007 (dated 11 June 1932): the "Law reserving certain trades and services in Turkey to Turkish citizens." This law allowed only Turkish nationals to practice certain trades (such as salespersons, veterinarians, and many others). During this period the schools, associations, and libraries of ethnic Greeks were subjected to strict controls. These pressures were supplemented with popular campaigns exhorting everyone to speak Turkish. Article 14 of the Lausanne Treaty relating to Gökçeada and Bozcaada (Imbros and Tenedos) was never implemented. Furthermore, in 1927 Law No. 1151 was enacted, preventing the ethnic Greek inhabitants of these islands from being educated in their native language.

During this period Greece suffered from even worse problems and instability. About 1.2 million ethnic Greeks had migrated from Anatolia, including about 1 million who fled with the retreating Greek army. In his book İngiliz Belgeleri İle Sakarya'dan İzmir'e 1921–22 (From Sakarya to Izmir in British Documents 1921–22), Bilal Şimşir (1989, p. 381) estimates the number of Greeks fleeing with the Greek army at less than 500,000, of which 150,000 were Greeks who had moved to Anatolia from Greece and Russia after 1919. The generally held view, however, is that the number of people who left with the retreating Greek army approached 1 million. In any case, the arrival of 1.2 million migrants from Anatolia and the exodus of 400,000 Muslim farmers to Turkey created all kinds of short-term economic and social problems, including unemployment, a drop in agricultural production, and the spread of malaria and other contagious diseases as well as the difficulties of integrating 50,000 Turkish-speaking Orthodox newcomers. These problems also led to increased crime and the spread of mafia-type crime organizations. The negative short-term effects of the movement of populations brought political instability that was to last until 1928. But the long-term effects were highly positive: development of handicrafts (including rug weaving), introduction of new crops and farming methods, and-because those arriving from Anatolia were more bourgeois than the local Greeks-enrichment of the cultural life of cities and development of commerce. Unions and leftist movements also developed.

The struggle between the military and civilians as well as between monarchists and republicans led to weak governments until 1928. Coups and counter-coups succeeded one another, leading to repeated changes in the regime. When the monarchists boycotted the balloting in the election of 16 December 1923, republicans from different parties obtained a majority in parliament. A coup by monarchists was forestalled, and the king was sent into exile. In January Venizelos formed a government with the support of Gen. Theodoros Pangalos, but the strong opposition of Panagis Tsaldaris forced him to resign, ostensibly for health reasons, after which he left for France. This ushered in the period of governments with military backing. A Republic was proclaimed on 25 March 1924 with the support of the army. When the new regime failed to end domestic turmoil, Pangalos carried out a coup in 1926. The Pangalos regime failed to deal effectively with the country's political and economic problems. It was also repressive and collapsed seven months after coming to power. The election that took place that year ushered in a period of coalition governments. The political instability lasted until 1928, when Venizelos returned home and took power. The governments of the day were lacking in popular support and therefore weak. They were engaged in sterile bickering and incapable of coping with the economic and social problems. Nor were they capable of handling the country's pressing foreign policy questions. The thorny issues in Turkish-Greek relations that came up at this juncture would be settled by the strong government of Venizelos.

The economic and political turmoil of the 1920s also affected the Muslim population of Western Thrace. At the end of the war the ethnic Greeks of Eastern Thrace abandoned their homes and moved across the border to Western Thrace, where, with the support of the Greek government, they took possession of the homes, farms, and livestock of the local Muslims. The rights granted by the Treaty of Lausanne remained on paper. The Muslims of Western Thrace were being forced to give up their properties and migrate to Turkey. Although their status of being established in Western Thrace exempted them from the compulsory exchange of populations, the number of Muslims in Western Thrace significantly diminished immediately after Lausanne. The Greek law regarding the election of muftis and grand muftis (which had been enacted in 1920 in conformity with the 1913 Athens Agreement) went unimplemented, and the Muslim inhabitants of Western Thrace were prevented from electing their religious leaders.

The internal problems of Turkey and Greece in the 1920s and the continuous disputes between the two countries led them to pursue illiberal policies toward their respective minorities. The minorities would not feel relatively comfortable until the 1930s, when bilateral problems would finally be resolved.

B. The Aftermath of Lausanne

1. The Question of the Established (Établi)

In accordance with the Convention and Protocol concerning the Exchange of Greek and Turkish Populations signed at Lausanne on 30 January 1923, the Orthodox Greek citizens in Turkey and the Muslim citizens in Greece were to be exchanged. The convention stipulated that the Greeks of İstanbul and the Muslims of Western *Thrace would be considered established and therefore exempt from the exchange. The Mixed Commission foreseen in the convention to carry out the exchange started functioning in October 1923. The exchange was carried out with many difficulties and completed in 1927. Although several problems arose, the most serious was the question of which of the ethnic Greeks of İstanbul would be considered established. As noted earlier, article 2 of the convention provided that "[a]ll Greeks who were already established before the 30th October, 1918, within the areas under the Prefecture of the City of İstanbul, as defined by the law of 1912, shall be considered as Greek inhabitants of İstanbul."

Once the exchange got underway, it became apparent that Turkey and Greece interpreted this article in different ways. Turkey believed that only Greeks who could prove with official Turkish documents that they had settled in Istanbul prior to 1918 could be considered established, whereas Greece held that the article must be interpreted according to the spirit and intent of the treaty. In other words, those Greeks who had come to Istanbul with the intention of settling there should be considered established without having to seek any justification based on a law.

Although the dispute appeared to be based on legal considerations, the disagreement had economic and social roots. Turkey wanted to send as many Orthodox Greeks as possible to Greece and thereby establish a homogeneous nation-state. This would also facilitate the settlement of the Muslims coming from Greece in the properties left behind by the evacuees. Greece, however, wanted as many Greeks as possible to remain in Istanbul in order to reduce the number of migrants it had to accommodate. It also wanted to preserve its links with Istanbul, especially in the field of commerce, and to soften the impact of having to give up the Megali Idea. There were about 4,500 Greeks in Istanbul who were not officially registered as established. If the Turkish interpretation prevailed, they would be obliged to move to Greece.

The Mixed Commission took up the question, but no solution was found. So the matter was referred to the Secretariat of the LoN on 19 November 1924. The secretariat was asked for an advisory opinion on the question of under what conditions "the Greek inhabitants of Constantinople" would be considered "established" as provided in article 2 of the convention.

The question went to the Permanent Court of International Justice, which delivered its opinion on 21 February. (1) The term "established" implies a permanence and involves an actual residing in a certain place. (2) "The Greek inhabitants of Constantinople" can be considered established and therefore exempt from the exchange if they are living within the areas under the Prefecture of the City of Constantinople, as defined by the law of 1912, and if they moved there, for whatever reason, prior to 30 October 1918 with the intention of residing there on a permanent basis.

This opinion of the court was unable to resolve the dispute between the two parties legally, and both states stiffened their positions on the issue. The Greeks expropriated the properties of the Muslims of Western Thrace and settled Greek migrants in these properties. Turkey retaliated immediately by expropriating Greek Orthodox properties in Istanbul. Greece subsequently returned some Turkish properties, and the Turkish government followed suit. When the dispute over the patriarchate erupted and compounded the dispute over the established, bilateral relations became even more tense. Although the first steps toward a solution were taken in 1925, the full settlement would come only in 1930.

2. The Question of the Patriarchate

When the issue of the future of the patriarchate was taken up at the Lausanne Peace Conference, Venizelos promised İsmet Paşa both at the negotiations in the first committee and in private conversations that Greece would do everything possible to remove Patriarch Melitos. Melitos had been elected patriarch on 6 December 1921. During the armistice period he supported the clerics who made the decision to sever all links with the Ottoman government; and after assuming the position of patriarch, he openly declared that he did not recognize the Turkish government. He supported the Venizelos policies of establishing a state in Asia Minor under the sovereignty of Greece. It was out of the question for this person to remain as patriarch in the Turkey that was established after Lausanne.

Box 2-10. The Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Phanar and Ecumenicism

The first church of Istanbul (Byzantium) was established in the year 37 by Saint Andreas as a bishopric attached to the Metropolitan of Heraclea. When Constantine the Great made Byzantium a capital in 330, the church there became a separate archbishopric with the title of "Archbishopric of New Rome and Constantinople." A Holy Synod with four to twenty members whose responsibilities included electing the archbishop administered it.

Seven ecumenical councils were convened at different dates to preserve the unity of the doctrines of Christianity and determine the administrative regions. They are referred to as ecumenical because all Christians accepted their decisions. The literal meaning of the word "ecumenical" is the entire inhabited world. After the Seventh Council, held in 787, the Orthodox and Catholic Churches split and started convening separate councils.

At the Fourth Council, held in Chalcedon in 451, the Church of Constantinople was raised to a patriarchate. The system known as Pentarchy (five-headedness) was adopted: Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem were declared the historic centers of Christianity. Rome and Constantinople became equals in the hierarchy. The Asian, Pontic, and Thracian regions came under the authority of Constantinople. Constantinople was also granted the authority to establish bishoprics in "barbarian" regions.

When Constantinople was conquered by the Ottomans in 1453, Sultan Mehmet handed Patriarch Gennadios an Imperial edict (ferman) granting the patriarchate various privileges and awarded him the title of milletbasi, meaning head of nation. In the Ottoman millet system, the patriarch was recognized as the head of the Orthodox faithful. Whereas the patriarch was just a religious leader under the Byzantine Empire, he now also became a temporal leader of his millet along with the other milletbasis. The patriarch's authority was now significantly enhanced. He would be directly accountable to the sultan for the activities of his flock. This was the reason why Patriarch Grigorius V was executed in 1821 when the Greeks revolted for their independence in Morea, even though he took a stand against independence and excommunicated the rebels.

When nationalism started gaining ground in the nineteenth century and new nation-states emerged, their churches also acquired a national character and broke away from the Patriarchate of Phanar. Among these were the Patriarchates of Serbia, Bulgaria, and Romania as well as the Greek Church. Despite these defections, the Patriarchate of Phanar has preserved its status as first among its peers (primus Inter pares) in the Orthodox world.

By the ordinance of 1862 the rights of the Patriarchate of Phanar in the spiritual, political, and administrative spheres were consolidated in one document. At Lausanne, Ankara allowed the patriarchate to remain in Turkey on condition that its powers would be confined to the spiritual sphere only, with no temporal powers or duties. This meant that its political and administrative rights under the ordinance of 1862 were abolished. It can be assumed, however, that the religious and spiritual provisions of the ordinance continue to apply to this day.

At present the following churches come under the authority of the Patriarchate of Phanar: the churches of Crete, the Dodecanese Islands, Neoi Chorol (literally, "riew lands" or the lands that came under Greek sovereignty after 1912), and Mount Athos and Patmos in Greece plus North and South America, the non-Orthodox European countries, Australia, New Zealand, the Ukrainian Church of Canada, and the Metropolitanate of Hong Kong. In addition, the churches of the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Finland, and Estonia are autonomous churches, but in their dealings with sister churches they depend on the patriarchate.

(M. FIRAT)

Even before the Lausanne Treaty was signed, Venizelos approached Patriarch Melitos informally and asked him to resign to spare the reputation of the patriarchate. Melitos was unable to stand up against the pressure of the Greek government. He left Fener (Phanar) on 27 June 1923, citing reasons of health, and went to the Monastery of Mount Athos without, however, resigning as patriarch. For some time he actively sought the transfer of the patriarchate to Cyprus, Salonika, or Mount Athos but failed to get his way and finally resigned on 12 October 1923 (Box 2-10).

When Melitos resigned, the question of the election of a new patriarch arose. The Turkish government was taking a close interest in the matter and did not want to see a development that it would consider to be against its interests. Until Melitos resigned, Papa Eftim had the support of the Turkish government (see Box 1-21 in Section 1). Papa Eftim was seeking to establish his control over the patriarchate. He was actively trying to get Damianos Damianidis, who came from Karaman, elected patriarch. To this end, Papa Eftim was seeking to bring the Holy Synod under his influence. The Turkish government withdrew its support from Papa Eftim, however, when the Christian world reacted adversely to this interference and on 13 December approved the election of Grigorius Zervudakis, who had opposed the patriarchate's stand during the armistice period and who had retired to his own diocese of Kadıköy.

When the Turkish government's relations with the patriarchate were normalized and the support for Papa Eftim was withdrawn, he cut off his relations with the patriarchate on 6 June 1924 and a month later declared his Kafaitani Church at Galata to be the Turkish Orthodox Church. This was an autonomous church, which the Patriarchate of Phanar refused to recognize. Given the inflexible nature of Orthodox principles, it was clear that the Turkish Orthodox Church would remain a very small community. The Turkish government declared its neutrality by taking the stand that this was an internal matter of the Orthodox community. This allowed Papa Eftim to continue his activities within his own church while making possible a normalization of the government's relations with the patriarchate.

The Turkish government demonstrated its neutrality upon the death of Patriarch Grigorios on 16 November 1924. Papa Eftim made one last attempt to get himself elected patriarch by pressuring the Holy Synod but received no support whatsoever from the Turkish government, and his bid failed.

Although Papa Eftim was now out of the picture, the election of a new patriarch caused further complications in Turkish-Greek relations, which were already strained because of the population exchange. The cleric elected patriarch on 17 December 1924 was Konstantinos VI (Arapoğlu), who was born in Bursa. He came to İstanbul in 1921, returned to Bursa, and came once again to Istanbul in 1924 as bishop of Terkos. It would be unthinkable for Ankara to agree to the election of a patriarch who belonged to the category of those to be exchanged at a time when the question of the established was at its height. Ankara not only opposed his election to the position of patriarch but also asked the Mixed Commission to speed up the procedures for his exchange. Greece, in contrast, held the view that because the patriarchate had to be considered established, it would be inappropriate to include Konstantinos VI, who was linked to the patriarchate, among those to be exchanged.

After considering the question, the Mixed Commission agreed that Konstantinos had come to İstanbul after 1918 but declared that it was not competent to decide whether, as patriarch, he should be exempt from the exchange. Greece then called for the question to be referred to the LoN and the Permanent Court of International Justice. Turkey claimed that these bodies were not competent to consider this question because the patriarchate was a Turkish institution. To demonstrate that it would not tolerate any meddling in Turkey's internal affairs, Ankara took a tough stand and on 30 January 1925 ordered the deportation of Konstantinos VI. Georgios Exindaris, the Greek member of the Mixed Commission, then quit his post. Konstantinos VI submitted a personal memorandum to the Council of the LoN, which recommended that the problem be resolved through bilateral talks. The Turkish government maintained its position on Konstantinos VI but retracted its demand to the Mixed Commission for the exchange of the other bishops on 11 April. After this concession, Konstantinos VI resigned as patriarch on 22 May 1925, and Vasileos Georgadis was elected patriarch on 13 July.

The question of the patriarchate that revolved around the person of Konstantinos VI had two important consequences. (1) It demonstrated that the Turkish government did not recognize the ecumenical status of the patriarchate, that it regarded this body as a Turkish institution, and that it would not allow foreign powers to interfere in Turkey's internal affairs using religion as a pretext. (2) The tension in Turkish-Greek relations caused by the implementation of the exchange of populations was defused through the talks between Tevfik Rüştü and Exindaris seeking to find a solution to the Konstantinos VI crisis. As a result of the reduction in tension, the two countries signed the Ankara Treaty of 1925.

C. The 1925 Ankara and 1926 Athens Treaties

The bilateral talks that got underway in 1925 were a first step toward resolving the outstanding questions between the two countries, including the question of who would be considered established, the properties of those being exchanged, and the status of the patriarchate. The Sheikh Said uprising of 1925 was perceived by Ankara as a serious threat and led to a change in government. İsmet Paşa took over as prime minister from Fethi Bey [Okyar]. İsmet Paşa was determined to resolve the outstanding questions left over from Lausanne and bring to an end Turkey's international isolation. He was also determined to carry out economic and social reforms at home. The government of Andreas Michalakopoulos was facing similar economic and social problems in Greece and also wanted to settle outstanding questions with its Balkan neighbors. It was against this background that the bilateral talks led to the signing of the Treaty of Ankara on 21 June 1925.

The treaty dealt with the financial and legal questions arising from the population exchange. By this treaty, Turkey recognized as "established" all of the Greeks (even if they were not Orthodox or Turkish nationals) residing in İstanbul since 30 October 1918 without regard to whether they actually intended to settle in İstanbul or not. In addition, the Muslims established in Western Thrace and the ethnic Greeks established in İstanbul who had left their country were free to return to their homes and repossess their properties. This did not apply to those who had left their countries without valid passports. If these people were unable to repossess their properties, they would be entitled to fair compensation. By this accord, Turkey found the way to prevent the return of those Greeks who had left the country in wartime without valid passports, while Greece was being freed of the burden of returning lands belonging to Muslims in Western Thrace that had been allocated to Greek refugees from Turkey.

Although the Ankara Treaty appeared to resolve fundamental disputes between the two countries, it was never implemented. It did, however, help in improving relations and led Ankara to appoint an ambassador to Athens. One reason for this nonimplementation was that the Mixed Commission objected to some of the clauses of the treaty. But the principal reason was that the Michalakopoulos government was overthrown and a dictatorship was established on 25 June 1925 by Gen. Theodoros Pangalos, who abandoned the previous government's conciliatory line and espoused a foreign policy bent on revising Lausanne. Pangalos had been encouraged by Mussolini's call for cooperation and the knowledge that London would not oppose Greece at a time when Britain was in confrontation with Turkey over Mosul. Pangalos delayed the ratification of the Ankara Treaty and bragged that the Greek army was the strongest in the Balkans. He was also working on military plans connected with Thrace and İstanbul. Italy's cautious policy of not signing a military pact with Greece and the resolution of the Mosul question prevented Pangalos from engaging in a military adventure against Turkey. When Pangalos was overthrown in August 1926, Greece was able to return to its policy of repairing relations with Turkey.

The dialogue that had been broken off was resumed. This resulted in the signing of the Athens Treaty on 1 December 1926, which came into effect on 23 June 1927. The treaty was designed to settle outstanding financial questions. Under its terms, all immovable properties located in regions subject to the population exchange belonging to Muslims and all Turkish nationals who left the country before 18 October 1912 (the date when the Balkan War broke out) or who resided outside Greece would become the property of the Greek government. Buildings and plots located in urban areas, groves, forests, and summer pasturage would be excluded from this expropriation. By the same token, the immovable properties located in regions subject to the population exchange belonging to ethnic Greeks or Greek nationals who left Turkey before 18 October 1912 or resided outside Turkey permanently would become the property of the Turkish government. The respective overall value of these expropriated properties would be calculated, and the difference between the two amounts would be settled with a cash payment.

The treaty also provided that the immovable properties of Greeks and Muslims in those localities such as Istanbul and Western Thrace that were exempt from the exchange of populations would be returned to their owners within one month of the coming into effect of the treaty.

The implementation of the Athens Treaty gave rise to new questions of a technical nature. The estimates of the value of the properties located in the two countries differed. In addition, both governments were dragging their feet in returning to their owners the properties located in Istanbul and Western Thrace. Unlike the Ankara Treaty, the Athens Treaty did not contain a provision describing those who were to be considered established. These questions would only be settled in the 1930s, when the domestic scene in the two countries and the international situation would be substantially altered.

III. THE PERIOD OF FRIENDSHIP (1928–1939)

In 1928 important changes took place in both Turkey and Greece. Ankara had focused its attention on settling all questions affecting its relations with Western countries. The last of these questions concerned debts to France and was settled with a treaty. With these questions out of the way, the government could now embark on a peaceful, pro-status quo foreign policy, especially in the Balkans, where it played a leading role. Across the Aegean, Venizelos emerged as the winner in the election in August 1928. He was able to establish a majority government that brought to an end the long-lasting instability reigning in Greece. He could now direct his attention to foreign relations. His foreign policy differed markedly from the foreign policy of the early 1920s. The irredentist policies had now been abandoned, and the goal had become to settle outstanding bilateral questions with neighbors in a peaceful and pro-status quo spirit. Both Ankara and Athens were keenly aware of the growing threat from the revisionist camp led by Italy. Security concerns caused by mutual mistrust were compelling them to increase defense spending in particular for naval forces, placing an additional burden on their economies. They knew that only a peaceful foreign policy would enable them to deal with their nations' pressing need to develop economically and to carry out social reforms. They depended on one another's support to carry out their peaceful foreign policy in the face of Italian and Bulgarian revisionism. There were still unsettled questions between the two countries, however, and it would take some time to deal with them. The rapprochement between Ankara and Athens followed a strange course, and it was Italy that set this process in motion.

France had increased its influence in the Balkans by establishing the Little Entente with Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Romania. To counter this, Italy concluded pacts with Romania and Albania in 1926. It now wanted to extend its influence in the Balkans by signing similar agreements with Turkey and Greece directed against Yugoslavia. To achieve this end, Italy toned down its menacing rhetoric and succeeded in signing two agreements with Ankara on 30 May 1928. These were the Treaty of Neutrality, Conciliation, and Adjudication and the Convention on the Demarcation of the Frontier between the Island of Meis (Megisti) and the Anatolian Coast. At the signing ceremony Italian officials reiterated that Italy had no ambitions in Anatolia and that Rome valued Turkey's friendship and the economic advantages it provided.

The Turkish-Italian agreements had repercussions in Greece. Venizelos brought to a conclusion the negotiations that had been underway with Rome, and on 23 September 1928 Greece too signed a Treaty of Neutrality, Conciliation, and Adjudication with Italy. This treaty was similar in content to the treaty signed by Ankara and Rome earlier that year. This initiated the rapprochement between Ankara and Athens. Italy had a role in this rapprochement because it wanted a Balkan Pact under its leadership. To this end, Rome was in close contact with both Ankara and Athens and was seeking to reconcile the differences between the two nations.

Mustafa Kemal and Venizelos were aware that the rapprochement with Italy was not durable and decided to develop their bilateral relations. The first positive step came from Greece. Venizelos included in his government's program the intention to improve relations with Turkey as a basic foreign policy objective. On 30 August 1928 Venizelos wrote a letter to İsmet Paşa in which he declared that the Greeks were persuaded that Turkey had no territorial designs on Greece and, likewise, Greece had no territorial claims on Turkey. He also expressed Greece's sincere desire to settle all outstanding questions with Turkey. This letter made a positive impression in Ankara. On 13 September 1928 İsmet Paşa delivered a speech in Malatya in which he stated that the disputes between the two countries were not political but legal in nature. They related to the property rights of their nationals. These were important questions but were capable of being overcome with mutual goodwill. After this speech İsmet Paşa also wrote a letter of reply to Venizelos in which he emphasized that the letter from Venizelos had ushered in a new era of close friendship in Turkish-Greek relations.

In December 1928 the bilateral talks relating to questions resulting from the population exchange were resumed. The Greek ambassador who arrived in Ankara in July 1929, Spiridon Polikroniadis, had been instructed by Venizelos to develop relations further and reach an agreement. In 1929 the Turkish ambassador in Athens, Mehmet Enis [Akaygen], attended the celebration of the Greek National Day for the first time. This rapprochement between Turkey and Greece culminated in the 1930 agreements.

A. The 1930 Agreements

It was necessary to settle the legal questions arising from the exchange of populations in order to establish friendly political relations between Turkey and Greece. At the talks undertaken in December 1928, this was the first question taken up and led to the signing in Ankara on 10 June 1930 of the Convention on the Final Settlement of the Questions Arising from the Implementation of the Convention concerning the Exchange of Populations Signed at Lausanne on 30 January 1923 and the Athens Treaty of 1 December 1926.

1. The Ankara Convention of 10 June 1930

The political and economic questions between Turkey and Greece arising from the exchange of populations were settled through the Ankara Convention of 10 June 1930. As a first step, it specified who would be considered established. Article 10 stated that "Turkey considers as established all Orthodox Greeks of Turkish nationality who now happen to live in the region of Istanbul, which is exempt from the exchange, without regard to the date of their arrival in Istanbul or the place of their birth." Similarly, article 14 stipulated that "Greece recognizes as established all Muslims of Greek nationality who now live in the region of Western Thrace, which is exempt from the exchange, without regard to the date of their arrival in Western Thrace or the place of their birth."

In addition to this political question, other questions of an economic nature arising from the exchange were also settled. The convention contains clauses regulating the properties of the following five categories.

- 1. The properties of the exchanged: the movable and immovable properties left behind by the Muslims and Greeks subject to the exchange would be taken over by the governments of the country where the properties were located. Funds in bank accounts would be returned to their owners.
- 2. The properties of Turkish nationals: the immovable properties in Greece of Muslims of Turkish nationality would become the property of the Greek government.
- 3. The properties of Greek nationals: all immovable properties of Greek nationals located outside İstanbul would become the property of the Turkish government. This convention did not affect the ownership of immovable properties of Greek nationals located in İstanbul. If these properties had been seized, sequestrated, or taken over by squatters, this condition would be reversed within one month and the properties would be returned to their owners free of any restriction on their use.

- 4. The properties of those established in Istanbul: the convention did not affect the movable and immovable properties in Istanbul of the Greeks considered to be established in the city. If any seizure or sequestration of these properties had taken place, the measure would be reversed immediately and the property in question would be returned to the owner free of any restriction on its use. Movable and immovable properties located outside Istanbul would be taken over by the Turkish government.
- 5. The properties of those established in Western Thrace: the convention did not affect the movable and immovable properties in Western Thrace of the Muslims considered to be established in Western Thrace. If any seizure or sequestration of these properties had taken place, the measure would be reversed immediately and the property in question would be returned to the owner free of any restriction on its use. Movable and immovable properties located outside Western Thrace would be taken over by the Greek government.

According to the convention, the Greek government was to place £425,000 at the disposal of the Mixed Commission. Of this sum, £150,000 would be used to compensate the established Greeks whose properties outside Istanbul were taken over by the Turkish government. The same sum would be used to compensate the established Muslims whose properties had been taken over by the Greek government. The Mixed Commission would hand over the remaining £125,000 to the Turkish government in three installments.

The Convention of 10 June 1930 helped settle the political, economic, and social questions between the two countries and inaugurated a new era of rapprochement. Greece's Prime Minister Venizelos paid a visit to Turkey from 27 October to 1 November. He was received warmly in Ankara, where he signed three agreements. For the first time, a period of friendship was inaugurated between Greece and Turkey. Seven years after their conflict, they were now embarked on political, economic, and military cooperation. In this atmosphere of cordiality and good will, Ankara raised no objections to a visit by the Greek prime minister to the patriarchate. In so doing, Ankara was conveying the message to all concerned that its problems with the patriarchate had been resolved.

2. The Agreements of 30 October 1930

On the occasion of the Venizelos visit to Ankara on 30 October, three agreements on political, military, and economic cooperation were signed: (1) the Treaty of Friendship, Neutrality, Conciliation, and Arbitration; (2) the Protocol on Limiting Navies; and (3) the Treaty on Residence, Commerce, and Navigation.

Article 1 of the Treaty of Friendship, Neutrality, Conciliation, and Arbitration provided that "the parties mutually undertake not to enter into any political or economic agreement or arrangement directed against one of the parties." Article 2 stipulated that "if one of the parties finds itself under attack by one or more states despite its peaceful position, the other party undertakes to maintain its neutrality throughout the duration of the conflict." There were also provisions regarding the manner of settling disputes between the parties. If disputes could not be settled through normal diplomatic channels, the parties would resort to conciliation (articles 8 to 19); and if this failed, they would resort to adjudication or arbitration (articles 20 to 23).

The arms race between Greece and Turkey at the time when their differences remained unsettled had imposed a heavy financial burden on both countries as they struggled to overcome the effects of the war on their economies. After the economic crisis of 1929 both Ankara and Athens were ready to divert military funds to economic development. The Protocol on Limiting Navies was designed to prevent an arms race between the naval forces of the two countries. The protocol contained the following provision: "To prevent an unnecessary escalation in the expenditures for naval armaments and bearing in mind the special circumstances of the two sides, the high contracting parties intend to limit their forces reciprocally while maintaining parity as they advance in this direction...and, to this end, commit themselves not to place orders for or purchase or construct any warship or arms without giving the other party six months' notice."

The Treaty of Residence, Commerce, and Navigation was signed for economic reasons. Under article 1 of this treaty, the nationals of the parties would be able to enter the territory of the other party, reside and settle there, and travel within the country and leave without any restriction other than having to respect law and order and comply with the regulations governing foreign nationals. Where such regulations existed, the parties would enjoy most-favored-nation benefits.

This treaty also granted the nationals of one of the parties the right to own land in the other party's territory (article 3), the right to engage in commercial activities (article 4), the right to establish companies and factories (article 5), the right to engage in foreign trade (articles 10–24), the right to engage in maritime transport (articles 25–33), and the right to bequeath property (article 33).

When engaged in such activities, nationals of the other contracting party would be taxed at the same rate as the local inhabitants and would receive equal treatment with local inhabitants when they dealt with the courts or when they became subject to a judicial investigation. In the event of any restriction or prohibition on import and export activities or limitation of the freedom to engage in commerce, the parties agreed to grant most-favored-nation treatment to one another. The only exception to this rule would be in cases involving public order, cases concerning the country's defense or public health, or where there was a need to control the import of military equipment.

This treaty, which introduced free circulation of individuals forty years before post–World War II European integration, had two basic objectives. First, the 1929 economic crisis had led to a slump in economic and commercial activities. It was hoped that the economy might be revived through the creation of an Aegean free trade area. Second, the exchange of populations and the exodus of the ethnic Greeks had created a serious shortage of skilled workers in Turkey while aggravating unemployment in Greece. Through this treaty, Turkey was seeking to recover part of its lost workforce while Greece was trying to alleviate its unemployment problem. After the signature of the treaty, the unemployed started heading for İstanbul and other localities in Turkey for the purpose of settling there. Although exact figures are unavailable, their numbers are not thought to have been very large.

The real beneficiaries of the freedoms provided by the treaty were the İstanbul residents of Greek nationality who were considered established in 1923, who numbered 26,431 according to the 1927 census. The treaty was important because it provided them with a solid legal status.

Despite this legal status, as a result of the 1932 law by which certain trades and services were reserved for Turkish nationals (referred to above), about 9,000 Greek nationals in the established category lost their jobs and migrated to Greece after 1934. The number of Greek nationals dwindled from 26,431 in 1927 to 17,642 in 1935 (Aktar, p. 11). When the 1930 treaty was denounced by Turkey in 1964 following the events in Cyprus, the remainder of the Greek nationals, together with some Istanbul Greeks of Turkish nationality, found themselves forced to leave Istanbul.

3. Turkish-Greek Relations at Their Zenith: The Cordial Agreement of 1933

After the 1930 agreements, the two countries came closer in the political, economic, and military spheres. On 5 October 1931 prime minister İsmet Paşa and minister of foreign affairs Tevfik Rüştü [Aras] paid an official visit to Athens, returning the Turkish visit by Venizelos the previous year. The warm reception received by the Turkish guests in Athens conveyed a meaningful message to the public of the Balkan countries and beyond. In 1932 Venizelos resigned as prime minister when his policies failed to produce the expected political and economic results. But this setback did not affect the good relations between the two states. These relations were now based on a solid foundation and did not depend on any particular individual.

On 14 September 1933 prime ministers İsmet Paşa and Panagis Tsaldaris signed in Ankara the Cordial Agreement between Turkey and Greece. This ten-year agreement was designed to ward off any threat that might come from revisionist Bulgaria. Article 1 provided that the contracting parties would reciprocally guarantee their common border against any attack. Article 2 declared that it was in the common interest of the contracting parties to enter into prior consultations with one another on all international questions concerning them. Article 3 provided that at all international meetings with limited participation the representative of one of the contracting parties would have the duty and the competence to speak for the particular and common interests of both countries.

In addition to this agreement designed to secure cooperation in military and security matters, two barter agreements were signed on 22 December 1933 and 10 November 1934 to strengthen cooperation in the economic and trade fields. A Turkish-Greek Trade Bureau was established in İstanbul in May 1934. The friendship between the two countries attained a new high level when Venizelos nominated Atatürk for the Nobel Peace Prize in 1934. The Turkish-Greek rapprochement also had its effect in the Balkans with the signing of the Balkan Entente Pact in 1934.

B. The Balkan Entente

After World War I, there was general agreement that peace could best be secured through collective security arrangements, and the LoN was conceived to achieve this end. It was felt that the LoN by itself would not be enough, however, and should be supplemented with regional arrangements. This way of thinking was especially prevalent in the Balkans because the countries dissatisfied with the postwar arrangements (namely, Germany, Italy, and Bulgaria) were all focused on the Balkan region. The Locarno Treaties had made arrangements to secure the frontiers of Germany's western neighbors, but its eastern neighbors were not included. This gave rise to concern in the Balkans over the possibility that by containing Germany only in the west Britain and France were perhaps indifferent to Germany's eastward expansion. The pro-status quo Balkan states were also concerned about Italy's growing interest in their region. As a result of this perceived threat, the rapprochement between Turkey and Greece led to initiatives to broaden this bilateral cooperation to include the other nonrevisionist Balkan states.

The Establishment of the Balkan Entente

A number of statesmen had spoken about the desirability of cooperation among the Balkan states to ensure peace and strengthen collective security in the region. The first step in this direction, however, was taken at the Twenty-seventh Universal Peace Congress organized in Athens on 6–10 October 1929 by the International Peace Bureau. At this congress the former prime minister of Greece, Alexandros Papanastasiou, proposed the setting up of a Balkan Union Institute that would deal with questions among Balkan countries and consider subjects relating to their common interests. The proposal received a positive response, and the participating Balkan states decided to hold a series of informal conferences.

The first Balkan Conference was held in Athens on 5 October 1930, with the participation of Albania, Bulgaria, Greece, Romania, Turkey, and Yugoslavia. At the conference the political differences among the participating countries remained in the background, which allowed the following decisions to be made. (1) An annual meeting of ministers of foreign affairs of the Balkan states would be held. (2) Preparations would be made to conclude a Balkan Pact that would outlaw war, secure the peaceful resolution of disputes, and provide for joint action to assist a member country that came under attack. (3) By bringing the Balkan nations closer together in the economic, social, cultural, and political fields, the ground would be prepared to establish a permanent organization with the goal of setting up a Balkan Union. Despite these decisions, it immediately became apparent that it would be impossible to reconcile the positions of the participants on political questions such as the status of minorities and Italy's Balkan policies.

The second Balkan Conference met in Istanbul on 20–26 October 1931. The conference focused on economic, technical, and cultural cooperation in order to draw the pro–status quo and revisionist Balkan states closer together. The future alignment of the Balkan states had already taken shape, however. After settling their disputes, Turkey and Greece were acting in unison and making strenuous efforts to achieve a Balkan Pact. Bulgaria, which was showing signs of following a revisionist course, and Albania, which was under Italian influence, were cool toward the idea. Romania and Yugoslavia were members of the Little Entente and, as such, were not overly enthusiastic about a Balkan Union to ensure their security.

The third Balkan Conference met in Bucharest on 23–26 October 1932. When the question of minorities came up for discussion, Bulgaria realized that its views would not be reflected in the decisions to be adopted and withdrew from the conference. The remaining five Balkan states established a number of committees of experts and decided to set up a Balkan Chamber of Commerce and Industry, a Balkan Labor Bureau, a Balkan Postal Union, and a customs union. They also discussed measures for supporting cultural exchanges.

Turkey was of the view that a Balkan Pact without Bulgaria would be incapable of ensuring peace and collective security. İsmet Paşa and Tevfik Rüştü went to Sofia on 20 September 1933 to try to persuade Bulgaria to join the pact. In the course of this visit the Treaty of Neutrality, Conciliation, and Arbitration signed in 1929 between Turkey and Bulgaria was extended for five years. But Bulgaria rejected Ankara's proposal to sign an Agreement of Cordiality similar to the one concluded between Ankara and Athens.

At the fourth Balkan Conference, held in Salonika on 5–11 November 1933, the Balkan states had already made up their minds to proceed without Bulgaria and took up the subject of the Balkan Pact. The communiqué adopted at the end of the meeting expressed the hope that all Balkan states would participate. The door had been left open for Bulgaria to join the pact.

Despite the negative stance taken by Bulgaria and Italy, the foreign ministers of Turkey, Greece, Yugoslavia, and Romania met in Belgrade in February 1934. At this meeting they approved the Balkan Entente Pact, which was signed in Athens on 9 February 1934.

Most scholars believe that the Balkan Entente Pact was conceived to secure cooperation among the Balkan states in order to ward off a possible Italian attack. They come to this conclusion in the light of Turkey's perception of the Italian threat during the 1930s. Although Turkey may well also have had Italy in mind, a careful reading of the text and its attached protocol reveals that the threat that was in everyone's mind was Bulgarian rather than Italian, even if the text was carefully drafted not to cause offense to Bulgaria.

The Balkan Entente Pact

The Balkan Entente Pact consists of a preamble and three articles. The preamble declares that the parties are determined to preserve and ensure the territorial status quo in the Balkans. Article 1 states that "Turkey, Yugoslavia, Greece, and Romania mutually guarantee all of their borders in the Balkans." Article 2 declares that "the parties undertake to consult one another on measures to deal with possible threats to their interests indicated in the present treaty. They also undertake not to take any political action against any Balkan state that has not signed the present pact without notifying one another in advance and not to assume any political obligation vis-à-vis any Balkan country without the approval of the other parties." Article 3 regulates the coming into force of the pact and confirms that all Balkan states may accede to it.

The pact cannot be properly assessed without examining the annexed protocol, which is an integral part. Article 2 of the protocol declares that the pact is not directed against any state but also adds that the pact aims to ensure all Balkan frontiers against a possible attack originating from a Balkan state. Consequently, if a signatory's frontier not located in the Balkans comes under attack or if the attack originates from outside the Balkans, the pact will not become operative. This article clearly demonstrates that the pact was signed with a possible Bulgarian attack in mind. Article 3 reiterates this: "if one of the high contracting parties comes under attack from a non-Balkan state and if a Balkan state joins the attack at any time, the provisions of the Balkan Pact will become fully applicable to this Balkan state." Finally, article 7 declares that this is a defense pact; if one of the parties should be the aggressor, the commitments made under the pact will cease to be binding.

Both Turkey and Greece signed the Balkan Entente Pact with a reservation. Turkey declared that it would not be involved in any action directed against the USSR. When it ratified the pact, Greece declared that the objective of the pact was to repel an attack emanating from a Balkan state and that, consequently, it would not get involved in hostilities with a major power in compliance with the pact. In this way Greece confirmed that the pact could not be invoked against Italy and that it was conceived only against a Bulgarian attack. Greece was making sure that Italy took no offense.

On 2 November 1934, a short while after the Balkan Entente Pact was signed, the parties adopted the status of the Balkan Entente Organization. This established a Council of Ministers, consisting of the ministers of foreign affairs of the four signatories, which would meet on a regular basis twice a year and, when necessary, in special session to deal with specific issues. In addition, there was to be an Economic Council and a Special Committee charged with harmonizing legislation.

For a considerable time the four members of the Balkan Entente were able to establish common positions in response to international developments. On the eve of World War II, however, the inability of the pact to provide adequate security in response to the Balkan policies of the major powers forced the member states to resort to bilateral accords. The members also succeeded in signing an agreement with Bulgaria to enhance security and build understanding. On 31 July 1938 the president of the Council of Ministers, Ioannis Metaxas, signed a treaty on behalf of the Balkan Entente. This treaty abrogated the convention respecting the Thracian frontier signed at Lausanne on 24 July 1923 and brought to an end the demilitarized status of the border regions in Thrace.

The last meeting of the Council of Ministers of the Balkan Entente was held in February 1940, when World War II had already broken out. The council was unable to meet again after that, with Yugoslavia and Greece under German/Italian occupation and Romania in the Axis camp. The Balkan Entente had come to an end in the upheaval of war in 1941. After the war, there was an attempt to resuscitate Balkan cooperation, but it was far from being aimed at reviving the Balkan Entente.

c. Relations on the Eve of World War II

Turkey and Greece established the Balkan Entente by extending their friendly relations to the entire Balkan region in order to check revisionism. They failed to obtain the accession of Albania and Bulgaria, however. For this reason and the other reasons mentioned above, the Balkan Entente was not able to ensure the security of the Balkan region. Because they felt threatened, Turkey and Greece continued to build up their bilateral cooperation after 1934, especially in the military field.

When Turkey sent a note on 11 April 1936 to the signatories of the Lausanne Straits Convention and informed them that it wanted a new arrangement for the Straits, it had already obtained Greece's support. In his speech delivered at the TGNA on 31 July 1936, soon after the signing of the Montreux Straits Convention, minister of foreign affairs Tevfik Rüştü Aras said:

[N]ow that the Montreux Convention has been signed, the islands of Lemnos and Samothrace, belonging to our neighbor and friend Greece, will no longer be under a demilitarized status as required by the Lausanne Convention. This is a source of gratification for us. In this connection, I would like to draw attention to a feature of Turkey's new policy. What we consider beneficial to us, we also consider beneficial to our friends, and what we consider unacceptable to us, we likewise consider unacceptable to our friends. Indeed not just to our friends but to all states. (TBMM Zabit Ceridesi, vol. 12, Devre V, 81. İnikad, 31.7.1936, p. 310, quoted in Pazarcı, pp. 49–50)

With these words, he was giving a measure of the warm feelings and friendship between Turkey and Greece.

These words, which seemed so natural during a period of intense friendship, would subsequently be used by Greece to support its case when differences arose with Turkey over the demilitarization of the islands.

The change of regime that occurred on 4 August 1936 in Greece had no effect on Turkish-Greek relations. The political instability affecting Greece following the defeat of Venizelos in 1932 was brought to an end by General Metaxas, who took power and established a dictatorship. In its domestic policies, his "Fourth of August" regime took Italy and Germany as its model, but in foreign policy it pursued a pro-status quo line. Although Metaxas was determined to avoid getting involved in war, he was also aware that an armed conflagration in Europe was bound to spread to Greece. He therefore undertook to expand the military dimension of Greece's cooperation with Turkey. In January 1937 Bulgaria signed a Treaty of Friendship with Yugoslavia. In 1938 the Balkan Entente signed a treaty with Bulgaria to end the demilitarized status of the Thracian frontier regions. These events created problems within the Balkan Entente and heightened Greek concerns. The waning of the spirit of solidarity within the Balkan Entente had the effect of strengthening Turkish-Greek solidarity.

On 26 May 1937 Prime Minister İnönü paid a visit to Greece. On the occasion of this visit Atatürk sent a personal message to Metaxas in which he spoke of the lasting character of Turkish-Greek friendship and alliance and added: "The frontiers of the Balkan Allied States constitute one single frontier. Those who threaten this frontier shall meet with the burning rays of the sun. I advise them to beware" (Ayın Tarihi 42 [1–31 May 1937]: 226).

This warning was directed at Italy and Bulgaria. In October 1937 Metaxas came to Ankara on a return visit. At the same time, the military leaders were exchanging visits and holding talks. Marshal Fevzi Çakmak and Gen. Alexandros Papagos were exchanging views, and this process led to the signing of a military pact on 27 April 1938. The full title of this document was Additional Treaty to the 1930 Treaty of Friendship, Neutrality, Conciliation, and Arbitration and the 1933 Cordiality Pact between Turkey and Greece.

Article 1 provided that "in the event that one of the parties finds itself under attack by a state or states through no fault of its own, the other party undertakes to maintain its neutrality by preventing, if necessary by force of arms, its territory from being used by the aggressor or aggressors to transport soldiers, arms, or military equipment, to procure food, animals, etc., to transport retreating troops, or to carry out military reconnaissance." It would also make an effort to reach a peaceful solution (article 2). The  $parties\,under took\,\'{}^*to\,prevent\,individuals\,and\,groups\,bent$ on harming the welfare and security of the other country or changing its government from getting established on their territory. Furthermore, they undertake to deny residence rights on their territories to individuals and groups intending to fight against the other party, whether by propaganda or any other means" (article 3). The treaty confirmed the validity of previously signed accords between the two sides. Although the treaty was concluded to meet Greek concerns, in reality it addressed Turkey's security concerns over threats coming from the west, since a threat from the east was unlikely. In other words, because there was no country that would attack Greece from the east by overrunning Turkey, the treaty brought Greece no practi-

In the years preceding World War II, Turkey and Greece were engaged in political, economic, and military cooperation based on a legal framework of treaties. This was not just due to the perceived threat coming from Bulgaria, Italy, or the southern Slavs. The convergence of the two countries was also due to the feeling of having overcome their political differences and economic problems as well as the similarity of their political systems. Their rapprochement was not confined to the political and military fields but also had a cultural dimension. In 1937 a Greek sculptor named Athinaios made a bust of Atatürk and presented it to Turkey. The municipality of Salonika purchased the house where Atatürk was born and gave it to the Turkish state. The universities of both countries introduced courses in one another's culture and language. The outbreak of war and its spread to the Balkans brought this cooperation to an end. Greece, attacked by Italy and subsequently overrun by Germany, took part in the war. Turkey made maximum profit of the prevailing conditions to stay out of the conflict. The war prevented direct cooperation, and Turkey was only able to provide indirect assistance to Greece.

D. The Results of the Friendship

The friendship between Turkey and Greece during the 1930s helped to improve the condition of the minorities in both countries. As a result of this friendship, Greece was also able to take measures relating to its territory that had lasting effects.

In the 1930s there was a perceptible improvement in Turkey's treatment of the Greek-speaking minority living in İstanbul and the Aegean islands of Gökçeada and Bozcaada. The same can be said about Greece's treatment of the Muslim minority in Western Thrace. During these years Turkey withdrew its support for Papa Eftim, the patriarchate's rival. Turkey ceased to interfere in the election of patriarchs and allowed Greeks paying official visits to Ankara to call on the patriarch in Istanbul. Greeks schools and associations were allowed greater leeway in their operations, and some of the restrictive measures applied to school textbooks and teachers were relaxed. Greece acted in the same spirit and deported the individuals opposed to the Ankara regime who had been allowed to implant themselves in Western Thrace in the 1920s. Among these were the last Sheikh-ul-Islam, Mustafa Sabri, and others who were part of the 150 opponents of the regime who had been exiled from Turkey in 1923. The Muslim schools of Western Thrace dropped the Arabic script and switched to the Latin alphabet, following Turkey's example. It became easier for these schools to obtain textbooks and teachers from Turkey. As usual, the two countries' treatment of their respective minorities was directly related to the ups and downs of their bilateral relations.

In the atmosphere of friendship prevailing in the 1930s, Greece took unilateral measures to extend its territorial limits in the Aegean. This was to create long-term problems for Turkey. One year after the signing of the 1930 agreements with Turkey and one month before Ismet Paşa and Tevfik Rüştü went to Athens, Greece extended its airspace from three to ten miles beyond its coastline. This unilateral measure was taken on 6 September 1931. On 17 September 1936, a few weeks after Metaxas visited Ankara, Greece extended its territorial waters from three to six miles. In the cordial atmosphere of the time, Turkey did not object to these moves. In fact, as noted earlier, Minister of Foreign Affairs Aras made a reference to Greece's right to remilitarize the islands lying off the mouth of the Dardanelles following the conclusion of the Montreux Straits Convention. These Greek moves would later haunt Turkey in the changed circumstances after World War II when Turkish-Greek relations turned sour.

I. RELATIONS WITH IRAN

During this period Turkish-Iranian relations were marked by a border dispute. At the same time, the regimes of both countries had many common features. Once the border dispute had been set aside in 1932, bilateral relations went through a "golden age" until the outbreak of World War II. The climax of this unique relationship came in 1937 with the signing of the Sadabad Pact.

A. Iran's Adoption of the Kemalist Regime as Its Model

Just as Mustafa Kemal Paşa laid the foundation of a new regime in Turkey in April 1920, so too Reza Khan, the Iranian minister of defense, established a new regime in Iran in February 1921 (Box 2-11). The two regimes shared similar objectives: creating modern and fully independent nation-states based on Western norms and institutions. They shared an ideology based on nationalism rather than religion. Their internal adversaries were the traditional economic classes, while their principal external adversary was Britain. These similarities allowed the two states to look upon one another with sympathy and understanding.

For historical, social, and economic reasons, the obstacles in Reza Khan's path were greater than those confronting M. Kemal. The reforms carried out by M. Kemal provided psychological backing for Reza Khan, who was seeking to emulate Turkey in his efforts to reform his country. For Reza Khan, M. Kemal's Turkey served as a model to which Iran could readily relate.

When Turkey, the role model, established a republican form of government, this event had significant reverberations in Iran. Tehran's following the same course became a hot topic of discussion in Iranian circles. The Turkish press was also dwelling on the positive aspects of such a move. Turkey's ambassador in Tehran, Muhiddin Paşa, was received by Reza Khan on a number of occasions and urged him to opt for a republic. Reza Khan

Box 2-11. Iran (1923-1941)

Reza Khari came from a peasant family from the province of Fars. He became prime minister in 1923 and two years later overthrew the Qajar dynasty and became the sovereign. He adopted the name of an ancient Persian tribe, Pahlavi, as the name of his dynasty. By doing so he demonstrated his nationalistic leanings. After establishing an army loyal to himself and securing the backing of the merchants (bazaaris) and large landowners. Reza Shah sought to establish an independent, modern nation-state through reforms on the Turkish model.

At home Reza Shah tried to constrain the social and economic power of the mullahs, while pursuing a policy of Persianization. In foreign affairs he strove to get rid of the capitulations and follow a policy of balancing British and Soviet influence in his country. He succeeded in abolishing the capitulations in 1928 and curbing the opposition of the mullahs. After these successes, the shah saw Nazi Germany in the 1930s as a counter to the influence of Britain and the USSR. On the eve of World War II German influence in Iran was at its peak. As a consequence, Britain and the USSR would occupy Iran in August 1941 and force the shah to abdicate in favor of his son.

was receptive to the idea. Iranian intellectuals who could be described as Kemalists were lobbying actively for Iran to emulate Turkey and declare a republic. But the republic never materialized, for reasons originating in Turkey. When the debates over the future regime in Iran were at their height, Turkey abolished the caliphate on 3 March 1924. The Iranian mullahs were extremely worried that this was the inevitable consequence of a republic. Reza Khan felt compelled to go to Qum to declare his opposition to a republic. In 1925 Muhiddin Paşa was replaced by Memduh Şevket [Esendal] as ambassador in Tehran. The new ambassador also conveyed Turkey's desire to see a republic in Iran; but that year the Qajar dynasty was replaced by the Pahlavi dynasty, and the matter was settled in favor of a monarchy.

The new shah, Reza Pahlavi, felt the need to inform Memduh Şevket that he favored a republican system for Iran but that he was unable to take the step and was compelled to declare himself shah. This was a time when Turkey's influence in Iran was running high.

Despite this, the abolition of the caliphate in Turkey caused an important segment of Iranian society, led by the mullahs, to look upon Turkey and Reza Khan's ties with Turkey with suspicion. This faction was particularly influential in the first ten years after the establishment of relations. Nevertheless, Turkey continued to serve as a model for the Iranian administration as well as for the intelligentsia. M. Kemal's sweeping reforms drew much admiration. At the shah's coronation ceremony in 1926, Turkey's gift was brought to Tehran by aviators who put on an aerial display that greatly impressed Iranians. The border question between the two states remained unresolved until 1932, however, and this prevented relations from attaining their potential.

Bilateral relations started developing rapidly in 1932 and reached their high point with the visit to Turkey in June 1934 of Reza Pahlavi. The shah spent one month in Turkey, traveling extensively by land and sea. He inspected the trade route from Tabriz to Erzurum and Trabzon and was highly impressed by the results of Atatürk's "social engineering" efforts. The program for the shah's visit was designed to impress him. The battleship Yayuz was placed at his disposal for his voyage from Trabzon to Istanbul. The opera Özsoy that had been composed for this occasion was staged when the shah came to Ankara. The shah admired the results of the Westernization efforts carried out over a relatively short period. When he returned to Tehran, he displayed a new determination to develop his country's relations with Turkey. The unusual duration of the visit was in itself a measure of the importance that Iran attributed to its relations with Turkey. In regimes based on one man, it was not customary for this leader to leave the country for any length of time. In fact, this was the first occasion when the shah set foot outside Iran.

Turkish ambassador Hüsrev Gerede, a diplomat known for his toughness, accompanied the shah during this trip. The announcement that Mehmet Enis Akaygen would replace him came during this trip. Akaygen was the ambassador to Athens and was seen as the architect of the recent Turkish-Greek rapprochement. This was an indication that Ankara no longer required a tough negotiator in Tehran.

In 1934 Iran showed its solidarity by retracting its candidacy for a seat on the Council of the League of Nations in Turkey's favor. During the golden age of Turkish-Iranian relations following the shah's visit, there were frequent gestures of this kind, demonstrating that relations between the two countries were based on complete trust. When Atatürk died, the palace in Iran decreed a mourning period of one month.

The cordial atmosphere between Turkey and Iran lived on even after Turkey allied itself with Britain and France in 1939 while Iran's orientation turned toward Germany. The transfer of Ambassador Akaygen to Athens in 1939 and his replacement by Suat Davaz were not well received by the shah, however. He saw this move as being instigated by Britain and interpreted it as Turkey wanting to distance itself from a pro-German Iran. Even so, the excellent relations between the two countries continued until Iran was occupied in 1941 and the shah was sent into exile.

B. The Border Dispute

The frontier with Iran was traced out by the Treaty of Amasya in 1555 and fixed in its details by the Treaty of Qasr-e Shirin in 1639. This frontier has remained more or less constant to this day, even though the Ottomans and Persians carried out numerous redemarcations. The last of these demarcations was carried out in 1913, although its validity was questioned because it was never ratified. Minor disagreements about the frontier remained, however, and had a negative impact on the relations between Turkey and Iran from the early 1920s until 1932.

The dispute over the frontier had three causes.

- 1. Seeing things from a nationalistic perspective: the official ideologies of the new regimes were based on nationalism, so they looked upon one another with suspicion because of possible separatist provocations directed at ethnic groups living in their territories. For example, there were groups with Turkish roots in Iran (Azerbaijanis, Turkmens, Qashqais) as well as Sunni Kurds that Tehran feared might be manipulated by Ankara. Meanwhile Turkey feared that Tehran might support those of Iranian extraction (Kurds) in Turkey. Any sign that this might actually be happening was greatly overblown.
- 2. The desire of Kurdish tribes to preserve their autonomies: the Kurdish tribes were unhappy about the curbs imposed on their autonomy within the framework of a nation-state structure with a central authority. They did not have a clear concept of the actual meaning of an international frontier. They reacted violently to every measure that would limit their autonomous status, and the authorities were compelled to use force to restore order and tranquillity. Disorder originating on one side of the frontier had a way of spilling over the line, bringing the two states into dangerous local confrontations that occasionally degenerated into actual clashes.

3. The frontier was not adequately marked: the last agreement delineating the Turkish-Iranian frontier was the 1913 İstanbul Protocol. This protocol provided for the formation of a border demarcation commission; but this body never came into being, and the frontier remained inadequately marked. As a result the security forces on both sides were never certain about the exact limits of their area of responsibility.

In addition to these three causes, there is also the claim that the USSR was inciting the Kurdish tribes. The northern regions of Iran carried out their trade with the world through two traditional routes, one through Turkey and the other through the USSR. When the Tabriz-Erzurum-Trabzon route became unusable owing to lack of security, the alternative Enzeli-Baku-Batum route came into use. This provided the USSR with economic benefits and allowed it to strengthen its influence over Iran. Consequently, it was argued that the USSR was encouraging the Kurdish tribes to intercept and plunder Iranian commercial traffic using the Turkish route.

Iran wanted to participate in the Lausanne Conference to settle the border question. But Britain refused to allow this, so Iran sought to settle the matter through bilateral talks. The Simko Ağa uprising in Iran and the Sheikh Said uprising in Turkey accelerated this process. Once the leaders had made up their minds to overcome the lack of trust, the first steps toward the settlement of the border dispute were taken in 1926, four months after the signing of the Turkish-Soviet Treaty.

On 22 April 1926 a Treaty of Friendship and Security was signed in Tehran. Article 2 of the treaty provided that "in the event of military action against one of the parties, the other party commits itself to maintaining its neutrality." Article 3 stipulated that "both contracting parties undertake not to attack one another...and not to enter into any political, economic, or financial alliance or treaty directed against the other contracting party." This treaty, however, was really aimed at securing the pursuit of joint policies against tribes that were creating problems rather than at guaranteeing neutrality. This was clearly stated in article 6, which contained the most important provision of the treaty: "The contracting parties shall take all measures to put to an end the unlawful activities and preparations of the tribes in the border regions that pose a danger to the public order and security of the two countries." Article 5 contained similar provisions: "The contacting parties undertake to prevent the formation or implantation in their countries of structures or organizations that aim to endanger the public order and security or overthrow the government of the other contracting party." The distinguishing feature of this treaty was article 6, which singled out the tribes as the adversary. Although a number of treaties (including the Sadabad Pact) that contained the somewhat vague phraseology of article 5 were concluded after this, none contained the explicit language of article 6.

Although the basic aim of the treaty was to solve the border question created by the tribes, the treaty was also important because it was the first accord signed by Ankara and Tehran. All subsequent accords would be based on this treaty.

Turkey wanted to see a similar treaty signed between Iran and the USSR. During this period, however, relations between these countries were strained, and Iran was uneasy about the right to intervene that it had granted the Soviet Union under the 1921 treaty. To restore trust between the two countries, Memduh Şevket Bey went to Moscow but failed in his mission.

Despite the 1926 treaty, the problem created by the border clashes remained unresolved because of the tolerant attitude of Iran toward the tribes. Both sides continued their search for a solution, however. On 15 June 1928 a protocol was signed in Tehran that was in the form of an annex to the 1926 treaty. Article 1 contained the following provision: "If one of the contracting parties finds itself confronted by hostile action on the part of a state or several states, the other contracting party shall strive to find a remedy to this situation. If war breaks out in spite of this striving...the contracting parties...undertake jointly to reexamine the situation." The intent was to secure cooperation in the event of a British or Soviet intervention. But this was an unlikely eventuality, and the burning question was the activity of the tribes. For two years after 1926, the talks between the two sides produced no results. Nevertheless, the passive neutrality foreseen in the 1926 treaty was turned into active neutrality in the 1928 protocol. This was a sign that both sides were displaying goodwill.

The 1923 Simko Aga uprising in western Iran led to border clashes. This and the Sheikh Said uprising in southeast Anatolia demonstrated the critical importance of the question of border security. The Ağrı uprisings turned the question into a full-blown crisis (Box 2-12). The most critical of these was the third and last uprising that erupted in June 1930. Whenever the rebels were pursued, they fled to the sanctuary of Lesser Mount Ağrı, located in Iran. Finally, Turkey came to the conclusion that these uprisings could not be fully suppressed unless the entire Mount Ağrı (Ararat) region was brought under its sovereignty and proceeded to occupy the region of Lesser Mount Ağrı. This put an end to the uprising, and Iran found itself unable to intervene.

Turkey proposed that Iran be compensated for the mountainous area under Turkish control with an equivalent piece of agricultural land that would be without strategic importance. Iran rejected this proposal, pointing out that the İstanbul Protocol of 1913 was still valid and that it would not consent to any modification in the frontier traced in that accord. Turkey argued that this protocol had been ratified neither by the palace nor by the parliament and therefore had no validity. It argued further that there was no reason to comply with the "tentative" border traced in this document. The real reason why Iran refused to accept Turkey's proposal was because the Istanbul Protocol of 1913 drafted during the Ottoman period also traced the frontier between Iran and Iraq at Shatt al-Arab on the Gulf, which was at the time part of the Ottoman Empire. This frontier arrangement contained articles favoring Iran. Therefore, if Iran accepted the nonvalidity of the 1913 protocol, it could not legally invoke this document against Iraq. Although the question remained unresolved diplomatically, Turkey continued its occupation of the region (Çetinsaya, p. 161).

In 1930 the ambassador in Tehran, Memduh Şevket Bey, who was perceived as a "dove," was recalled and replaced by Hüsrev Bey [Gerede], usually described as a "hawk." Hüsrev Bey was briefed by prime minister İsmet Paşa, who described his mission in these terms: "Your position will be similar to the Western ambassadors who, with their fleets in the Dardanelles, used to send their embassy dragomans to the Sublime Porte and dictated their wills to the Grand Vizier. You will have a fully mobilized army to back you up" (Şimşir, p. 345).

Hüsrev Bey conveyed Ankara's stern and determined message to his Iranian interlocutors. The long negotiations were only concluded when minister of foreign affairs Tevfik Rüştü [Aras] went to Tehran. (The family name Aras was given to the minister by Atatürk to recall the Aras [Arax] River on the border with Iran.) Iran recognized the fait accompli created by Turkey and agreed to an exchange of territory. Two treaties were signed in Tehran on 23 January 1932, one demarcating the frontier and the other providing for cooperation in legal matters. The most recent rectifications in the Ottoman-Iranian frontier were incorporated in the treaty. This result was obtained under Turkish pressure, but the shah demonstrated that he was not resentful by placing one of his newly acquired Junkers aircraft at Tevfik Rüştü's disposal to fly him to Geneva, where the minister was to attend a meeting of

The actual demarcation in the field was only completed in 1934. In the course of the negotiations, agree-

Box 2-12. The Ağrı Uprisings

Some of the rebels who participated in the Sheikh Said uprising (see Box 2-6 above) fled from the security forces and took refuge in Mount Ağrı (Ararat), where they were able to regroup. The clashes that erupted in Maying26 continued intermittently until the end of June. Whenever the rebels found themselves pressed, they crossed into Iran and took refuge in the Lesser Mount Ağrı, which prevented the security forces from dealing a decisive blow to the uprising. A year later, in September 1927, the security forces mounted a new operation in the region of Mount Ağrı against the second Ağrı uprising, which also ended without a decisive result.

The Kurdish notables who had fled after the suppression of the Sheikh Said uprising established the Hoybun Society in Lebanon in 1927. When a group under the leadership of Capt. Ihsan Nuri, a member of the Hoybun Society, joined the rebel camps on Mount Ağrı, the nationalistic character of the uprising became evident. This made it all the more dangerous. After a period of preparation, the third Ağrı uprising erupted in 1930. The army extended its operations into Iran and completely surrounded the Lesser Mount Ağrı. With their escape route cut off, the rebels were quickly defeated.

ment could not be reached over a small tract of territory. It was decided to refer this issue to arbitration. The arbitrator selected for this purpose was none other than Shah Reza Pahlavi, who decided in Turkey's favor.

After the treaties of 23 January 1932, another treaty was signed on 27 May 1937, which traced the present-day frontier. According to this treaty, Mount Ağrı in its entirety (including Lesser Mount Ağrı) was to remain on the Turkish side, while Iran was to receive agricultural land in the region of Kotur in the province of Van. After this, frontier markings were renewed and the question of the frontier was removed from the agendas of the two countries. The question of the frontier created by the Kurdish tribes had lasted for ten years but was now set aside.

With the border question settled, two treaties were signed in Ankara on 5 November 1932, reaffirming the 1926 treaty and the attached 1928 protocol. These were the Treaty of Friendship and the Treaty of Security, Neutrality, and Economic Cooperation. The main difference between the new treaties and the previous ones was in article 2 of the Treaty of Friendship, which provided that "[t]he contracting parties accept that their diplomatic and consular representatives in the other country shall be subject to conditions no less favorable than the conditions enjoyed by the most favored nations." This signified that both countries were recognizing most-favored-nation status for one another in this field. That was psychologically important and demonstrated the confidence that the two countries had in each other. The bitter memory of how capitulations granted by the Ottomans and Qajars to certain major powers had spread to other countries through most-favored-nation treaties was still fresh in both capitals. Consequently, it was significant that the atmosphere of friendship was strong enough to enable both regimes to overcome their aversion to this clause.

The desire to establish friendship and neutrality was reaffirmed through these developments, and the course leading to the Sadabad Pact was taken.

II. RELATIONS WITH AFGHANISTAN

As a result of Tarzi Mahmut Bey's initiative, Turkey started providing Afghanistan with technical implements and personnel in the educational, health, legal, and military fields. This assistance continued to develop during this period and constituted the basis of Turkish-Afghan relations.

Afghanistan's King Amanullah Khan paid a visit to Turkey in May 1928. In the course of this visit, a Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation between Turkey and Afghanistan was signed in Ankara on 25 May 1928. This treaty confirmed the solidarity treaty signed in Moscow in 1921 and contained similar clauses. Article 2 contained this provision: "In the event of hostile action against one of the contracting parties...the other contracting party undertakes to take all necessary measures to prevent an attack, and if, nevertheless, war breaks out, the two governments undertake to...jointly review the situation." Article 3 stipulated that "[e]ach contracting party undertakes not to participate in any alliance or political, military, economic, or financial treaty or in any hostile action directed against the other contracting party." This provision was a standard clause that figured in all neutrality treaties signed by Turkey in this period. The provisions contained in article 5 were unique, however, and reflected the special ties that existed between Turkey and Afghanistan: "The Turkish Republic commits itself to selecting and placing at Afghanistan's disposal legal, scientific, and military experts for the development of Afghanistan's educational system and its armed forces."

Disturbances broke out in Afghanistan soon after King Amanullah returned to his country. A delegation headed by Kazım Paşa [Orbay] went to Kabul to help the Afghan army control the situation, but very soon Amanullah Khan was replaced on the throne by his brother, Inayatullah Khan, who was also deposed and replaced by Habibullah Khan. Habibullah saw Turkey as the supporter of the previous administration and ordered all Turkish personnel to leave the country. Shortly after these events, the exiled former king Nadir Shah returned to Afghanistan and took power. Nadir Shah pursued Amanullah Khan's policy vis-à-vis Turkey and recalled the deported Turkish experts. Soon afterward, Mohammed Zahir Shah succeeded Nadir Shah on the Afghan throne. Over a period of eighteen months, Zahir Shah was the fifth person to become ruler of Afghanistan. He finally managed to bring stability to the country.

During Zahir Shah's rule Turkish-Afghan relations achieved the vitality of relations during Amanullah Khan's period. In 1930 Memduh Şevket Bey was appointed Turkish ambassador in Kabul. His constructive efforts and the contribution of the Turkish experts had a significant impact on Afghanistan's modernization. Turkey even undertook the task of looking after Afghanistan's interests in places where there was no Afghan diplomatic representation.

The mutual trust between Turkey and Afghanistan in Zahir Shah's time also had a positive effect on Afghanistan's relations with Iran. These two countries had border disputes going back to 1903. To settle their disputes, the two countries asked Turkey to be an arbitrator. A delegation headed by Fahreddin Paşa [Türkkan] helped settle the disputes in 1934. Fahreddin Paşa had served as Reza Shah's aide-de-camp during the latter's visit to Turkey and had earned the shah's trust.

When the Sadabad Pact was signed in 1937, relations between the two countries were at their best; but the outbreak of World War II was to cut this period short.

III. THE SADABAD PACT

A. The Events Leading to the Pact

Turkey played a leading role in the preparation of the Sadabad Pact, which also included Iran, Iraq, and Afghanistan. Although known as a pact, it was not conceived as a military alliance. Basically, it was a treaty of friendship and nonaggression. There were two main reasons for the conclusion of this pact.

1. The desire to settle border disputes on a lasting basis: the signatories had border disputes with Iran, the centrally located country. As in the case of Turkey and Iran, Afghanistan also had border disputes with Iran. Iraq had a dispute with Iran over where the line was to be drawn at the Shatt al-Arab River. Iraq also had concerns about Iran's influence over the Shiites in the southern part of its territory and the Kurds in the northern part.

Most of these problems emanated from a lack of trust, due to the suspicion that the other party was supporting the border tribes involved in disturbances. The nonrecognition of borders by the rebellious Kurdish tribes living in the region where the frontiers of Iran, Iraq, and Turkey met constituted a major problem for all three countries.

By 1937 all of these questions had been settled, and the signatories wanted to reinforce and render permanent the atmosphere of trust that had been established among the neighbors. They did not want the activities of rebellious tribes to spoil their bilateral relations. This was the chief reason for the conclusion of the pact.

2. The desire to confirm the independence and sovereignty of the signatories: until a short time before, all four countries were either full colonies or semicolonies. Afghanistan emerged from this status in 1919, Iran and Turkey in 1923, and Iraq in 1932. With the exception of Iraq, it was important for all of them to stress their full independence and declare that they were not under the influence of any major power. Apart from Turkey, these countries were establishing an international organization for the first time. This was particularly important for Iraq.

Some authors have concluded that there were other motives for the signing of this pact. In general their views reflect the perception of the major powers of the day. This perception was that the pact was signed basically to check Italy (e.g., see OTDP, p. 106). It was in the interest of Britain and the Soviet Union to reinforce the claims that the Fascist government in Rome was aggressive by declaring that the Middle Eastern countries were uniting against the expansionist policies of Italy. In reality the preliminary preparations of the pact predated Italy's attack on Abyssinia. Furthermore, in the negotiations leading up to the pact, Italy was never mentioned.

In addition, it could be claimed that the Middle Eastern countries felt the need to join forces against British imperialism or that Moscow's neighbors were getting together due to fear of the spread of communism or that the USSR might still be pushing for outlets to warm seas. In this connection it should be noted that Iraq could never be a party to this kind of pact without Britain's approval. Iraq's dependence on Britain carried more weight than its membership in the pact. Furthermore, Britain was invited to join the pact, but it declined the invitation. As for the USSR, it had treaties of friendship with all of the signatories except Iraq. Not only did the USSR encourage the signing of this pact, but it also proposed that Afghanistan be included.

If we examine the preparatory stage of the pact, the above-mentioned claims about the objectives of the pact can easily be refuted.

B. The Preparatory Stage, Signing, and End of the Pact

After Britain ended the mandate regime in Iraq and recognized its independence in June 1930, Baghdad wanted to develop its relations with its two powerful neighbors, Iran and Turkey. In July 1931 King Faisal and prime minister Nuri Said Paşa paid a visit to Ankara. This launched a series of negotiations between Iraq and Turkey conducted at the level of experts.

Because the question of the border between Iraq and Turkey was already settled, the experts considered the questions likely to arise on account of the activities of Kurdish tribes along the border. In addition, Iraq asked Turkey to intercede on its behalf with Iran, with which Turkey enjoyed excellent relations, to resolve some of Iraq's problems with its eastern neighbor.

When Iraq proposed the conclusion of a nonaggression treaty by Iraq, Iran, and Turkey in 1933, Ankara responded by proposing that Britain and the USSR also join in the treaty. This was because the 1930 treaty had not granted Iraq full independence and allowed Britain to control Iraq's foreign policy. Therefore it would be meaningless to have Iraqi participation in a treaty from which Britain was excluded. Furthermore, according to the protocol of 1929, Turkey had undertaken not to join such a treaty without consulting the U$SR, and Moscow could not have approved of Turkey's joining a treaty in which Britain was the sole major power. Hence Turkey's proposal for the USSR to take part. When the proposal to participate went to London and Moscow, Britain turned down the offer. At that time, Britain's policy was to avoid joining regional pacts because of the Kellogg-Briand Pact and the existence of the LoN guarantees. The three countries would not contemplate the USSR's participation without Britain, so they retracted their offer. The USSR showed understanding and proposed that Afghanistan be included in the arrangement.

Iran, Iraq, and Turkey initialed the treaty in Geneva on 2 October 1935. One month later Afghanistan accepted the invitation and joined in. But it took two years to get the treaty signed because of Iraq's procrastination.

Iraq hesitated because the question of the Shatt al-Arab remained unresolved. It would have been unrealistic to sign a treaty aiming at establishing an atmosphere of trust and nonaggression among its signatories without first securing this atmosphere between Iran and Iraq. Also, Iraq was delaying the signing because it wanted Turkey, eager to secure this treaty, to use its influence on Iran and pressure it to reach an early agreement with Iraq over the border dispute. The tactic worked, and Turkey actively sought a solution to the Shatt al-Arab question. Another reason for Iraq's delaying tactics was that it did not want to be the sole Arab state in the treaty. It wanted to see Saudi Arabia and even Yemen included in the arrangement. Especially after the Hatay question erupted between Turkey and Syria in 1936, Iraq did not relish giving the impression of detaching itself from the Arab world and siding with Turkey. In 1933 Yasin Hashemi of the Vatani Party replaced Nuri Said Paşa as prime minister. As the new prime minister was pursuing a nationalistic foreign policy, King Faisal was being extra cautious about signing this sort of pact.

In October 1936 Bekir Sitki Paşa carried out a coup against Hashemi and installed Hikmet Suleiman as prime minister while he himself remained in the background. Both Bekir Sitki Pasha and Hikmet Suleiman were in favor of Iraq's settling all outstanding questions with its neighbors. As a consequence the treaty on the frontier between Iran and Iraq was signed in Tehran on 4 July 1937. With this treaty, the frontier was traced along the thalweg (a line joining the deepest points of a watercourse) in the Shatt al-Arab in accordance with Iran's wishes.

Four days after this treaty, on 8 July 1937, the text that had been initialed at Geneva was signed by the four ministers of foreign affairs (Tevfik Rüştü Aras signed for Turkey) at the Palace of Sadabad in Tehran. With the completion of the ratification proceedings, the pact came into effect on 25 June 1938. As already noted, this was not a treaty of alliance but rather a treaty of neutrality and nonaggression. The following four articles were very clear in describing the character of the pact.

Article 1: "The contracting parties undertake to refrain from interfering in one another's internal affairs."

Article 3: "The contracting parties have agreed to hold consultations on all international disputes relating to their common interests."

Article 4: "Each of the contracting parties...undertakes not to engage in any activity directed at any of the other contracting parties."

Article 6: "If one of the contracting parties should commit aggression against a third state, the other contracting parties may terminate this pact in relation to the aggressor without having to provide prior notification."

The real aim of the pact, the question of the Kurdish tribes, was contained in article 7: "Each of the contracting parties undertakes to prevent the establishment and the activities within its territory of armed bands, units, or organizations aiming to destroy the institutions or weaken the public order and security or destabilize the political regime of one of the contracting parties." It was this article that made the pact action-oriented. In the circumstances of World War II, all of the other articles of the pact became inoperative.

On the day the pact was signed, an annexed protocol was prepared that established the organs of the pact. According to the protocol, there would be a council of ministers that would meet annually and a secretary-general of the pact.

Shortly after the pact came into effect, World War II broke out. In October 1939 Britain proposed to Ankara that the pact be turned into a defensive alliance against the USSR, but Turkey refused to consider this proposal. During the war, the pact was placed on the shelf and forgotten. The last meeting of the council of ministers was held in 1939. Because the post of secretary-general was supposed to rotate on an annual basis according to the presidency of the council and because it had neither a headquarters building nor any permanent staff, the pact ceased to exist in a practical sense. In 1979 the new regime in Iran implied that it had denounced the pact. But since Iran did not explicitly say so, it could be argued that the pact is still legally in effect.

The Montreux Straits Convention

I. THE MONTREUX STRAITS CONVENTION

The Lausanne Straits Convention (LSC) remained in force for thirteen years. During the interwar years, no serious problems were encountered in connection with passage through the Straits and the convention was effectively implemented. Developments on the eve of World War II, however, necessitated a review of the regime of the Turkish Straits.

The New International Situation

Turkey accepted—albeit reluctantly—the limitations that the LSC placed on its sovereignty because Ankara was anxious to see the Lausanne Conference concluded with a peace agreement. Turkey also believed that the collective security system created within the framework of the LoN would function effectively and that international disarmament would be achieved.

All members of the LoN were committed to disarmament. The efforts to achieve naval disarmament were in large measure successful. At the Washington Naval Disarmament Conference of 1921-22, the tonnage of capital ships was limited to 35,000 tons for battleships and 27,000 tons for aircraft carriers. At the London Conference of 1930, limitations were also placed on the tonnage of smaller warships. But these successes were short-lived, and after 1931 the arms race was on once again. The attempts to place limitations on arms related to land warfare yielded no practical results. The disarmament committee set up by the LoN in 1925 was able to convene a conference only in 1932, and this ended in failure. Hitler had come to power in Berlin by the time the next conference met, and Germany withdrew from the conference in October 1934. In these circumstances the policy of force came into play once again. The atmosphere that prevailed in 1936 was completely different from the atmosphere of the immediate postwar years.

Turkey's Initiatives Prior to 1936

Starting in 1933, Turkey made various diplomatic moves to amend the LSC by convening an international conference that would establish a new regime. At the London Conference on Disarmament of 1933, Turkey called for the lifting of the restrictions imposed by the LSC on rearming the shores of the Straits and the islands of the Sea of Marmara with the exception of the island of Imrali. This call went unheeded because it was not within the terms of reference of the conference.

Turkey repeated its demands at the Council of the League in 1935, at the Council of the Balkan Entente again in 1935, and at the General Assembly of the LoN in September 1935. Nothing emerged from these urgings. Turkey did not want to carry out a fait accompli. It was striving for a change of regime through negotiation and mutual accommodation. Eventually Turkey reiterated its position at the LoN in November 1935, when the league decided to apply sanctions against Italy after the aggression in Abyssinia. On that occasion Turkey's request received a favorable reaction.

Turkey's Note of 10 April 1936

Turkey submitted notes to the parties to the LSC on 10 April 1936, calling for the convening of an international conference to establish a new regime. This request was based on the principle of rebus sic stantibus (a doctrine in international law to the effect that a treaty may become inapplicable in case of a fundamental change in circumstances).

Turkey's note contained the following arguments:

1. The situation in the Black Sea has altered fundamentally since the coming into effect of the LSC, and the situation in the Mediterranean is also unsettled. "There is a tendency toward rearmament at Naval Conferences. Shipyards are constructing vessels of hitherto unmatched power. Air forces are being strengthened at a dizzying speed. Armaments are continuously being increased on the mainland as well as the islands."

- 2. The system of collective security has ceased to function. Therefore "it is not possible to limit Turkish sovereignty over the Straits without effective, functional, and practical guarantees, because security of the Straits is essential for the country's general security."
- 3. The LSC contains provisions applicable only in peace and war. A new convention, however, should also contain provisions dealing with "an imminent threat of war." Only thus can Turkey exercise its legal right to defend itself.
- 4. "The circumstances that now prevail have come about independently of the will of the signatories of Lausanne and have made its provisions inoperable."

Why the Note Received a Favorable Reception

The USSR was not happy with the regime imposed by the Lausanne Straits Convention and delayed its ratification. Consequently, Moscow supported Turkey's proposal on the assumption that it could bring about changes in its favor in the LSC.

Bulgaria did not favor strict control of the Straits by Turkey. However, it felt that the Turkish initiative would facilitate Sofia's efforts to rid itself of some of the disarmament provisions imposed on it by the 1919 Neuilly Treaty. As a result, it did not oppose the Turkish effort to secure a new regime. Greece, Romania, and Yugoslavia supported Turkey because of the Balkan Pact.

France was strongly pro-status quo and did not want the situation in Europe or the peace treaties underpinning it changed. But Paris had signed a treaty of alliance with the USSR in 1935 to secure Soviet support against Germany and was reluctant to oppose a change that Moscow favored.

For its part, Britain favored the Turkish proposal even though it had been the architect of the LSC because it was seeking to draw Ankara to its side in the face of a growing Italian threat in the Mediterranean.

The opposition to the proposal to revise the LSC came from Europe's revisionist power, Italy. It is assumed that Italy opposed Turkey's proposal in order to punish Ankara for its participation in the sanctions regime imposed on Italy by the LoN in response to the Italian aggression against Abyssinia.

The Positions of the Participants

The Conference of Montreux convened on 22 June 1936 with the participation of all the parties to the Lausanne

Straits Convention with the exception of Italy. The Turkish government submitted the text of a draft convention on 23 June. The Turkish draft contained provisions similar to the provisions of the LSC for regulating the passage of merchant vessels through the Straits. In its text Turkey sought to impose certain restrictions on the passage of warships of non–Black Sea Powers. To cite an example, Turkey would restrict the tonnage and duration of stay for the war vessels of non–Black Sea Powers. The draft text provided that, in the event of Turkey feeling itself to be under an imminent threat of war, the passage of warships would be conditional on Turkey's consent. Although it was not stated in the draft, Turkey also wanted to abolish the Straits Commission established by the LSC and to remilitarize the region.

Subsequently Britain submitted a revised version of the Turkish draft that was designed to mitigate the conflict of interest between the riparian and nonriparian states of the Black Sea. In the British text the Straits Commission of the LSC was preserved. The British text also contained provisions about an imminent threat of war and recognized Turkey's right to apply a special regime in this situation. But it also provided that this regime would be subject to review by the Council of the LoN, with the stipulation that if the council found the Turkish measures to be unwarranted the Ankara government would have to rescind its measures.

Although Britain supported the principle of freedom of passage through the Straits for warships, it was not against imposing certain limitations on the aggregate tonnage of warships that non–Black Sea Powers could maintain in that sea. This was because the British Admiralty had warned that insistence on unlimited access to the Black Sea could lead to counterdemands for unlimited access to the Mediterranean. Britain also feared that a Soviet fleet freed of limitations in sailing through the Straits might provoke Germany into denouncing the naval treaty that Berlin had concluded with Britain.

In its opposition to the British proposal to maintain the Straits Commission, Turkey enjoyed the full backing of Romania. This was because Romania had been forced to accept two different international commissions on its territory charged with the task of supervising navigation on the Danube. Romania held the view that such arrangements forced upon countries by outsiders were infringements of national sovereignty.

The anti-British position of the USSR was in line with Turkey's proposals with respect to both the remilitarization of the Straits and limitations on the passage of warships. But the USSR was against any limitations being imposed in regard to the passage through the Straits of warships of Black Sea countries. Furthermore, Moscow wanted Turkey to grant unconditional access in time of war (Turkey being a nonbelligerent) to warships carrying out international commitments and duties imposed by the LoN. In adopting this position, the Soviet Union was motivated by the mutual assistance treaties it had entered into with France to counter a possible German threat.

From the foregoing it will be seen that at the conference Britain stood for unrestricted freedom of passage for the warships of non–Black Sea Powers, while the USSR advocated complete freedom for the warships of Black. Sea Powers. France supported the Soviet position, even though it was a non–Black Sea Power, because of its treaty with the USSR.

To sum up, the general alignment of the participants at Montreux was Britain (supported by Japan) on one side, with Turkey (supported by the Black Sea Powers plus France) on the other side. At the conclusion of the conference the British position prevailed with respect to limitations imposed on warships, while the Turkish position prevailed with respect to the situation when Turkey felt itself to be under imminent threat of war, the remilitarization of the Straits, and the abolition of the Straits Commission.

II. THE NEW REGIME ADOPTED AT MONTREUX

The Montreux Straits Convention was signed on 20 July 1936. The convention, along with its annexes, was ratified by the TGNA on 1 July 1936 and came into effect on 9 November 1936. The remilitarization of the region of the Straits by the Turkish army began on 15 August 1936 in accordance with the annexed protocol.

The Montreux Straits Convention came into effect after it had been ratified by all of the signatories of the LSC, with the exception of Italy. This country acceded to the convention in 1938, while Japan withdrew from the convention in 1951 as a consequence of the San Francisco Treaty it signed with the Allies.

A. The Transit Regime and "Imminent Threat of War"

The Montreux Convention consists of twenty-nine articles. In principle, transit through the Turkish Straits is free. In effect, article 1 declares: "The High Contracting Parties recognize and affirm the principle of freedom of transit and navigation by sea in the Straits." Although the Montreux Convention has a duration of twenty years, paragraph 2 of article 28 contains the following provision with respect to freedom of navigation: "The principle of freedom of transit and navigation affirmed in article 1 of the present Convention shall...continue without limit of time."

The regime established by the convention applied to the Straits. The preamble of the convention described the Straits in these terms: "the Straits of the Dardanelles, the Sea of Marmora, and the Bosphorus comprised under the general term 'Straits.'"

The Montreux Convention regulates the passage through the Straits of merchant vessels, vessels of war, and aircraft separately. According to the convention, the rules applying to passage through the Straits of merchant vessels and vessels of war differ depending on the prevailing situation: (1) time of peace; (2) time of war (subdivided into Turkey being belligerent and nonbelligerent); and (3) when Turkey considers itself threatened with imminent danger of war.

Passage of Merchant Vessels

Although the convention does not contain a definition of "merchant vessel," article 7 contains the provision: "The term 'merchant vessel' applies to all vessels that are not covered by Section II of the present Convention." Therefore all vessels not in the category "vessels of war" are deemed to be merchant vessels.

a. In Time of Peace

Article 2: "In time of peace, merchant vessels shall enjoy complete freedom of transit and navigation in the Straits, by day and by night, under any flag and with any kind of cargo, without any formalities, except as provided in article 3." The formality referred to in article 3 relates to the sanitary control prescribed by Turkish law within the framework of international sanitary regulations. "This control...shall be carried out by day and by night with all possible speed, and the vessels in question shall not be required to make any other stop during their passage through the Straits" (article 3, paragraph 1).

In time of peace, "[n]o taxes or charges...shall be levied by the Turkish Authorities [on merchant vessels] when passing in transit without calling at a port in the Straits" (article 2, paragraph 1). Sanitary controls, lighthouses, and channel buoys and lifesaving services are subject to taxes and charges (annex I/1). In time of peace, "pilotage and towage remain optional" (article 2, paragraph 3). "The Turkish Government will publish, from time to time, the tariff of the taxes and charges to be levied for... optional services" (annex I/5).

b. In Time of War

Article 4: "In time of war, Turkey not being belligerent, merchant vessels, under any flag or with any kind of cargo, shall enjoy freedom of transit and navigation in the Straits." Pilotage and towage remain optional.

Article 5:

In time of war, Turkey being belligerent, merchant vessels not belonging to a country at war with Turkey shall enjoy freedom of transit and navigation in the Straits on condition that they do not in any way assist the enemy.

Such vessels shall enter the Straits by day and their transit shall be effected by the route which shall in each case be indicated by the Turkish authorities.

Merchant vessels in time of war and Turkey being belligerent are under the obligation of not assisting the enemy, so it can be deduced that Turkey has the right to visit such vessels and conduct searches. If Turkey were denied these rights, the obligation imposed on such merchant vessels would be meaningless.

c. When Turkey Itself Is Threatened with Imminent Danger of War

Article 6: "Should Turkey consider herself to be threatened with imminent danger of war, the provisions of Article 2 shall nevertheless continue to be applied except that vessels must enter the Straits by day and their transit must be effected by the route which shall, in each case, be indicated by the Turkish authorities. Pilotage may, in this case, be made obligatory but no charge shall be levied."

2. Passage of Vessels of War

The definition of vessels of war and of their specification and those relating to the calculation of tonnage are set forth in annex II of the convention, which is taken from the London Naval Treaty of 25 March 1936. According to this treaty, vessels of war are divided into six categories: capital ships, aircraft carriers, light surface vessels, submarines, minor war vessels, and auxiliary vessels (Box 2-13).

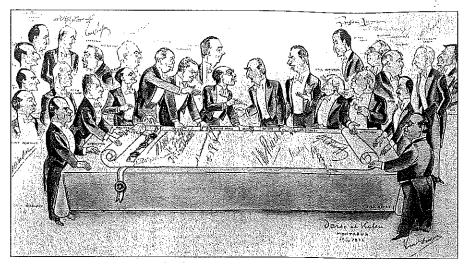

Figure 2-1. The Montreux Conference as depicted by Derso and Kelen (Cumhuriyetin 75. Yılı [İstanbul: Yapı Kredi Kültür Sanat Yayıncılık, 1998], vol. 1, p. 168).

Box 2-13, Categories of Vessels according to the Montreux Straits Convention

Light surface vessels: surface vessels of war other than aircraft carriers, minor war vessels, or auxiliary vessels with a displacement of 100 to 10,000 tons that do not carry a gun with a caliber exceeding 8 inches.

Minor war vessels, surface vessels of war, other than auxillary vessels, with a displacement of 100 to 2,000 tons that do not mount a gun with a caliber exceeding 6.1 inches, are not capable of launching torpedoes, and do not have a speed of over 20 knots.

Auxiliary vessels: naval surface vessels with a displacement of over 100 tons, which are normally employed on fleet duties or as troop transports or in some way other than as fighting ships and which are not specifically built as fighting ships, provided they have none of the following characteristics: mount a gun with a callber exceeding 6.1 inches, mount more than eight guns with a callber exceeding 3 inches, are designed or fitted to launch torpedoes, are protected by armor plate, have a speed greater than 28 knots, are designed to operated aircraft at sea, or mount more than two aircraft-launching devices.

Capital ships fall into two categories: (1) surface vessels of war, other than aircraft carriers, or capital ships of subcategory 2 with a displacement exceeding 10,000 tons or carrying a gun with a caliber exceeding 8 inches; (2) surface vessels of war, other than aircraft carriers, with a displacement under 8,000 tons and carrying a gun with a caliber exceeding 8 inches.

Submarines: all vessels designed to operate below the surface of the sea.:

Aircraft carriers: surface vessels of war, whatever their displacement, designed or adapted primarily for the purpose of carrying and operating aircraft at sea. The fitting of a deck for landing or taking off on any vessel of war not designed primarily for the purpose of carrying and operating aircraft at sea shall not cause such a vessel to be classified as an aircraft carrier.

a. In Time of Peace

Rules Applicable to War Vessels of All States

Article 10: "In time of peace, light surface vessels, minor war vessels, and auxiliary vessels, whether belonging to Black Sea or non—Black Sea Powers, and whatever their flag, shall enjoy freedom of transit through the Straits without any taxes or charges." But these vessels must enter the Straits in daylight and must comply with the prior notification rule applicable to all war vessels. The aggregate tonnage of foreign vessels transiting the Straits cannot exceed 15,000 tons, and the number cannot exceed nine vessels. "Vessels, whether belonging to Black Sea or non—Black Sea Powers, paying visits to a port in the Straits [upon the invitation of the Turkish government] shall not be included in this tonnage... Neither shall vessels... which have suffered damage during their passage through the Straits be included in this tonnage" (article 14/3-4).

"The transit of vessels of war through the Straits shall be preceded by a notification given to the Turkish Government through the diplomatic channel. The normal period of notice shall be eight days, but it is desirable that in the case of non–Black Sea Powers, this period should be increased to fifteen days. The notification shall specify the destination, name, type, and number of the vessels, as also the date of entry for the outward passage and, if necessary, for the return journey. Any change of date shall be subject to three days' notice" (article 13/1).

According to article 24, "as soon as they have been notified of the intended passage through the Straits of a foreign naval force, the Turkish Government shall inform...the High Contracting Parties of the composition of that force, its tonnage, the date fixed for its entry into the Straits, and...the probable date of its return."

If a foreign naval force wishes to pay a courtesy visit of limited duration to a port in the Straits upon the invitation of the Turkish government, such a force will not be subject to the limitations of tonnage and category (article 14/3). If this force belongs to a non–Black Sea Power, however, and, following the visit, proceeds to the Black Sea rather than returning home, the limitations imposed by the Montreux Convention on non–Black Sea Powers (articles 10, 14, and 18) shall apply (article 17).

According to article 15, "vessels of war in transit through the Straits shall in no circumstances make use of any aircraft which they may be carrying." Furthermore, such vessels "shall not, except in the event of damage or peril of the sea, remain therein longer than is necessary for them to effect the passage."

Paragraph 1 of article 10 of the convention regulates the passage of light surface vessels, minor war vessels, and auxiliary vessels through the Straits. Paragraph 2 of this article stipulates that "vessels of war other than those which fall within the categories specified in the preceding paragraph shall only enjoy a right to transit under the special conditions provided by articles 11 and 12." But articles 11 and 12 provide for the passage of submarines and capital ships belonging only to Black Sea Powers, so non–Black Sea Powers may not send ships other than the three categories mentioned above. In other words, their aircraft carriers, submarines, and capital ships are excluded from passing through the Straits. Because articles 11 and 12 make no provision for aircraft carriers, Black Sea Powers may not send their aircraft carriers through the Straits (for the implementation of this provision, see "The Issue of the Turkish Straits" in Section 6).

"When effecting transit, the commander of the naval force shall, without being under any obligation to stop, communicate to a signal station at the entrance to the Dardanelles or the Bosphorus the exact composition of the force under his orders" (article 13/3).

Rules Applicable to the Warships of Non-Black Sea Powers

In time of peace, the light surface vessels, minor war vessels, and auxiliary vessels belonging to non–Black Sea Powers fulfilling the aforementioned conditions may freely transit the Straits. But these countries cannot send their aircraft carriers, capital ships, and submarines through the Straits (articles 10/2 and 11).

The restrictions by category and tonnage placed on the passage of war vessels of non–Black Sea Powers in peacetime are contained under the heading "Rules Applicable to the War Vessels of All States." Since the convention was concluded for the purpose of ensuring the security of Turkey and the other Black Sea Powers, it contains a number of other limitations. The aggregate tonnage of vessels belonging to non–Black Sea Powers that can be kept in the Black Sea as well as the length of time they can stay there are restricted:

Article 18: The aggregate tonnage which non-Black Sea Powers may have in that sea in time of peace shall be limited as follows:

- (a)...the aggregate tonnage of the said Powers shall not exceed 30,000 tons;
- (b) If at any time the tonnage of the strongest fleet in the Black Sea shall exceed by at least 10,000 tons the tonnage of the strongest fleet in that sea at the date of the signature of the present Convention, the aggregate tonnage of 30,000 tons mentioned in paragraph (a) shall be increased by the same amount, up to a maximum of 45,000 tons. For this purpose, each Black Sea Power shall inform the Turkish Government, on the 1st January and the 1st July each year, of the total tonnage of its fleet in the Black Sea; and the Turkish Government shall transmit this information to the other High Contracting Parties . . .

- (c) The tonnage which any non-Black Sea Power may have in the Black Sea shall be limited to two-thirds of the aggregate tonnage provided for in paragraphs (a) and (b) above;
- (d) In the event, however, of one or more non-Black Sea Powers desiring to send naval forces...for humanitarian purposes, the said forces, which shall in no case exceed 8,000 tons altogether, shall be allowed to enter the Black Sea...[with] an authorization...from the Turkish Government in the following circumstances: if the figure of the aggregate tonnage specified in paragraphs (a) and (b) above has not been reached and will not be exceeded by the dispatch of the forces which it is desired to send, the Turkish Government shall grant the said authorization within the shortest possible time...if the said figure has already been reached...the Turkish Government will immediately inform the other Black Sea Powers...and if [they] make no objection within 24 hours...the Turkish Government shall within forty-eight hours...inform the interested Powers of the reply which it has decided to make to their request.
- 2. Vessels of war belonging to the non-Black Sea Powers shall not remain in the Black Sea more than twenty-one days, whatever be the object of their presence there.

Rules Applicable to the War Vessels of Black Sea Powers

The general regulations applicable to the war vessels of all states are also valid for the war vessels of Black Sea Powers. But the convention makes certain allowances in favor of Black Sea Powers.

Black Sea Powers may send capital ships exceeding 15,000 tons through the Straits on condition that they pass singly, escorted by not more than two destroyers (article 11).

The second difference is in article 12:

Black Sea Powers shall have the right to send through the Straits, for the purpose of rejoining their base, submarines constructed or purchased outside the Black Sea, provided that adequate notice of the laying down or purchase of such submarines shall have been given to Turkey. Submarines belonging to the said Powers shall also be entitled to pass through the Straits to be repaired in dockyards outside the Black Sea on condition that detailed information on the matter is given to Turkey. In either case, the said submarines must travel by day and on the surface, and must pass through the Straits singly.

b. In Time of War

The time of war is divided into two cases in the convention: Turkey being nonbelligerent and being belligerent.

Turkey Being Nonbelligerent

When Turkey is nonbelligerent in time of war, the warships of nonbelligerents shall enjoy freedom of transit and navigation through the Straits under the same terms as in time of peace. The passage of warships of belligerents through the Straits is in principle not allowed, however, with three exceptions.

In the first case, the warships of belligerents, whether they be Black Sea or non-Black Sea Powers, may pass through the Straits to return to their home base (article 19/4), but "vessels of war belonging to belligerent Powers shall not make any capture, exercise the right of visit and search, or carry out any hostile act in the Straits" (article 19/5).

In the second case, warships may pass through the Straits if they are carrying out enforcement action decided upon by the LoN (article 25).

The third case is when assistance is being rendered to a state victim of aggression in virtue of a treaty of mutual assistance binding Turkey, concluded within the framework of the LoN and duly registered and published in accordance with the Covenant of the LoN. In such cases, the warships may pass through the Straits even if they belong to belligerent powers (article 19/2).

Turkey Being Belligerent

In this situation, "the passage of warships shall be left entirely to the discretion of the Turkish Government" under the terms of article 20.

When Turkey Itself is Threatened with Imminent Danger of War

Should Turkey consider itself to be threatened with imminent danger of war, it shall have the right to implement the measures provided for times when it is belligerent (article 21/1). Before Turkey exercises this right, the warships that find themselves separated away from their base may pass through the Straits (article 21/2).

It is up to the Turkish government to determine if a threatening situation exists. When Turkey makes a determination of the existence of a threat, it shall notify the parties to the convention and the secretary-general of the LoN (article 21/3). If the Council of the League of Nations decides by a two-thirds majority that the measures taken by Turkey are not justified and if this opinion is also shared by the majority of the contracting parties, the Turkish government undertakes to discontinue the measures as well as any measures taken under article 6 of the convention (article 21/4).

Of the two organs that are competent to check on the existence of a threat, the LoN has ceased to exist, but the right enjoyed by the signatory powers remains in effect. In Turkey there is no agreement on whether the right conferred on the Council of the League of Nations has passed to the United Nations. Neither is there any agreement among scholars as to whether the United Nations has taken over the specific responsibilities of the LoN.

3. Passage of Aircraft

The LSC introduced the principle of freedom of transit and navigation both by sea and by air and made provisions for both civil and military aircraft to everfly the Straits (articles 1 and 2). Montreux, however, does not accept the principle of freedom of transit and navigation by air and makes arrangements only for civil aircraft. Consequently, it is up to the Turkish government to grant or withhold flying rights over the Straits to military aircraft.

Article 23: "In order to assure the passage of civil aircraft between the Mediterranean and the Black Sea, the Turkish Government will indicate the air routes available for this purpose, outside the forbidden zones which may be established in the Straits. Civil aircraft may use these routes, provided that they give the Turkish Government, as regards occasional flights, a notification of three days, and as regards flights on regular services, a general notification of the dates of passage."

B. The Lifting of the Restrictions Imposed at Lausanne

It will be recalled that at Lausanne various restrictions were placed on Turkey's sovereignty. It can be said that, thanks to Montreux, Turkey was able to recover its rights. These rights can be examined under two headings: (1) Remilitarization of the Straits; and (2) The Abolition of the Straits Commission.

Remilitarization of the Straits

In the text of the Montreux Convention, there are no provisions for the remilitarization of the zone demilitarized under the LSC. Nevertheless, the first article of the annexed protocol is very clear: "Turkey may immediately remilitarize the zone of the Straits as defined in the Preamble to the said Convention."

Based on this provision of the annexed protocol, Turkey introduced its army into the region of the Dardanelles, the Sea of Marmara, and the Bosphorus and started remilitarizing the zone. Thus the guarantees provided within the framework of the LoN under article 18 of the LSC came to an end.

Abolition of the Straits Commission

The Straits Commission was established in accordance with articles 10 to 17 of the LSC. Article 24 of the Montreux Convention reads as follows: "The functions of the International Commission set up under the Convention relating to the regime of the Straits of the 24th July, 1923, are hereby transferred to the Turkish Government." By this provision Turkey will be responsible for informing the signatory powers of warships passing through the Straits as well as for the nonimplementation or erroneous implementation of the provisions regarding their passage through the Straits.

Turkey assumed international responsibilities in this sphere.

C. Denunciation of the Convention and Its Revision

Article 28: "The present Convention shall remain in force for twenty years from the date of its entry into force." If this convention comes to an end and the present regime cannot be replaced by another regime (or is replaced by another regime), the principle of freedom of transit and navigation shall continue without limit of time (article 28/2). Revisions in the principle of freedom of transit or the termination of this principle can only be carried out with the unanimous agreement of the parties to the convention.

Article 28 provides for the following in paragraphs 3 and 4: "If, two years prior to the expiry of the said period of twenty years, no High Contacting Party shall have given notice of denunciation to the French Government, the present Convention shall continue in force until two years after such notice shall have been given... In the event of the present Convention being denounced in accordance with the provisions of the present article, the High Contracting Parties agree to be represented at a conference for the purpose of concluding a new Convention." No such denunciation has occurred, so Montreux has remained in force up to the present.

The procedure to amend the provisions of the convention is regulated by article 29. "At the expiry of each period of five years from the date of the entry into force of the present Convention [9 November 1936], each of the High Contracting Parties shall be entitled to initiate a proposal for amending one or more of the provisions of the present Convention... Any request for revision thus supported must be notified to all the High Contracting Parties three months prior to the expiry of the current period of five years. This notification shall contain details of the proposed amendments and the reasons which have given rise to them." A request for revision must be supported by at least one other contracting party if the revision relates to articles 14 (on the subject of the number and tonnage of warships) or 18 (on the subject of the number and tonnage of warships that non-Black Sea Powers can introduce to the Black Sea) and in the case of modifications to any other article by at least two other contracting parties.

"Should it be found impossible to reach an agreement on these proposals through the diplomatic channel, the High Contracting Powers agree to be represented at a conference to be summoned for this purpose. Such a conference may only take decisions by a unanimous vote, except as regards cases of revision involving Articles 14 and 18, for which a majority of three-quarters of the High Contracting Parties shall be sufficient. The said majority shall include three-quarters of the High Contracting Parties which are Black Sea Powers, including Turkey" (article 29/4, 5, and 6). In other words, these two articles cannot be amended without the consent of Turkey.

Relative Autonomy—2

Appraisal of the Period

I. THE INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENT AND DYNAMICS

World War II started with Germany's invasion of Poland on 1 September 1939 and ended in Europe on 8 May 1945 at midnight. The war spread to five continents and affected every aspect of life, especially in Europe.

During the war Turkey pursued two broad objectives: to avoid getting embroiled in the conflict and to avoid occupation. From Turkey's perspective, the war had three specific turning points and two general features that affected Turkey directly.

To begin with, France's early defeat placed Turkey in a very difficult situation. In concluding the Tripartite Alliance with Britain and France in October 1939, Turkey had made the assumption that France would resist Germany over a period of time and wear it down. It had also assumed that the French fleet would check the Italian navy in the Mediterranean (Hale, p. 82). When these expectations were dashed, two events took place that shook Turkey. With Italy's declaration of war on 10 June 1940, the war had spread to the Mediterranean and the clause of the Tripartite Alliance requiring Turkey to enter the war became operative. The second event was the arrival of the German army at the Turkish frontier in March 1941. France's early collapse, however, also provided Turkey with a perfect excuse to avoid getting involved in the conflict.

A second turning point that was of immediate interest to Turkey was the German attack on the USSR in June 1941. This event helped free Turkey of its greatest fear: the "Polish syndrome." This was the fear of being invaded simultaneously by the Germans and the Soviets.

The third turning point was the German defeat at Stalingrad in February 1943, from which Germany never recovered. This gave rise to new anxieties in Ankara, because it meant a resurgence of the Soviet threat. Throughout the German-Soviet war, Turkey was apprehensive about a decisive victory by either side, because it expected that once one of the antagonists had completely eliminated its adversary it would turn its attention on Turkey.

The main feature of the wartime period was that there were frequent and abrupt changes in the tides of war. This placed Turkey on the spot and compelled it to deal with incessant demands being made on Ankara.

Another factor affecting Turkey was the new conditions created as a result of the manner in which the war ended: in 1945 the world found itself divided into two very distinct camps. In these circumstances it would become very difficult for a medium power like Turkey in its particular geostrategic location to rely on the balance of power in the conduct of its foreign policy (see "Turkey as a Strategic Medium Power (SMP): Military-Strategic and Economic Dimensions" in the Introduction).

II. THE DOMESTIC ENVIRONMENT AND DYNAMICS

As a general rule, it can be said that the direction of a country's foreign policy is determined by its domestic situation. This rule applies in normal circumstances and over the medium to long term. In extraordinary times such as war and in the short term, international factors can have a determining effect on the domestic situation.

Although it stayed out of the war, Turkey was deeply affected by it in a great number of ways. When the war came to an end, Turkey had changed beyond recognition.

Production suffered badly due to the war. As a rule, war has a stimulating effect on production in industrialized countries, especially if the country manages to avoid becoming a battlefield. (The U.S. economy grew substantially in both world wars.) But Turkey's economy was basically agricultural and suffered from the mobilization of 1 million men, most of them farmers. In addition, the Office of Soil Products Law (Toprak Mahsulleri Ofisi Kanunu: TMO Law) of 1938 and the National Protection Law (Milli Korunma Kanunu: MKK) dated 18 January 1940 proved counterproductive (Box 3-1). As a result, production fell dramatically and farmers started diverting their crops to the black market. In 1945 agricultural production amounted to 40% of the 1939 level. Industrial production fared no better. While industrial production had doubled through statist planning between 1932 and 1939, in 1945 industrial production was at a level only 20% higher than the 1932 level (Keyder, p. 92).

The table of basic economic indicators (Table 3-2) gives the impression that the GNP at current prices as well as in dollar terms was increasing during the period. But this apparent increase is totally misleading. The increase in the GNP in dollar terms occurred because the rate of exchange of the Turkish currency was fixed at an artificially high level. The increase in the GNP at current prices was entirely due to inflation. The cumulative rise in wholesale prices from 1939 to 1944 reached 381.5%, notwithstanding a 22.2% fall in prices in 1944.

The same misleading situation emerges in the ratio of foreign trade to GNP, which fell from 11.92% to around 5%. This fall in the ratio might indicate that the country was becoming more self-sufficient, but in this case it does not apply. It is due to the fixed parity of the Turkish currency in a high-inflation situation. As a matter of fact, in dollar terms both imports and exports were rising steadily. Con-

Box 3-1. The National Protection Law and Office of Soil Products Law

The National Protection Law (MKK) contained measures to enable the administration to manage the economy in extraordinary war conditions. Among these were measures such as the power to determine levels of production, to take over factories and mines, to take over production and distribution, to set prices, to declare martial law, and to confiscate property (Avcroğlu, p. 221).

In actual practice these measures were not implemented. The government assisted private enterprise by providing loans, purchasing surplus production, guaranteeing profits, and so forth. Low-income groups found their rights restricted through measures such as forced labor, restrictions on the workers rights to change employment, and the obligation to work on holidays or at irregular hours. In the agricultural sector, farmers were allowed to keep a pair of oxen for each plot of 40 dönüms (40,000 square meters). All oxen above this number had to be relinquished to the government to support the national defense effort (Oran 1969, pp. 240–41; K., Boratay, Türkiye'de Devletçilik (1923–1950) [Ankara: SBF Mallye Enstitüsü, 1962], pp. 181–83).

The Office of Soil Products Law (TMO Law) had been enacted to protect the farmer and ensure that there was an adequate national stock of food to meet the nation's needs. Combined with the MKK, its effect was to squeeze destitute farmers. The main concern of the government was to feed the army and provide for the food requirements of the urban population. For this, farmers were compelled to deliver their crops at rock-bottom prices. Meanwhile large landowners were able to divert their grain production to the black market. They also switched their production to high-priced products like cotton and made huge profits and accumulated capital while small and medium-sized farmers were impoverished.

trary to the impression given by the table, Turkey had a serious problem of excessive dependency on Germany in the sphere of foreign trade. As both sides in the war needed Turkey's natural resources, there was a permanent surplus in the balance of Turkey's trade during the war years.

The economic situation was affected not only by the imbalance between supply and demand but also by mismanagement. The table reveals that the rate of inflation jumped from 38.5% in 1941 to 93.7% in 1942. This came about when the newly appointed minister of trade intimated in his electoral district in the Aegean region that prices, which had been kept in check with great difficulty, would be freed. This brought about a chaotic situation. The price of wheat rose from 13.5 kuruş to 100 kuruş, olive oil from 85 kuruş to 300 kuruş (Aydemir, p. 230), and wax from 70 kuruş to 380 kuruş (Oran 1969, p. 242, quoting from Hüseyin Avni [Şanda], Yurt ve Dünya, no. 19, 1 October 1942).

In addition to these negative factors, the repayments of the Ottoman Public Debt in 1942 absorbed 64.18% of Turkey's export earnings.

The economic difficulties had very negative effects on the social structure of the country. In an environment of shortages and soaring prices, small farmers and workers were being badly squeezed. At the same time, the black market enabled traders and large landowners to make huge profits, creating a new class of nouveaux-riches who became the butt of jokes in cartoons. Thanks to the war, this new class transformed itself into a bourgeoisie and soon entered the world of politics.

The general management of the economy was seriously disrupted by the war. In 1936 preparations were being made to launch the second industrialization plan, which would have transferred the production of mass consumption goods to the private sector. As a result of the war, the plan had to be abandoned (Gülalp, p. 32). As a consequence, the policy of industrialization through import substitution was also abandoned, leading to a drying up of public investments. This was a pity, because the policy of import substitution had yielded good results in the preceding period. The shortage of resources brought on by the war also led to falling incomes among workers, who were often working against their will under special wartime legislation. Inevitably the regime lost the support of the masses, who were outraged by the excesses of the profiteers. The social and political consensus that had been assiduously built up from 1923 to 1939 in order to set up the fabric of a nation-state was shattered (Kuruç, p. 26). The people's reaction became manifest in the 1946 election and even more decisively in the election held on 14 May 1950, when the rival of the CHP, the Democratic Party (DP), won. It consisted of a pro-American coalition of large landowners represented by Adnan Menderes and the trading bourgeoisie represented by Celal Bayar.

In these circumstances some CHP leaders attempted to develop a new model of a national consensus to replace the consensus that they felt was probably doomed (Kuruç, p. 26). In this venture they had the support of President Inönü, who described the circumstances of the country in the following terms: "Taking advantage of the unfavorable situation, the corrupt landowners and the greedy traders, who would turn even the air we breathe into a commodity for their personal enrichment, have insolently attempted to undermine the very existence of a great nation" (Oran 1969, p. 243, quoting from Ayın Tarihi 108 [November 1942]: 23). The measures introduced to deal with "greedy landowners" consisted of the Village Institutes Law of 17 April 1940, which had the aim of training young peasants along the lines of the revolution, and the Law to Distribute

Box 3-2. Implementation of the Wealth Tax

The District Director of the Ministry of Finance in Istanbul described the purpose of the Wealth Tax (Ökte, pp. 35-38) in the following terms: (1) raise extra funds for the state; (2) reduce the volume of the currency in circulation to curb inflation; (3) tax the wealth of black marketers and hoarders (assumed to be mostly non-Muslim minority groups engaged in profiteering and exploiting), it would be a one-time tax assessed on large incomes and wealth, with no right of appeal. Assessment would take place in fifteen days, and payment had to follow in fifteen days. This period could be extended a further fifteen days, but a high rate of Interest would apply. Those who did not pay within thirty days faced arrest and being sent to labor camps, where half of their wage earnings would be withheld against their debts to the state. It was estimated that it would take 250 years to settle a tax debt of 100,000 liras by this method (Ökte, p. 57). Those who failed to pay the tax could also have their properties seized and sold with no right of recourse.

Although the text of the legislation makes no mention of "non-Muslims," in practice the main targets of the tax were the minority groups. Taxpayers were placed in one of four categories. The M group (Muslims) was assessed 12.5% of assets. The G group (gayrimüslim: non-Muslims) was assessed 50%. The D group (dönme: converted Jews) was assessed 25%. And the E group (ecnebi: foreign nationals) would pay 12.5%. Farmers were assessed 5% on their assets.

There was also discrimination in the way the assessment was made. A Jewish worker who was employed in oiling the shutters of shops was taxed as an oil dealer, while a non-Muslim merchant in Izmir who sold candy in jars was classified as the owner of a teahouse and taxed accordingly. As a result of arbitrary and discriminatory implementation, non-Muslims paid ten times and dönmes twice as much tax as Muslims. As a consequence, 0.55% of the population was assessed 20% of the total tax. For failing to pay their tax, 1,400 people were hauled to the labor camp at Askale in the eastern province of Erzurum. All of them were non-Muslims, with Jews in the majority. Taxpayers who wanted to avoid this fate sold their property in a market that was already depressed. The buyers were the Muslim merchants who had accumulated capital by profiting from the war and the notables from Anatolia.

The Wealth Tax was based on ethnic and religious discrimination. It was an operation designed to eliminate non-Muslims from the economy. From the state's perspective, it was the third stage in "nationalizing" the economy after Lausanne and the law of 11 June 1932 (see "The Domestic Environment and Dynamics" in Section 2). (The fourth and fifth opportunities were to materialize in 1955 and 1964: see Box 4-13 in Section 4 and the chapter "Relations with Greece" in Section 5.) From a class perspective, the tax provided the first opportunity for the Muslim-Turkish bourgeoisie to acquire capital through a windfall. The second such opportunity was to come in the 1990s through privatization. From Istanbul's perspective, the law represented the replacement of the non-Muslims by landowners and merchants from Anatolia. Finally, from the perspective of Turkey as a whole, this meant that "money had changed hands."

(B. ORAN)

Land to Farmers of 11 June 1945. Article 17 of this law contained provisions for an effective land reform.

The Wealth Tax Law (Varlık Vergisi) of 11 November 1942 was designed to tax the profiteering bourgeoisie. But in the manner of its implementation, it came under the influence of the prevailing international racist currents of that period (Box 3-2). The harshness and arbitrariness of its implementation hardened the opposition of the new class to the CHP, while also attracting severe criticism from international quarters.

But all of these measures were late in coming. The new class had become strong enough to overcome these obstacles. The Law to Distribute Land to Farmers was never implemented. The only effect it had was to lead to the creation of the Democratic Party. The curricula of the Village Institutes were revised in 1947; they were turned into regular schools in 1951 and abolished in 1954. The Wealth Tax was allowed to lapse in March 1944, and no attempt was made to recover unpaid balances.

The new class fervently pushed Turkey into the Western camp. In this it was greatly assisted by the negative effect of the Soviet demands on Turkey made after the war. The new class felt that integrating with the international economy was a precondition for gaining strength and welcomed the Marshall Plan with great enthusiasm.

III. THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE PERIOD

As Table 3-3 shows, the dominant position of Germany in Turkey's foreign trade prior to the war continued during the war years. Germany's chief rival was Britain; Britain's share of Turkey's exports during the war years averaged 17%, while Germany's averaged 28.4%. Britain's share of Turkey's imports averaged 13.4%, while Germany's share reached 23.2%.

Another fact emerges from this table: although the U.S. share in Turkey's imports was fairly modest, the U.S. share in Turkey's exports followed a rising trend. The average for the war years was 17.2%, considerably higher than Britain's average. This can be seen as a harbinger of the close Turkish-U.S. relations that would develop in the postwar period.

A. Basic Objective and Strategy

First, a misconception about Turkish foreign policy during the war must be corrected. Turkey was not "neutral" during the war; it was merely nonbelligerent. This nonbelligerency was heavily biased in favor of the Allies, with Britain as the core.

The objectives of Turkish foreign policy changed during this period, in line with the changing fortunes of war. As already noted, in the early stages of the war Turkey was seeking to reconcile its friendship with Britain with its friendship with the USSR. This represented the ideal situation for Turkey. The signing of the German-Soviet alliance, however, dashed Turkey's hopes of pursuing such a policy.

In 1941, when Turkey found itself facing the Soviet army on its eastern frontier and the German army on its western frontier, Turkey's objective became the avoidance of a double invasion like the one suffered by Poland in September 1939 and Iran in August 1941.

Turkey was able to get over the fear of double invasion in June 1941, when Hitler attacked the USSR. But it was replaced by the worry that Turkey might be "saved" by the USSR following the victory at Stalingrad in 1943.

During this period there were many reasons for Turkish anxiety. Turkey was weak in every respect, especially because its armed forces had been seriously neglected during the period from 1923 to 1939, when socioeconomic development was the priority item on its agenda. Turkey had to make use of these weaknesses to survive (see "The Elements of an SMP: The Economic and Military-Strategic Dimensions" in the Introduction).

B. Basic Tactics

Turkey's main goal was to remain nonbelligerent. Both sides were exerting pressure, and Turkey had to resort to all means and use different tactics to achieve its strategic objective of staying out of the war.

1. Legal Arguments

As expected, the greatest pressure for Turkey to get involved in the war came from the parties in the Tripartite Alliance of 1939, Britain and France. Turkey used three strong arguments to counter this pressure.

- (a) The Tripartite Alliance was signed with Britain and France. By signing an armistice, France, one of the countries that would come to Turkey's assistance, removed itself from the scene. In these circumstances, the argument that Turkey must join the war contradicted the spirit of the alliance.
- (b) Protocol No. 2 annexed to the Tripartite Alliance stipulated that "Turkey could not be forced into any action that might drag it into an armed conflict with the USSR." As the invasion of Poland demonstrated, Turkey might become the victim of a Soviet attack if it entered the war. Consequently, Protocol No. 2 precluded Turkey from getting directly involved in the war.

(c) Article 6 of the Special Agreement signed along with the Tripartite Alliance provided for Turkey carrying out its commitment to enter the war only after France and Britain had furnished the promised military equipment to Turkey. In other words, Turkey was not bound to enter the war before taking delivery of the arms that had been promised. Turkey would use this argument that the arms assistance that it was receiving was inadequate all the way to the end of the war.

Turkey avoided entering the war by taking advantage of the differences between the opposing sides as well as the differences within the two sides. It also used its own internal difficulties arising from its weaknesses.

Differences between Axis Powers

After Turkey led Germany to understand that it was staying aloof because of Italy's aggressive stance, Germany's Ambassador von Papen requested his Foreign Ministry to restrain Italy. When Germany and the USSR were in alliance prior to June 1941, Turkey was able to counter German pressure by referring to a potential Soviet threat.

Internal Differences among the Allies

These differences existed even within the British administration. In his speech of 11 July 1941, foreign secretary Lord Halifax declared that Turkey was justified in remaining nonbelligerent (Hale, p. 84). The chief of the British General Staff declared that, in the event of Turkey entering the war and being attacked by Germany, Britain would find it difficult to field the necessary forces to come to Turkey's assistance. Turkey used these arguments to steer clear of the war. If Turkey came under German occupation, it argued, the Allies would have to divide and divert their forces to liberate it and its nonbelligerency would actually harm Germany.

The Opportunities Created by Turkey's Weakness

Unlike the Allies, Turkey was threatened on two fronts: by the Axis and the USSR. (The term "axis" was derived from the Nazi-Fascist agreement of October 1936, in which Germany and Italy declared that the Berlin-Rome axis was "Europe's perpendicular axis.") İnönü utilized this double threat to his advantage. He used the German threat as the reason given to the Allies for not getting involved in the war, while in 1940 the Soviet threat was the reason for not implementing the Tripartite Alliance (Hale, p. 103).

But most of all Turkey used two of its own weaknesses to find a way out. If Turkey got engaged in war, it was argued, the country would be invaded, which would have drastic geostrategic consequences for its friends. As long as the Turkish army was inadequate for the country's defense, Turkey could not enter the war. These arguments were also used to secure additional military equipment.

Differences between the Opposing Parties and among the Allies

The pressures for Turkey getting involved in the war or staying out of it came from different countries in the two camps and changed according to the fortunes of war. This provided Turkey with freedom of maneuver. In 1940–41, before attacking the Soviet Union, Germany was pressing Turkey to join the war. In 1942–44 it was Britain and the U.S. that wanted to see Turkey in the war. The British considered it in their interest for Turkey to remain nonbelligerent in 1940–41, while it was the Germans who wanted Turkey not to get involved in the conflict after 1943. When the USSR came to the conclusion that it could win the war on its own, it wanted Turkey to stay out in order to keep it isolated.

While Turkey was able to fend off the pressures to become involved in the war, it also used the blandishments from the opposing parties to gain time. To cite an example, the Germans offered to give Turkey the Aegean islands. Since Lausanne, Turkey had been pursuing the policy of being a nation-state with defensible borders. Although it found the German offer of territorial expansion to be in conflict with its basic policy, Turkey kept this item on its agenda for a considerable length of time. Another instance of this policy involved Turkish minorities beyond its frontiers. Turkish foreign policy was based on maintaining a distance from minorities, especially from those in the USSR. Nevertheless, Turkey kept up a longlasting dialogue started by the German Ministry of Foreign Affairs on the subject of organizing the Turks of the USSR. After a year of futile talks, von Ribbentrop was fed up and gave instructions for these talks to be ended.

Turkey took advantage of the contradictions among the parties by alternately taking sides with one or the other, with some leaders appearing as Anglophiles while others appeared as Germanophiles. When German warships passed through the Turkish Straits disguised as merchant vessels, the British ambassador lodged a complaint with Prime Minister Saracoğlu, who replied that he had lost control over Minister of Foreign Affairs Menemencioğlu, who enjoyed the backing of the chief of the General Staff, Marshal Çakmak. When German ships were subsequently turned back in similar circumstances, however,

Menemencioğlu told the German ambassador that he had received his orders from the prime minister and that "regretfully" there was nothing he could do about the matter. In this scenario, President İnönü and Prime Minister Saracoğlu were represented as being pro-British while Minister of Foreign Affairs Menemencioğlu and the chief of the General Staff, Marshal Çakmak, were ostensibly pro-German. The Germans pressed for Saracoğlu's dismissal, although his ideology was nationalism bordering on racism and he was also a confirmed anti-Communist. (In Ottoman times European powers used to consider some Ottoman prime ministers sympathetic to their cause, which may have provided the inspiration for this game that was being reenacted during the war.)

When Germany appeared to be losing the war, the pro-Germans were dumped on the grounds of raison d'état (see Box Intro-4 in the Introduction). The "permanent" chief of the General Staff of the Republican era retired in January 1944. Menemencioğlu, who had allowed German warships disguised as merchant vessels to pass through the Straits, was forced to resign on 25 June 1944.

3. Domestic Policies as Instruments of Foreign Policy

Domestic politics in Turkey during the war was completely under the influence of the vicissitudes of the war. This was due in large part to tactical calculations on the part of the government and was designed to keep Turkey out of the war by favoring the side that seemed to be prevailing at the time. Public life and even court decisions were arranged to conform to the side that was currently strongest. There are many examples of this comportment.

On 18 March 1940 Turkey signed a trade agreement with Germany that excluded chromium, an important commodity used in the production of weapons. After Germany defeated France in the summer of 1940 and then attacked the USSR in June 1941, chromium was added to the agreement, and large deliveries were made to Germany. When the tide turned and Germany started to falter, deliveries were stopped in April 1944.

In February 1942 an attempt was made on the life of Germany's Ambassador von Papen in Ankara. It was discovered that the two Soviet nationals who had instigated the assassination attempt had taken refuge in the Soviet Consulate in Istanbul. Although it was against usual practice, the consulate was surrounded on the night of 5–6 March; the authorities gave notice that the men would be forcibly apprehended if they were not surrendered within forty-eight hours. The two men were tried, and each got a prison sentence of sixteen years and eight months (Oran 1970, p. 53). This was one year before the Soviet victory at Stalingrad. When Turkey severed its diplomatic links with Germany on 2 August 1944, the two prisoners were released the following week.

The control of the press was more stringent than ever during the war years, including strict rules about even the size of type that was to be used in reporting war news. When Germany was advancing, there was much praise in the press for Germany and for the Pan-Turanian movements (racist and expansionist Turkism with the aim to unite all Turkic peoples politically) in Turkey. To start with, Saracoğlu was the prime minister at that time. He was the person who declared: "We are Turks, we are Pan-Turkists and will always remain Pan-Turkists. For us, Pan-Turkism is a matter of blood and even more so of conscience and culture" (Oran 1969, p. 251, quoting from Ayın Tarihi 105 [August 1942]: 31) and who was to introduce the notorious Wealth Tax three months later.

In July 1943, however, a few months after Stalingrad, a brochure was published that declared Pan-Turkism/Pan-Turanianism to be the "greatest danger." This was a sign that everything had now changed. The leader of the Pan-Turkist/Pan-Turanian movement, Nihal Atsız, was sentenced to four months in prison for allegedly slandering the leftist writer Sabahattin Ali. On 18 May an official communication revealed that Professor Z. V. Togan and R. O. Türkkan, who were prominent Pan-Turanian writers like Atsız, had been arrested. The official daily organ of the CHP, Ulus, claimed that Pan-Turanian thinkers could have nothing to do with the party. The next day, at the 19 May holiday celebrations, President İnönü declared that twenty-three people including university professors and young officers like Alparslan Türkeş, an army colonel who was to play an important role in the 1960 coup d'état and eventually become the founder of the extreme-right Nationalist Action Party (Milliyetçi Hareket Partisi: MHP) in 1969, had been brought to trial, because "these racists and Turanians have engaged in covert intrigues." He added: "We shall steadfastly defend our nation against such seditious elements" (Oran 1969, p. 253, quoting from the daily Tan, 19 May 1944). On 29 March 1945 those who stood accused were sentenced to varying prison terms by the martial law tribunals.

But the Military Court of Appeals quashed these sentences on 23 October 1945, and the defendants were all released. This happened four and a half months after V. M. Molotov demanded bases in the Straits and a revision of the Turkish-Soviet frontier as a condition for renewing the 1925 Turkish-Soviet Treaty at his meeting with ambassador Selim Sarper on 7 June 1945. All of the accused would eventually be acquitted on 31 March 1947, nineteen days after the Truman Doctrine was proclaimed.

IV. GENERAL APPRAISAL

World War II was a period that perfectly concretized the calamities that being "strategic" could cause for a medium state. Turkey survived, however, by using the balances and contradictions arising from the extraordinary wartime circumstances. In carrying out this feat, it adhered to the principle of serving the national interest in its rawest form. İnönü, who was a master at performing balancing acts and a model of caution, could claim a large share of the credit for carrying out this feat.

During this period Turkey was surrounded on all sides by armed conflict. Its foreign policy was not the sum of its relations with different states but rather the reflection of the fortunes of war. This foreign policy consisted of daily adjustments to domestic policies and foreign relations, depending on the way the war developed. This was the approach that allowed Turkey to come out of the war unscathed.

This success during the war brought postwar problems for Turkey. Turkey used every excuse and pretext to stay out of the conflict to the end, thus sparing the nation from the carnage of war. When İnönü was criticized for his wartime policies that drove people to drink tea with dried raisins as a sweetener because sugar was unaffordable, he replied, "Yes, but I did not make your child a war orphan." Now that the war was at an end, Turkey was quite alone and isolated.

This isolation forced Turkey to abandon and reverse its previous autonomous policies. The Soviet Union was repelling Turkey, while the U.S. was drawing Turkey into its fold as the Cold War was getting underway. The bipolar world was having its effect. The developments in the class structure of the nation were also contributing to Turkey's new realignment.

One final comment should be made on the subject. Because of Turkey's strategic location, İstanbul in particular was swarming with spies during World War II. Both sides tried, by different methods, to win over important people to attain their objectives. It is known that the Germans bribed influential people with gold marks (see Box 3-5 below). It is to be expected that some high-level officials would be sympathetic to one side or the other. But these officials, whatever their leanings or their ideologies, never failed to serve the basic objective and strategy of Turkish foreign policy: to stay out of the conflict and pursue the policy of "active neutrality." Saracoğlu and his colleagues kept their personal ideological leanings out of foreign policy even when Germany had a dominant hold on Turkey's foreign trade.

World War II and Turkey, 1939–1945

Turkey's International Commitments at the Outbreak of the War

When war broke out on 1 September 1939 with Germany's invasion of Poland, Turkey's main concern was to weather the storm without damage to its national sovereignty and its territorial integrity. But as the events of the next six years showed, this was no easy task. In order to ensure that Turkey emerged from the war without being invaded and with minimum damage, the decision-makers in Ankara were forced to steer a difficult course through the power struggles and clashes of interest of major powers. Much of their policy consisted of improvisation; still, it was a resounding success for a relatively small country trying to implement its national policy under pressure from major powers of the day.

In the process leading to war, Turkey sought to reconcile the contradictory aims of warring parties while scrupulously avoiding commitments that might drag it into war. It signed only nonaggression and mutual security agreements and sought to ensure the security of its frontiers without fully joining any of the blocs that were emerging in Europe. Among the agreements that Turkey had signed by September 1939, only the Balkan Pact somewhat limited Turkey's freedom of action and committed it to go to war under very specific circumstances. None of Turkey's other international engagements contained such a commitment. They merely included commitments to refrain from aggression. Furthermore, the provisions of the Balkan Pact did not address a war against a major power.

When war broke out on 1 September 1939, Turkey's international obligations that might affect its relations with the belligerent parties were the following:

- 1. The 1928 Kellogg-Briand Pact, outlawing war as an instrument of foreign policy.
- 2. The Friendship and Neutrality (Nonaggression) Treaty signed with the USSR on 17 December 1925 and its extensions, which committed Turkey to neutrality and nonaggression.

- 3. The Friendship and Cooperation Treaty signed with Afghanistan on 25 May 1928, by which each of the two countries committed itself not to enter into any pact directed against the other.
- 4. The Treaty of Neutrality, Conciliation, and Adjudication signed with Italy on 30 May 1928, which contained the commitment not to join "any political or economic agreement or arrangement directed at one of the parties" and to remain neutral in the event of one of the parties coming under attack.
- 5. The protocol signed with the Soviet Union on 17 December 1929, extending the Friendship and Neutrality (Nonaggression) Treaty of 17 December 1925. This protocol contained the commitment "not to enter into any negotiation for the purpose of concluding political agreements with states that are direct neighbors by sea or land of the other party without first notifying the other party and to conclude such agreements only with the consent of the other party."
- 6. The Treaty of Friendship and the Treaty of Security, Neutrality, and Economic Cooperation signed with Iran on 5 December 1932, which committed Turkey to nonaggression and neutrality.
- 7. The Balkan Pact of 9 February 1934, which contained the commitment to intervene in the event of an attack on a Balkan state by another Balkan state singly or in alliance with another state.
- 8. The Sadabad Pact of 8 July 1937, which committed its members not to intervene in one another's internal affairs, to respect the inviolability of borders, and to refrain from aggression.
- 9. The declarations signed with Britain on 12 May 1939 and with France on 23 June 1939, which contained the mutual commitment to provide assistance in the event of war in the Mediterranean and the declaration of intent to conclude a treaty to this end.

In examining Turkey's policies during the war, we can distinguish three subperiods in parallel with the course of the war outside Turkey: 1939–41, when Germany was in full swing and both sides were positioning themselves; 1941–43, when German pressure on Turkey was intense; and 1943–45, when Germany was retreating and the Allies had the upper hand. Turkey's domestic and foreign policies at the time followed closely the development of the war outside Turkey and readily adapted to its changes.

1939–1941: THE BELLIGERENTS COURT TURKEY

A. The Road Leading to War

The Italian Threat

Italy's invasion of Albania on April 12, 1939, with thirty divisions was seen in Ankara as a tangible threat to Turkey's security zone. Italy was already a direct neighbor through its possession of the Dodecanese Islands. Its expansionism in the Balkans compounded the concern in Ankara, where it was perceived at that time as the sole major power with designs on Turkish territory.

At the Second Fascist Congress on 19 March 1934, Mussolini declared that "Italy's historical objectives are in Asia and Africa" and that "this should be considered a natural expansion." When the Turkish ambassador in Rome sought a clarification of this statement, Mussolini claimed that he had not meant Turkey, which he considered to be a European power. This disclaimer was far from reassuring for Turkey, given that 95% of its territory was located in Asia (Ataöv 1965, pp. 135–36).

Mussolini's frequent references to "Mare Nostrum" (Our Sea) when talking about the Mediterranean also gave rise to anxieties in Turkey, which was already suspicious because of the concentration of Italian forces in the Dodecanese Islands. The sinking of merchant vessels by unidentified submarines in the vicinity of Turkish territorial waters starting in 1937 also led to the suspicion in Ankara that Italy was responsible for these acts of aggression. There was a feeling in Turkish circles that, having failed to get its slice of Anatolian territory after World War I, Italy would use the first opportunity to make up for its failure.

On 13 April, following Italy's invasion of Albania, Britain and France offered guarantees to Greece and Romania against a possible attack. When Britain offered a similar guarantee to Turkey, Ankara turned down the unilateral guarantee. Instead of accepting a guarantee that would draw the ire of the Axis powers, Ankara proposed that negotiations be started, with the aim of concluding a treaty of alliance between Turkey and Britain containing specific reciprocal commitments.

At the same time, negotiations were going on between Turkey and the USSR to conclude a similar agreement on cooperation and solidarity. Ankara transmitted the Anglo-French proposals of 13 April that very day to Moscow to get the Soviet reaction. In response, Soviet foreign minister Molotov sent a letter to Turkish president İsmet İnönü on 15 April in which he proposed bilateral consultations to consider the measures to be adopted to counter a possible attack, bearing in mind the new situation prevailing in the Balkans and the Black Sea region. He suggested Batumi or Tbilisi as the venue for these consultations. In its reply dated 17 April, the Turkish government accepted the Soviet proposal but suggested Ankara or İstanbul as the venue. The Soviet response on 19 April requested that minister of foreign affairs Şükrü Saraçoğlu come to Moscow "expeditiously." The next day Saracoğlu summoned the Soviet chargé d'affaires to his office and asked for a postponement of the visit to Moscow, agreeing to the original Soviet proposal to meet in Batumi. The Soviets replied that they considered Saracoğlu's offer to go to Moscow to be a promise; in order not to delay consultations, they would agree to send deputy commissar for foreign affairs Grigory A. Potemkin to Ankara on 28 April.

The intensity of these exchanges over a period of fifteen days was an indication that the two sides were unsure of each other's positions and were anxious to determine the other's real intentions. In line with the agreement reached, Deputy Commissar Potemkin arrived in Ankara on 28 April. All out this time, Germany demonstrated the importance that it attributed to Turkey by appointing one of its senior diplomats, Franz von Papen, as its ambassador to Ankara. The new ambassador's first task was to reassure Turkey about Italy's intentions and prevent Ankara from drifting into the Anglo-French orbit. In this context von Papen proposed to Berlin that Italy maintain a minimum number of troops in Albania, that Turkey be offered a nonaggression pact, and that the island of Meis (Kastellorizo), one of the Dodecanese Islands located in Turkish territorial waters, be ceded to Turkey along with some other islets. The German Ministry of Foreign Affairs ignored these proposals, because they would clearly be unacceptable to Italy.

In these circumstances, Turkey perceived Italy's Albanian operation as part of a joint plan by the Axis powers and decided to take measures to prepare for all possible eventualities. To this end, Turkey sought to draw closer to Britain and France while preserving its friendship with the USSR. As a result, when Potemkin arrived in Ankara, he was given the details of the negotiations going on with Britain and was told that Ankara wanted to conclude a similar mutual assistance agreement with the USSR. In this manner Turkey was complying with the terms of article 2/1 of the protocol of 1929 that it had signed with the USSR. At that time, the USSR was conducting similar negotiations with Germany but did not bother to inform Turkey about it. On the contrary, it proposed that the two countries cooperate against Germany and recommended that negotiations be pursued with Britain and France to find ways to check Germany. It should be recalled that under the 1929 protocol the USSR did not have the obligation to inform Turkey of its negotiations with Germany. Still, Moscow was pushing Turkey to become engaged in anti-German arrangements at a time when the USSR itself was involved in negotiations with Germany to conclude a nonaggression pact. This gave some idea of how the Soviets perceived Turkey's role in the approaching conflict.

Potemkin's visit ended on 5 May. A joint communiqué was issued, stating that there was a full conformity of views between the two countries on international issues. Later developments preceding the visit of Saracoğlu to Moscow in September, however, demonstrated that the state of relations between the two neighbors did not conform to the wording of the joint communiqué. As Europe drifted toward war, Turkey was unaware of the Soviet negotiations with both Germany and Britain and France. This led Ankara to pursue the unattainable objective of simultaneous friendship with Britain, France, and the USSR.

The Joint Statements

In the meantime Turkey's negotiations with Britain led to the signing of a joint statement on 12 May 1939 (see "The Road Leading to the Tripartite Alliance of Turkey, Britain, and France [The Ankara Pact]" in Section 2).

A similar joint statement would be signed with France in Paris on 23 June, the day when the Hatay agreement between the two states was signed in Ankara. Article 2 of the document signed with Britain announced that the two states would "sign a long-term definitive agreement containing reciprocal commitments designed to ensure [their] national security." Article 3 further provided that, "pending the signing of a definitive agreement, the parties shall cooperate effectively and lend each other all possible assistance in the event of an attack in the Mediterranean region leading to war."

In the course of the negotiations Britain proposed that this clause should also include the Balkan region, but Turkey refused to agree because of its agreements with the USSR and Bulgaria. Britain's desire to include the Balkan region was based on the calculation that, if it had to assist Romania in compliance with the guarantees it had given, such assistance could only be delivered through the Turkish Straits. Under the Montreux Convention, however, belligerents' warships could not pass through the Straits. This would be possible only if Turkey was also a belligerent. But Turkey was reluctant to get involved in a guarantee to Romania that might bring it into confrontation with the Soviet Union and therefore refused to go along with Britain's proposal.

Article 4 of the joint statement made clear that neither this statement nor the envisaged agreement would be directed at any state and called for mutual assistance only in the event that it was clearly necessary. Article 7 provided that the document would not preclude the contracting parties from concluding agreements with other states for the purpose of promoting peace. This clause was designed to help Turkey in its relations with the USSR. To sum up, the joint statement, pending the conclusion of a definitive treaty, called for mutual assistance only in the event of an attack occurring in the Mediterranean. Although it was not stated openly, the potential aggressor was clearly Italy. Article 6 declared that the parties would merely consult one another on the question of Balkan security, thus precluding the possibility of a Turkish confrontation with Germany or the Soviet Union.

When Germany became aware of the forthcoming joint British-Turkish statement, it tried unsuccessfully to prevent its signing. The USSR appeared to approve the joint statement but was not pleased to see Turkey coming under British influence. Italy saw the arrangement as directed against it; claiming that the Dodecanese Islands were under threat, it signed a military alliance agreement with Germany in Berlin on 20 May. With this alliance, Italy had sided with Germany in the approaching conflict.

While Turkey was at an advanced phase in its preliminary contacts aimed at signing mutual assistance agreements with both the USSR and Britain and France, the USSR was carrying on similar negotiations with the Western powers. Because the Western powers dragged their feet at these negotiations, Moscow ended the talks and on 23 August 1939 signed a nonaggression pact with Germany. This unexpected development shocked all of the international actors, including Turkey. Until that time, Turkey had sought to reconcile its rapprochement with Britain and France with its policy of close friendship with the USSR. The German-Soviet Pact started a new and very difficult era for Turkey's foreign policy. This pact made a Turkish-Soviet alliance difficult to achieve. Until then, Turkey had expected that Britain, France, and the USSR would eventually unite in the face of the German threat. When seeking cooperation with Britain and France, Ankara had assumed that the main threat would come from the Mediterranean and possibly from the Balkan Peninsula. Turkey now realized that it had come to a parting of ways with the USSR, a country with which it had maintained cordial relations ever since the days of the War of Liberation. Henceforth it would have to rely on the guarantees of the two Western states in the changed circumstances of the day. Nevertheless, Turkey did not abandon all hope of concluding an alliance with the Soviets that did not conflict with the Tripartite Alliance, which was now ready for signature.

When World War II broke out with Germany's attack on Poland on 1 September 1939 and the subsequent declaration of war by Britain and France on 3 September, negotiations were still in progress to conclude the Turkish-British-French alliance while the Turkish-Soviet talks dragged on.

Although the first year of the war was totally confined to Europe, Turkey sought to create a solid Balkan bloc in order to prevent a German or Soviet move to the region but failed. The Balkan states were averse to doing anything that might be construed by Germany as a provocation. Furthermore, they perceived Turkey's moves stressing cooperation in the field of defense as a maneuver designed to draw them into the British-French orbit.

The Saracoğlu Mission

On August 4, at a time when Turkey still had not lost hope of reaching a deal with Moscow and the Soviet-British-French contacts were still in progress, the Soviet ambassador in Ankara, A. V. Terentiev, called on Saracoğlu. He informed the minister about the negotiations with the Western powers in Moscow and reassured him that these contacts were progressing in a satisfactory manner. He inquired about Turkey's views regarding the conclusion of a pact or a mutual assistance treaty within the framework of the discussions held with Potemkin and invited Saracoğlu to Moscow to discuss the issue with the Soviet leadership. Saracoğlu, after consulting the government, responded affirmatively on August 10 and asked the ambassador to provide a draft text for the proposed treaty. Three days later, the ambassador called on the minister once again and raised a number of questions about Turkish views on the proposed treaty and its area of implementation. The same questions were also submitted in written form to the Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs on 24 August, one day after the signing of the German-Soviet Nonaggression Pact. Turkey's answers to the questions, which had already been prepared, were submitted the next day, on 25 August.

On 4 September the Soviet ambassador called on Saracoğlu once again and submitted a note verbale explaining the Soviet position with respect to the latest developments. The Soviet text explained that the talks with Britain and France had yielded no results. In order to forestall a possible plot against the USSR on the part of Britain and Germany, Moscow had accepted Berlin's proposal for concluding a nonaggression pact. In these circumstances, the text argued, it would be necessary to reappraise the relations between the USSR and Turkey in view of the completely changed international scene. On 8 September Ankara responded positively to this Soviet proposal; and on 15 September Saracoğlu was officially invited to visit Moscow. A Soviet warship and a special train were placed at his disposal, and he arrived in Moscow on 25 September 1939. He was returning Potemkin's visit to Ankara and would be discussing issues between the two states. On 23 September, one day after Saracoğlu left for Moscow, Turkey, Britain, and France initialed their treaty; but the signing was postponed until the results of the Saracoğlu mission became known.

Saracoğlu's mission when he was leaving for Moscow was still to try to find points of concordance between the soon-to-be-signed Turkish-British-French alliance and Turkish-Soviet friendship. The USSR, however, only one month after having signed an agreement with Germany, was seeking to change Montreux to suit its purposes, discover the true content of the Tripartite Alliance, and ensure Turkey's neutrality. Throughout Saracoğlu's visit to Moscow, the Soviets kept harping on the need to amend the Montreux Convention. According to archive documents that were declassified after the war, the Germans had formally requested the USSR on 2 September to secure Turkey's permanent neutrality, which was essential, among other reasons, for the delivery of materials to Romania through the Turkish Straits. The invitation to Saracoğlu came two days later, on 4 September, so there can be little doubt about the USSR's intention for the meeting.

It was difficult for Moscow and Ankara to find common ground at the negotiating table when their objectives were so divergent. Although the talks started in a cordial atmosphere on 26 September, Molotov's attempt to hand Saracoğlu a paper containing amendments that the USSR wanted to see in the Montreux Convention and Saracoğlu's refusal even to receive such a paper, let alone examine it, created a tense atmosphere on the very first day. Although the Soviet paper was withdrawn at this stage, it kept reappearing in different forms at subsequent meetings. After the frosty ending of the first meeting, the talks were suspended when Germany's Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop paid a visit to Moscow between 27 and 29

Box 3-3. Soviet Demands for Amendments to the Montreux Straits Convention (1 October 1939)

The text of the document that V. M. Molotov attempted to hand over to Saracoğlu on 1 October 1939 consisted of a series of Soviet demands. They were again brought to Saracoğlu's attention at subsequent meetings and were reiterated at the end of World War II. The demands consisted of following points:

- 1. Whenever the question of the passage of third-country warships through the Straits comes up, whether in time of peace or in time of war, and regardless of whether Turkey is a belligerent or not, the Turkish and Soviet governments shall hold consultations and reach a joint decision.
- Turkey shall prevent the passage of non-Black Sea Power warships through the Straits in excess of one-fifth of the tonnage allowed in article 18 [of the Montreux Convention].
- Turkey shall not allow access to the Black Sea for warships of non-Black Sea Powers sent for a humanitarian purpose without the consent of the USSR.
- 4. The passage of warships of belligerent states through the Straits in accordance with articles 19 and 25 shall only be possible if the USSR notifies the League of Nations of its approval.
- 5. Merchant vessels of third states transiting the Straits under the terms of article 4 that happen to be carrying military equipment or military personnel shall be considered naval auxiliary vessels and articles 20 and 21 shall apply in such cases. In these circumstances, the passage of merchant vessels of third states in time of war, Turkey being nonbelligerent or considering itself to be threatened with imminent danger of war, will be left entirely to Turkey's discretion.

- 6. The passage of Soviet submarines through the Straits into or out of the Black Sea shall not be confined to the cases cited in article 12 of the Convention but shall be allowed in all situations involving the defense of Turkish or Soviet Interests as well as in situations involving the carrying out of commitments under the Turkish-Soviet Mutual Assistance Pact.
- 7. When Soviet vessels of war transit the Straits in order to carry out commitments under the Turkish-Soviet Pact more effectively, the 8-day notification period may be shortened to 2 days when necessary.
- 8. The 3-day notification period foreseen in article 23 may be shortened to 1 day when necessary.
- 9. In accordance with the spirit of the Turkish-Soviet Pact, the parties shall notify each other of the aggregate tonnage of their navies in the Black Sea twice a year, on 1 January and 1 July.
- no. Turkey and the USSR commit themselves not to change the regime of the Straits unilaterally, not to enter into any negotiations with third states regarding the said regime, and not to reach any agreement on this question without first consulting each other and obtaining the other party's prior consent.
- TI. This secret protocol supplements the Turkish-Soviet Mutual Assistance Pact and constitutes an integral part of that Pact.

September. During this visit the partition line in Poland was drawn, and the German and Soviet zones of influence in the Balkans were decided. Meanwhile Saracoğlu was getting impatient as he waited at the Spridonuka Palace in Moscow. He realized that the USSR would not be able to conclude a treaty with Turkey after reaching an agreement with Germany. Saracoğlu sought Ankara's permission to return if no agreement emerged from the negotiations. Ankara's response gave an indication of Turkey's priorities. It instructed Saracoğlu to make an effort to pursue the negotiations and try to make an appraisal of the USSR's true intentions. In case Saracoğlu determined that no deal could be made with the Soviets or that they were completely lacking in goodwill, he could then bring forward the date of his return.

The Turkish-Soviet talks resumed on 1 October, this time with the participation of Stalin himself. Nonetheless, the talks failed to make any progress, because the Soviet agenda still included items such as amending the Montreux Convention, joint defense of the Straits, exclusion of the warships of non-Black Sea Powers from the Turkish Straits, and changes in the draft Turkish-British-French agreement (Box 3-3).

Toward the end of the meeting, Molotov raised the issue of the text relating to Montreux, which he had sought to hand over to Saracoğlu at the first meeting. Saracoğlu inquired whether this text was tied to the mutual assistance agreement that was being contemplated and if rejection of one meant rejection of the other. Upon receiving an affirmative reply, Saracoğlu declared that he was ready to call off the negotiations at that point and requested that Stalin facilitate his arrangements for returning home.

Stalin then declared that the two questions could be settled separately. Saracoğlu asked that the text that Molotov kept bringing up be withdrawn once and for all. Stalin took a glance at the text and replied: "This text is unsatisfactory and clumsily written; I withdraw it. Let us confine ourselves this time to signing the pact" (Gürün 1983, pp. 66–70). This intervention helped reduce the tension. The meeting was adjourned to allow Turkey to discuss with the related parties the changes that Stalin had asked to be made in the Turkish-British-French agreement. At the third meeting, held on 13 October, however, another text similar to the ominous text relating to the Straits would surface once again.

In the meantime Stalin submitted a note in his own handwriting containing the amendments he wanted to see inserted in the draft of the Turkish-British-French agreement, including the following:

- 1. The commitment undertaken by Turkey in connection with the British guarantee given to Romania and Greece contained in article 3 of the draft prepared with Britain was to be removed from that article and inserted in articles 4 or 5 dealing with consultations.
- 2. The protocol expressing Turkey's reservations was to include the phrase "these commitments shall not compel Turkey to assist Britain and France should they engage in war with Russia, in which case the Turkish-British-French agreement shall not be implemented for the duration of the war."

When Britain and France accepted these proposed amendments, the negotiations were resumed on 13 October, after a lapse of twelve days.

During this period the Soviets sought to introduce a new reservation to the Soviet-Turkish agreement. The reservation, requested by Germany, would negate the Soviet commitment to assist Turkey in the event of a German attack on Turkey. At the second meeting, held on 1 October, the Soviets had already called for introducing clauses to the draft agreement that would reflect the new state of German-Soviet relations. When Saracoğlu objected to them, Stalin indicated that he would not insist. It appears that in the meantime the Germans had made further representations and insisted on the introduction of these reservations. At the meeting held on 13 October, when Saracoğlu pointed out that the reservations would render the agreement meaningless and bring about a deadlock in the negotiations, the question was left for the subsequent meeting. Then Molotov attempted to return to the Montreux issue and met with the same objections. Saracoğlu even refused to countenance a statement declaring that the two sides would reexamine the issue in the future, while Molotov kept on insisting on both the German reservations and the issue of amending the regime of the Straits. The meeting was adjourned without reaching any agreement.

At the fourth and last meeting, held on October 15, Molotov came back to the Montreux issue and presented a new document different in form from the first one but similar in content. Once again Saracoğlu refused to consider the Soviet document. Instead of including all the provisions regulating the passage of warships of non-

Black Sea Powers in time of peace and time of war, the new Soviet formulation proposed to make amendments only to articles 20 and 21 of the Montreux Convention. Article 20 provided that in time of war, Turkey being nonbelligerent, the provisions of articles 10 to 18 would not be applicable and the passage of warships would be left entirely to the discretion of the Turkish government, Article 21 provided that, when Turkey considered itself to be threatened with imminent danger of war, it would have the right to apply the provisions of article 20. In relation to these articles, the new Soviet draft was as follows: "To secure the most effective protection of the joint interests of Turkey and the Soviet Union in the Straits and the Black Sea region, the two governments have agreed on the need to act in concert in regard to the exclusion from the Black Sea of the warships, auxiliary vessels, and military transport vessels of non-Black Sea Powers within the terms of the Montreux Convention and, in particular, articles 20 and 21" (Gürün 1983, pp. 66–70).

In this way the Soviets were proposing that in situations when Turkey was a belligerent or considered itself to be threatened with imminent danger of war the decisions regarding the passage of vessels not belonging to Black Sea Powers would be taken jointly. Saracoğlu rejected this proposal, which would force Turkey to share with another country a right that had been granted exclusively to itself by an international agreement. By that point Saracoğlu had concluded that no agreement could emerge from the negotiations while the Soviets kept employing the tactic of constantly putting him off, so he informed his hosts that he wanted to go home.

The visit had originally been planned to last three days but went on for twenty-three days. In describing the unsuccessful negotiations, Saracoğlu later commented: "We seemed to be at each other's throats much of the time" (Gürün 1983, pp. 66–70). The foreign minister left Moscow on 17 October and arrived in Turkey on 20 October 1939. When the news of the failure of the negotiations reached Ankara, the Tripartite Alliance was signed on 19 October and went into immediate effect while the foreign minister was still on his way back. Thus Turkey and the USSR had come to a parting of ways. According to prime minister Refik Saydam, the reason for the failure of the talks was the incompatibility of the Soviet demands with the Tripartite Alliance, which was ready for signature, and with Turkey's international commitments within the context of the Straits. Also, the guarantees offered by the Soviets to ensure Turkey's security were not commensurate with the demands from Turkey (Armaoğlu, p. 147).

The Moscow talks can be taken as a turning point in Turkish-Soviet relations. Up to that time, Turkey had always acted in consultation with the USSR and shied away from all anti-Soviet compacts. Ankara scrupulously kept Moscow informed about all of its relevant international talks and agreements. The Soviets, in return, kept trying to get Turkey to renounce the Tripartite Alliance throughout Saracoğlu's stay in Moscow. Furthermore, they came up with a revised draft text of a bilateral treaty that included subjects that did not figure in the text that had been agreed to previously. In addition, their insistence on demands made in connection with the Montreux Convention raised serious doubts in Ankara about Soviet intentions. These doubts would last until the end of the war.

2. The Tripartite Alliance

Officially known as the Treaty of Mutual Assistance between Turkey, Britain, and France, the Tripartite Alliance was signed on 19 October 1939 by prime minister Dr. Refik Saydam for Turkey, ambassador Hugh Montgomery Knatchbull-Hugessen for Britain, and ambassador René Massigli for France. The treaty's main provisions were the following.

Article 1: "If Turkey finds itself at war with a European state following an attack by this state on Turkey, France and the United Kingdom shall actively cooperate with Turkey and render it all possible assistance and support."

Article 2.1: "In the event of an attack by a European state leading to war in the Mediterranean region involving France and the United Kingdom, Turkey shall actively cooperate with these countries and render them all possible assistance and support."

Article 2.2: "In the event of an attack by a European state leading to war in the Mediterranean region involving Turkey, France and the United Kingdom shall actively cooperate with Turkey and render it all possible assistance and support."

Article 3: "So long as the guarantees given by France and the United Kingdom to Greece and to Romania by their respective declarations of 13 April 1939 remain in force, Turkey shall actively cooperate with France and the United Kingdom and shall provide all possible assistance and support in the event of hostilities arising from one of the aforementioned guarantees that might involve France and the United Kingdom."

Article 4: "In the event of an attack on France or the United Kingdom not covered under articles 2 and 3 leading to war against the attacker, the high contracting parties shall immediately enter into consultations... In such a case, Turkey shall pursue toward France and the United Kingdom a policy of at least benevolent neutrality."

Article 6: "The present treaty is not directed against any state."

The treaty consisted of nine articles, a special agreement, a secret military convention, and three protocols, one of them secret. It was designed to secure mutual assistance in the event of an attack by a European state that would lead to war in the Mediterranean involving Turkey, France, or the United Kingdom (article 2). If the war did not spread to the Mediterranean, the parties would consult; in this particular situation Turkey would pursue a policy of at least benevolent neutrality vis-à-vis Britain and France (article 4). Should Turkey be attacked by a European power, Britain and France would assist Turkey (article 1), while Turkey would assist Britain and France in fulfilling their guarantees to Romania and Greece (article 3).

Under the secret Third Protocol, Britain and France committed themselves "to cooperate actively with Turkey and to grant, upon its request, all possible assistance and support as soon as a military action, initiated by a European state, reached frontiers of Bulgaria or Greece." The secret military convention provided that if the war spread to the Balkans "and the signs indicated that Bulgaria was about to join the action directed at one of the contracting parties" Turkey would be committed to "take any military action warranted by the circumstances" to secure Bulgaria's neutralization (article 2). In the event of any Italian action that would cause the treaty to come into effect, Turkish forces would pacify the Dodecanese Islands with British and French participation (article 3). In addition, there was a special agreement under which Britain and France undertook to provide Turkey with assistance in kind and cash. Turkey's obligations would become binding only after its allies had carried out their responsibilities as provided in the special agreement (article 6).

Turkey remained faithful to its friendship with the USSR and had the Second Protocol attached to the treaty. This protocol provided that the commitments arising from the treaty could not "be construed as to drag Turkey into an armed conflict with the USSR or into any action that would lead to a similar result."

The USSR's approach to the issue was quite different. Although Moscow had originally described the Turkish-British joint statement as a pro-peace initiative, it was now declaring that it considered the newly signed Tripartite Alliance to be an incitement to war. Moscow also accused Turkey of fomenting discord between Germany and Russia and of serving the interests of the British and the French, who were bent on extending the war to the Balkans by opening a new front against Germany in that region. In a speech delivered to the Supreme Soviet on 31 October, Molotov declared that "by tying its fate to Britain and France, Turkey has given satisfaction to the countries that have declared war on Germany. However, by engaging itself on the side of the group of bellicose countries in Europe, Turkey has taken a fateful step that might well lead it to regret its decision in the future." Furthermore, the official gazette of the Comintern carried an editorial in its 7 December issue describing Turkey's reservations regarding the USSR contained in the Second Protocol attached to the pact as "meaningless words." The editorial went on to claim that, along with the aggressive imperialist states (Britain and France), Turkey was seeking to extend the war to the Balkans and establish a new front against Germany. The editorial concluded with the assertion that Turkey had signed a mutual assistance pact with those countries that were seeking to transform Turkey into a strategic base.

Having established an alliance with Britain and France to ward off the Italian threat, Turkey was now confronted with a Soviet threat, just three months into World War II.

B. Turkey's Efforts to Stay Out of the War The Question of Chromium Sales

In its desire to remain neutral, Turkey sought to maintain its commercial links with both camps after war broke out, even though it had joined the anti-German, pro-status quo countries well before the war. As a condition for maintaining its trade relations, Germany demanded the delivery of at least 60,000 tons of chromium annually and declared that failure to meet this demand would be considered an "unfriendly attitude not compatible with neutrality" (Ataöv 1965, p. 67, quoting from DGFP, vol. 8, pp. 398–99). This put Turkey in a spot, because its total production of the commodity did not meet the level of demand. Up to that time, Turkey had been apportioning its production among the buyers lest any country should be displeased. In this way Turkey was also able to maintain its trade links with all the buyers without becoming dependent on a single market. Chromium was essential for the production of arms, and all of the belligerents were eager to satisfy their requirements for chromium while pressing Turkey to deny the precious commodity to their

Meanwhile Turkey was seeking to develop its trade relations with Britain in order to lessen Germany's political influence but was finding it difficult to divert its purchases of industrial equipment from Germany to Britain. For this reason Turkey felt compelled to supply Germany with raw materials for the arms industry and in particular chromium. No progress was made at the negotiations with Germany to renew the trade agreement that had expired on 31 August 1939 because of Germany's insistence on minimum chromium deliveries, so Turkey refused to renew the agreement. Instead it signed a series of economic agreements with Britain and France. These were important, because Turkey agreed to allow its allies to purchase all of its production of chromium for a period of two years. The agreements also provided for a British loan to Turkey in the amount of £25 million. With the addition of the French share, Turkey would be receiving a total of £27 million in loans.

Germany's pressure for the delivery of chromium continued, however, despite these agreements. In the course of the negotiations Turkey sought to procure military equipment from Germany while trying to maintain its former trade with the territories now under German occupation. Germany, in turn, was striving to keep Turkey out of the war and to increase its political influence in Ankara. Eventually, in June 1940, a one-year trade agreement was signed that made no provisions for the sale of chromium.

Italy's Belligerency and the Tripartite Alliance

During this phase the main concern of the belligerents was the reaction of Turkey to Italy's declaration of war. Both Germany and the USSR could perceive from their respective vantage points that the most effective way of preventing Turkey from going to war in the Allied camp was to keep alive Ankara's worries about Soviet intentions. As long as Italy remained nonbelligerent, they believed, Turkey also would stay out of the war. Even if Italy was to join the belligerents, Turkey would still invoke the Second Protocol (relating to the USSR) attached to the Tripartite Alliance to stay out of the conflict. Through its leadership, Turkey was sending out the same message to Germany and to the Allies.

It was true that the main factor keeping Turkey out of the conflict was the fear of the USSR. Germany was playing up the Soviet threat while it tried to appease Ankara's anxieties about Italian intentions in the Balkans and the eastern Mediterranean. As for the Soviets, they were becoming aware that sooner or later they would come into confrontation with Germany in the Balkans. Thus their policy was to keep Turkey guessing about their true intentions and keep alive Ankara's concerns. Italy also was providing no clues about its strategic plans in the Mediterranean and the Balkans, thus exacerbating Turkey's anxieties.

The developments in the first six months of 1940 and the thaw in Turkish-Soviet relations allowed Ankara to overcome its worries over the Soviet threat. It was now exclusively the threat posed by Germany that kept Turkey out of the war. In the summer of 1940 Germany was pressing hard on the Allies on all European fronts and winning a succession of military victories. Berlin warned Ankara at this time that if Turkey entered the war against Italy it would find itself in confrontation with Germany. On 4 June 1940 the Allies managed to carry out the evacuation of the remnants of their armies at Dunkirk. On 10 June Italy declared war on Britain and France.

Italy's declaration of war required Turkey to enter the war on the side of Britain and France in compliance with the provisions of article 2/1 of the Turkish-British-French Alliance of 19 October 1939. The article provided that in the event of an attack by a European country that would drag France and the United Kingdom into war in the Mediterranean region Turkey would be required to cooperate actively with Britain and France and render all possible assistance. Turkey had expected that the Maginot Line would hold for at least four or five years and that this would keep Italy out of the war. The sudden collapse of France was unexpected and left Turkey in a state of shock. As Turkey sought to plot its course at meetings of the parliament, it was coming under increasing external pressure from both the Italian-German and French-British camps. Italy warned that the Mediterranean and Balkan countries that strayed from neutrality would find themselves at war, while Germany called on Turkey not to sever relations either with Italy or with itself. On the other side, Britain and France were insisting that the time had come for Turkey to join the war.

As a matter of fact, following Italy's declaration of war, the ambassadors of Britain and France officially informed the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on 13 June that Turkey was legally bound to enter the war. The arms promised under the 1939 alliance, however, had not been delivered to Turkey. In these circumstances Turkey had no assurance that it would not be attacked by the USSR if it declared war on the Axis powers. The Polish experience was still fresh in everyone's mind. Furthermore, in line with the provisions of article 2 of the 1929 protocol extending the 1925 Friendship and Neutrality (Nonaggression) Treaty, Turkey consulted Moscow in connection with the British-French request to declare war and got a negative response from Soviet foreign minister Molotov. Rumors were circulating that the USSR was contemplating a military campaign in conjunction with Bulgaria aimed at the Straits. The Soviet ambassador warned Turkey that friendly relations would be possible only if Turkey would completely abandon Britain and turn to the USSR. In these circumstances Turkey had no guarantee regarding Soviet neutrality in the event of its joining the hostilities.

The Turkish government carefully examined the developments following Italy's declaration of war and on 14 June decided to invoke the Second Protocol of the Tripartite Alliance. On this occasion Ankara issued a statement: "Turkey's joining the conflict might lead to war with the USSR. Consequently, the government would bear in mind the Second Protocol of the British-French-Turkish Alliance and maintain Turkey's neutrality in the hostilities."

The statement did not satisfy British ambassador Knatchbull-Hugessen, who continued to exert pressure. He declared that Turkey's stand was based on political expediency, that the Second Protocol was just a convenient excuse for Turkey to plead weakness, and that the Soviet threat could not be taken seriously.

Turkey was also following developments on the western front very closely and was receiving news of France's imminent collapse. When France admitted defeat and signed an armistice with Germany on 22 June, the Turkish policy of refusing to go along with the Allied demand to declare war was fully vindicated. Since France was no longer in a position to carry out its commitments under the Tripartite Alliance after its capitulation, the thesis that Turkey was bound to declare war automatically could no longer be maintained. Britain itself was now left alone in facing the German threat of invasion. In these circumstances it was clear that it would be difficult for London to provide Turkey with the assistance foreseen in the Tripartite Alliance.

With France no longer on the scene, the Allied pressure on Turkey lost its credibility, and Ankara reiterated on 26 June that it would comply with the Second Protocol. Thus Turkey would "maintain its present position of remaining neutral in order to ensure the country's security and defense." Britain, however, continued to hold that invoking the Second Protocol did not correspond to reality and was just an excuse. London considered that the Turkish declaration should have alluded to the Tripartite Alliance and that Ankara's decision to remain neutral should have been qualified as being only "for the time being." The British response to the Turkish declaration reflected London's disappointment and contained the reminder that "should Turkey request Britain to honor its commitments under the Treaty, Britain would have the moral right to tailor its actions to suit the prevailing circumstances" (Deringil 1982, p. 41).

The Turkish press contended that Turkey was true to its commitments and that its actions served the interests of the Allies. Writing in the 17 June issue of Akşam, Necmettin Sadak (an important journalist close to government circles, who later became foreign minister) held that if Turkey entered the war it would only help spread the conflict to the Mediterranean and that this would be an additional burden on the Allies. The parliament was divided on the issue. Kazım Karabekir declared that there should be a Turkish-German agreement to counter the common Soviet threat, while Recep Peker claimed that Turkey could be considered to be automatically in a state of war because of the treaties it had signed. Rauf Orbay declared that the final victory would belong to Britain but that it would be desirable for it to be weakened by the effects of a long war. He contended that a quick, overwhelming British victory would create problems for Turkey, so it would not be a bad thing if the war drained Britain's wealth and strength.

It could be argued that the wording of article 2/1 of the Tripartite Alliance (that Turkey would engage in active cooperation and render all possible assistance to France and the United Kingdom) was imprecise and left room for different interpretations. If taken literally, it could be said that, since there was nothing in the treaty that committed Turkey to enter the war on the Allied side, Turkey could provide assistance without getting directly involved in the conflict as a belligerent. It was clear, however, that the Turkish leadership must have interpreted "active cooperation" to mean becoming a full belligerent, because Ankara never resorted to this legal interpretation when the question of Turkey's joining the war came up. Instead it pleaded that the preparations for war had not been concluded. To be engaged in active cooperation without becoming a belligerent could have meant, for example, allowing the Allies to use Turkish air bases. But at the time the leadership rightly considered that resorting to such action would lead Turkey into a state of war with Germany. In other words, the decision-makers interpreted any active assistance as the equivalent of being a belligerent or declaring war.

In the meantime, although a nonbelligerent, Turkey was pressing on with its preparations to meet an attack from the Balkans, the Mediterranean, the Black Sea and the Caucasus, or Syria, which was under Axis control at the time. To make provisions against the possibility of Syria, then under French mandate, being turned into a theater of war, Turkey started probing Iraq to determine if joint action could be taken to establish a common front. The Iraqi minister of justice, however, who paid a visit to Ankara in June 1940, told Germany's Ambassador von Papen that Iraq wanted its full independence from Britain and hinted that the Iraqi army might well side with Germany against Britain. This stand brought to an end the Turkish attempt to take joint action with Iraq. When the pro-German Rashid Ali took control of power in Baghdad through a coup d'état in April 1941, Berlin pressured Turkey for two months to allow Germany to send aid to the Iraqi administration through Turkish territory.

The Plan to Attack Baku

With the end of the Finnish campaign in March 1940, the Allied hopes of establishing a northern European front against Germany came to an end. France and Britain had to seek new theaters for engaging their foe. Among these were the Balkans, the Caucasus, and the Middle East. As long as the Balkan countries maintained their neutrality and continued to trade with Germany, it was not likely that Berlin would consider going on the offensive in that region. Nor was any German action likely in the Middle East in view of the fact that Turkey had mobilized 350,000 men. After the deployment of an Anzac force of 30,000 men to Suez in February 1940 plus the British forces in Egypt and Palestine and the French units in Syria, the Allies had no less than 500,000 men to discourage any German move in that theater. The result was that attention became focused on the Caucasus.

Toward the end of March it was announced that Turkish and Allied officers had met in Aleppo to discuss preparations for the Turkish army to act in concert with the Allies, should the need arise. This news led to much speculation about possible moves. The first possibility was an attack by the Allies on the oil installations of Baku. If the USSR was planning to supply Germany's oil requirements, this could only be done from the Baku fields. As a matter of fact, the Soviet Union actually delivered 18 million barrels of petroleum to Germany from January 1940 to June 1941. If the Allies could seize the Baku oil fields or render them inoperative, this would deal a heavy blow to the Soviet economy and dash German hopes for regular oil supplies from that source.

At the same time, Soviet expansion at the expense of Poland, Finland, and the Baltic States was causing anxiety in Paris. The Allies were eager to weaken the USSR's military capability by establishing a front as far away from France as possible. Although an attack on Baku through the mountainous terrain of the Caucasus posed formidable difficulties, the port of Batumi, which was employed to ship oil to the Romanian port of Constanta, was only thirty-three kilometers from the Turkish border. If Batumi was occupied, the Soviet shipments of oil could be seriously disrupted. In addition, French and British aircraft based in Syria and Iraq could fly over Turkey and bomb the oil installations of Baku.

Although these Caucasus campaign plans were abandoned after closer examination, they caused Turkey much trouble. Ankara was opposed to any attack on the USSR either overland through Turkish territory or by sea through the Straits, because it knew that such action would automatically lead to war with the Soviet Union. But Massigli, the French ambassador, had informed Paris (on the basis of a conversation held with Saracoğlu) that Ankara would not be opposed to the use of Turkish airspace to attack the USSR. At their encounter, Saracoğlu informed Massigli that the Soviets feared an Allied attack in the Caucasus region, whereupon Massigli pointed out that the airspace of either Iran or Turkey would have to be used to mount such an attack. Saracoğlu's reply was: "Are you worried that Iran might protest?" Massigli considered this to be a clear indication that no difficulties would come from the Turkish government. When Massigli informed Paris of this conversation, he also proposed that in the event of such an attack prior permission from Turkey should not be sought in order to avoid confronting Ankara with a dilemma. His proposal was that Ankara be notified only after the operation was underway.

The Caucasus campaign was never executed, because the British were not persuaded that Turkey was ready to take part in the venture. They were also convinced that it was of vital importance to keep Turkey in the Allied camp. Another reason was the German victory in Norway. Although the campaign never got beyond the planning stage, it did cause a lot of commotion when the Germans released documents on 5 July 1940 that they claimed had been found in a freight car wrecked during a bombing raid. These documents contained the texts of the abovementioned dispatches sent by Massigli to Paris. The French ambassador claimed that his cables had been distorted, while the Turkish government and press reacted angrily to the allegations.

Although the real purpose of the German revelations was to cause a diplomatic row between Turkey and the USSR, the Soviet reaction turned out to be relatively mild. On 1 August Molotov said: "No substantial change has taken place in our relations with Turkey. However, the documents contained in the German White Paper have shed light on some of the unsavory activities taking place in Turkey." Probably the main reason for the mild Soviet reaction was that developments in Europe at that time were unfolding in Germany's favor and Moscow was fearful that sooner or later these developments would lead to a confrontation with Germany. The Soviet government felt the need to come to some kind of agreement with Turkey, especially after the occupation of Romania.

The revelation of these documents was also motivated by Berlin's desire to see Saracoğlu ousted from the cabinet, because he was perceived to be pro-Allied to an excessive degree. On 12 June İnönü delivered a speech at the Turkish Grand National Assembly in which he said: "Kemalist Turkey is not the Ottoman Empire of the viziers. No minister can be dismissed upon the request of foreigners. Everyone should note this very carefully and act accordingly" (Ataöv 1965, p. 79).

Italy's Occupation of Greece

Soon after the uncertainty created by the publication of the Massigli papers had been overcome, German forces entered Romania on 7 October. This was followed by Italy's attack on Greece on 28 October. These events had wider implications, because they brought into play the Balkan Pact as well as article 3 of the Turkish-British-French Alliance regarding the guarantees given to Romania and Greece. It will be recalled that the Balkan Pact only guaranteed the internal frontiers of the Balkan states. At Greece's request, the clause that called for a response to an attack from outside the region (meaning Italy) had been removed. Consequently, there was nothing in the Balkan Pact that required Turkey to take up arms.

In regard to the Tripartite Alliance, Turkey alluded again to the Second Protocol of the pact and pointed out that a Turkish reaction to Italy's attack on Greece might well lead to a confrontation with the USSR. If Turkey sent forces to support Greek resistance, this would weaken its own defenses. Britain was aware of this and did not ask for Turkish involvement in repelling the Italian aggression. As a result, Turkey confined itself to sending a warning to the Bulgarian government—if Bulgaria attacked Greece, it would find itself at war with Turkey in accordance with the provisions of the Balkan Pact—and continued to maintain its neutrality. In fact, Turkey was feeling cornered after Italy's attack on Greece.

At this juncture the question of Turkey's participation in the war created a split between Britain's Foreign Office and its Ministry of Defense. The high echelons of the Defense Ministry held the view that, although militarily weak, Turkey should join the conflict immediately in order to bolster the Greek defenses while sparing Britain the need to weaken its forces in Egypt. In their view, if Turkey was not forced to live up to its commitments at that moment, it could evade its commitments relatively easily at a later stage. Also, if Turkey became a belligerent, this would demoralize the Italians, who were already facing difficulties in Greece, and lessen the risk of a sudden German operation against Turkey.

The Foreign Office, however, was of the opinion that Turkey's belligerency would greatly increase the demand for arms and military equipment at a time when Britain was hard-pressed to meet its own requirements. The Foreign Office felt that Turkey should not be pressured and should be left to make its own decision in the light of its national interest. For the Foreign Office, Turkey was an essential element of Britain's Middle East policy, with far greater importance than Greece. Victory was attainable in the Middle East even if Greece was overrun. But the loss of Turkey would render Britain's position in the Middle East untenable. In these circumstances, "nobody in his right mind" would press Turkey to enter the war and cause the center of gravity of the conflict to shift from the Middle East to the Balkans and from Cairo to Istanbul (Churchill, vol. 2, p. 483).

Although Prime Minister Churchill concurred with the Foreign Office view, this did not mean that Turkey was now free from British pressure. In a message sent to the British ambassador in Ankara on 26 November 1940, Churchill indicated that Britain wanted to see Turkey in the war at the earliest possible date. But it would not press Turkey to join the war just to aid Greece. From Britain's point of view, it would become essential for Turkey to join the conflict only if Bulgaria attacked, either by itself or in league with Germany. Ankara had already been warned that Turkey would be totally isolated if it still remained neutral after such an eventuality (Churchill, vol. 2, p. 484).

The unfolding of events demonstrated once again that Turkey had made the right decision. With the collapse of France, Britain's position in the Middle East was seriously undermined, and its assistance to Greece remained insufficient. Furthermore, it was a widely held view in Germany that, if Turkey did not remain passive after the attack on Greece, the German army would strike and open the route from the Straits to Syria. After meeting with Molotov in Berlin on 12–15 November, however, Hitler had shifted all of his attention to the USSR. The Führer wanted to launch the Russian campaign right away and realized that a move against Turkey would inevitably result in a postponement of that campaign. As a consequence, he took the decision to avoid any disagreement with Turkey for the time being (Deringil 1982, p. 48).

As a result, although both Turkey and Britain confirmed their attachment to the Tripartite Alliance of October 1939, Britain refrained from calling on Turkey to enter the war. All it wanted from Turkey was to remain neutral, which still favored the Allies, as long as possible while making sure not to trigger an attack from the Axis or the USSR. Turkey's foreign policy stance, however, as expounded by Saracoğlu, was that it was not "neutral" but merely a "noncombatant" and would pursue this policy until it was attacked or felt the time had come to honor its commitments.

Nazi-Soviet Bargaining over Turkey (The Hitler-Molotov Negotiations, November 1940)

The cooperation between the Soviet Union and Nazi Germany as a result of the Nonaggression and Friendship Pact of 23 August 1939 was flimsy and artificial. The cooperation came under even more pressure as the war shifted from Western Europe to the east and the Balkans. The first contentious issue in the Balkans was Romania. Neither Germany nor Italy wanted to see the USSR expanding in the Balkans, while the Soviets saw Germany encroaching into its security zone. The interests of the two sides were beginning to clash.

Meanwhile Germany was engaged in a cynical game of double-dealing. While Berlin was giving assurances to Turkey and offering to sign a pact, it was also trying to lure the USSR into the Axis camp by offering inducements at Turkey's expense. Von Papen was under constant pressure from the Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs and kept querying Berlin about the decisions reached by Germany and the USSR in order to calibrate his response to the Turks accordingly. On 4 November 1940 von Ribbentrop responded by cautioning von Papen not to give any written guarantees to the Turks. Von Papen was informed for the first time that Germany intended to reach an understanding with the USSR over the Straits and through joint pressure to spoil Turkey's relations with Britain and in this way draw it closer to the Axis (Ataöv 1965, p. 82).

The Issue of Turkey and the Straits in the Course of Molotov's Berlin Visit

The issue of Turkey came up in the course of Molotov's three-day Berlin visit, which started on 12 November. Hitler and von Ribbentrop met Molotov singly and together and in the course of their conversations indicated that, if the USSR, Germany, Japan, and Italy could establish a joint platform, Turkey would join this grouping. Von Ribbentrop declared that he understood the Soviet misgivings with regard to the Montreux Convention. He reminded the Russian visitor that Germany had taken no part in its elaboration and consequently favored its replacement with an agreement that involved the directly interested parties: Turkey, the USSR, Germany, and Italy. He concluded by indicating that Germany stood ready to lend effective support to Moscow to bring about changes in the regime of the Straits to bring it into line with Soviet aspirations (Sonntag and Beddie, pp. 222–23). Although the particulars of such a regime were not discussed at the meeting, agreement in principle was reached to grant the USSR special privileges, including the unrestricted right to send its merchant vessels as well as its navy into the Mediterranean.

At the meeting held on 12 November, Hitler asked Molotov how the USSR planned to defend its interests in the Black Sea and the Straits. Molotov replied that, historically, the British had conducted their attacks on Russia through the Straits and that the waterway was of vital importance for the USSR's defense and its interests. He added that he would like to know the German reaction to a Soviet guarantee to Bulgaria (the country that was closest to the Straits), similar to the guarantee given by Germany to Romania. Molotov indicated that a Soviet guarantee to Bulgaria would facilitate the defense of the USSR against an attack coming through the Straits.

Hitler declared that all of this was pretty much in line with German thinking. He believed that only Soviet vessels should have unrestricted access through the Straits, which would remain out of bounds for the warships of all other countries. Hitler would consult with Bulgaria's leaders about the proposed Soviet guarantee and also seek Mussolini's views on the issue. Molotov pointed out that the USSR would not be satisfied with anything other than firm guarantees; to this end, it wanted its own checkpoints either on the Aegean islands or on the Straits and saw the Bulgarian guarantee in the same context.

In short, before agreeing to join the Axis, the USSR demanded naval and air bases on the Straits and sought to have the region south of a line drawn from Batumi to Baku and up to the Caspian Sea recognized as a Soviet zone of influence. In a bid to gain time before embarking on its invasion, Germany insisted on seeking the views of Italy and Bulgaria.

Eventually the USSR agreed with Germany and Italy that Turkey should be freed from its present commitments and be won over in order to secure its political cooperation as well as the abrogation of the Montreux Convention. The agreement that would be sought would permit Soviet warships to sail through the Straits unhindered at all times, while denying access in principle to the warships of other countries, with the exception of Black Sea states plus Germany and Italy. In the event of Turkey's refusing to join the USSR, Germany, Italy, and Japan bloc, Molotov proposed that Germany, Italy, and the USSR should consider taking joint military and diplomatic action and enter into an agreement that would provide for this kind of joint action.

The main theme of Molotov's talks in Berlin was the division of the world into zones of influence by the Axis powers and the USSR. As Molotov left Berlin for Moscow, he received the text of a draft treaty from von Ribbentrop. The treaty would divide the world among Germany, Italy, Japan, and the USSR. The section dealing with Turkey contained the following proposals. Turkey would be freed from its commitments to Britain and induced to cooperate with the Axis. A new Straits regime would be established that would grant unlimited access to the USSR and close the Straits to the warships of non—Black Sea states. In the draft Turkey was not placed in any specific zone of influence. This was an indication that Germany had no intention of allowing the USSR to establish its control over Turkey by way of the Balkans and the Straits.

The Soviet response to the German draft came on 25 November. In its response Moscow enumerated its conditions for joining the Axis powers. Among these were that the Black Sea would be within the Soviet sphere of influence, that Moscow would conclude a mutual assistance pact with Bulgaria, and that the Soviets would establish military and naval bases in the region of the Straits through long-term leases. In addition, Turkey's territorial integrity would be guaranteed if it agreed to join Germany, Italy, and the USSR by signing a pact. Should Turkey refuse to do this, then appropriate measures would be applied against it.

The Soviet demands on the highly strategic Straits both at the Berlin talks and in subsequent correspondence persuaded Hitler that the time had come to terminate his cooperation with the Soviet Union. Like the Soviet Union, Germany had no intention to share the Straits with any other nation. Nor did Berlin want to see the USSR getting a foothold in the Balkans through a guarantee to Bulgaria, because it considered this region to be within its own sphere of influence. Furthermore, Berlin felt that as the war progressed in its favor Turkey would join the German camp on its own relatively soon and thereby come within its sphere of influence. As a result, on 18 December Hitler gave the orders to start the preparations for Operation Barbarossa, the plan to invade the USSR. Hitler's instructions were that the planning for this undertaking would be completed by 15 May 1941.

Feeling that the war was approaching even closer to its borders, Turkey fortified its forces in Thrace, mined the approaches to the Dardanelles, and took measures against the Italian navy and the German submarines thought to be based in the Romanian port of Constanta by requiring all vessels to identify themselves prior to sailing through the Straits. On 22 November martial law was declared in Thrace. Meanwhile, as the Soviet-Nazi bargaining over Turkey went on, Germany was also conducting negotiations with Ankara.

After his meeting with Molotov, Hitler met the Bulgarian king in Berlin on 17 November 1940. Hungary joined the Axis on 20 November, followed by Romania and Slovakia on 23 and 24 November. Von Papen had a long meeting with President İnönü on 29 November in the presence of Saracoğlu. At this meeting von Papen declared that a new order was being established in Europe, that Germany's political objectives had very little to do with Greece (embroiled with the Italians at the time), that Germany was ready to give guarantees to Turkey, and that this would not be incompatible with Ankara's commitments to Britain. He concluded by stating that in this way Turkey would be 100% secure.

'The Reich's aim in the Balkans was not very clear; nor was von Papen able to provide explicit written guarantees to Turkey. It was therefore decided to conduct further negotiations in secret between Saracoğlu and the undersecretary of the MFA (Numan Menemencioğlu) on the Turkish side and von Papen on the German side. Von Papen replied to the Turkish appeal for Germany to sign the Montreux Convention by declaring that Germany wanted to postpone taking up the issue of the Straits until the end of the war. Von Ribbentrop had instructed von Papen on 5 December to confine the negotiations with Turkey to a restricted field and not give away Germany's position on the issue of the Straits. In his message of 21 December, von Ribbentrop called for the continuation of the negotiations but told von Papen to refrain from making any commitments to Turkey that would conflict with Germany's position in its negotiations with the USSR.

The Nazis' Denunciation of the Soviets

Ankara heard about the Nazi-Soviet negotiations over Turkey on 17 March 1941. When Turkish ambassador Hüsrev Gerede delivered a letter from İnönü to Hitler, the German leader revealed what had transpired. From Hitler's explanation it was possible to conclude that it was the Soviet demand for bases in Bulgaria and the Dardanelles that prevented a Soviet-German agreement at Turkey's expense and kept the USSR from joining the Axis powers. Germany rejected this demand, because it wanted no rivals in the Straits and the Balkans.

On 28 March 1941 von Papen called on Menemencioğlu to announce that the Führer had turned down the conditions set by Moscow for the USSR to join the Axis "out of regard for the historic friendship between Turkey and Germany," which the ambassador considered to be worthy of the highest praise. Menemencioğlu's reply to von Papen gives an indication of the nature of Turkish foreign policy during this period and how it was based totally on Realpolitik:

Let us not talk of sentimentality, of old friendship and comradeship in arms. Instead let us concentrate on the present-day interests of the Reich and of Turkey, which are the determining factors of our respective foreign policies. We naturally considered every contingency and assumed that in your negotiations with Russia you discussed Turkey. If Germany chooses Russia and attempts to hand over the Straits to that country, any expectation of a German victory would be unrealistic. If Russia reaches the Straits and the Mediterranean by way of Romania and Bulgaria, this would lead to Germany being surrounded from the south. If Germany is prepared to pay such a high price, it will in all probability lose the war. We Turks would stand to gain in a different way. The Führer's refusal to hand over the Straits is consequently a wise decision and serves Germany's interests well. We do not want to see this war end with one side's total victory. It is in Turkey's interest to see the war coming to an end through negotiations. Although we are in an alliance, we have not allowed ourselves to be used by our allies. We are selfish and think only of our own interests. (DGFP, vol. 12, Doc. No. 231)

II. 1941–1943: GERMAN PRESSURE ON TURKEY

A. Turkey's Reaction When Germany Reached the Balkans

The failure of the Nazi-Soviet negotiations of November 1940 and the inability of the Germans to draw the Soviets into a grand coalition against Britain had a profound effect on the outcome of the war. As the attempts to bring the two countries closer ended in failure, both started preparing for war with each other. As Hitler was signing general order number 21 relating to Operation Barbarossa, the Soviets were deploying their units in Crimea to the west.

Early in 1941 Germany acquired Hungary, Romania, and Bulgaria without firing a shot. Greece and Yugoslavia were occupied with a Blitzkrieg. All of this happened within the context of Operation Barbarossa. Before attacking the USSR, Germany was ensuring its southern flank. It wanted to make sure that the Allies had no opportunity to establish a bridgehead in Greece and open a second front against Germany in the Balkans.

The Importance of Bulgaria

In these circumstances the geographic location of Bulgaria acquired a special significance. This country had obtained Dobruja with German backing and harbored misgivings toward the USSR. From Germany's point of view, Bulgaria was important for launching an attack on the USSR. Bulgaria was also important for the USSR, which feared an attack from Germany or from the Allies through the Straits. Bulgaria could also be very useful to the USSR as a base for a possible operation against the Straits. For these reasons the Germans prevented the USSR from giving a guarantee to Bulgaria during Molotov's visit to Berlin. This triggered a fierce competition between Germany and the USSR for influence over Bulgaria, which also had repercussions for Turkey.

When Moscow failed to get a German concurrence for a Soviet guarantee to Bulgaria, it decided to proceed unilaterally and sent an emissary to Sofia on 25 November 1940 to inquire whether Bulgaria would need a guarantee against the "Turkish threat." The USSR was intent on signing a mutual assistance pact with Sofia that would have the dual purpose of preventing the Germans from moving southward while allowing Moscow to acquire bases near the Straits through Bulgaria and thereby exerting pressure on Turkey.

The draft mutual assistance pact delivered to the Bulgarians had the following provisions relating to Turkey:

- 1. The Soviet government expresses its understanding of Bulgaria's interests in Western Thrace (to secure its access to the Aegean) and is prepared to cooperate to ensure these interests.
- 2. To further Soviet and Bulgarian interests, the USSR is renewing its proposal of September 1939 to conclude a mutual assistance pact. Such a pact will help Bulgaria in achieving its national aspirations not only in Western Thrace but also in Eastern Thrace.
- 3. If Bulgaria is confronted with the threat of aggression or finds itself under a Turkish attack, the USSR will render all possible assistance to Bulgaria and support its well-known claims on Turkey's European region.

Fearing the German military presence in Romania and the pro-German elements in the Bulgarian government, the king rejected the Soviet offers.

It will be recalled that the 1925 Friendship and Neutrality (Nonaggression) Treaty between Turkey and the USSR had been extended by a protocol in 1929. Article 2 of the protocol provided that the parties would not enter into negotiations for concluding a political agreement with any state that was a direct neighbor of the other party without informing that party and would only enter into such agreements with the consent of the other party. The USSR had not informed Turkey about the guarantee that Moscow was offering to Bulgaria. Turkey only became aware of this when its ambassador in Moscow posed a question on the subject to Molotov in December. The full details of the negotiations became known to Ankara in 1942, when the Bulgarians handed the text of the Soviet proposals to Menemencioğlu.

At this juncture Britain was concerned about the possibility of Turkey succumbing to German pressure and allowing German forces to cross its territory to gain access to the Middle East in the event of Greece and Bulgaria coming under German control. To forestall such an eventuality, Churchill sent a letter to İnönü on 31 January, pointing out the dangers that German control of Bulgaria would pose to Turkey and concluding by calling on Ankara to join the Allies in the war. But the Germans had moved first and on 7 January had transmitted, through the German Embassy in Ankara, von Ribbentrop's offer of guarantee to the Turkish leadership. Turkey was being given assurances that German forces had entered the Balkans with the consent of the Hungarian and Romanian governments only in order to block Britain's efforts to establish a bridgehead in Greece and that the German action was not directed at any Balkan state, including Turkey (Sonntag and Beddie, p. 25).

The Turkish-Bulgarian Declaration of Nonaggression

As Turkey's concern over German and Soviet intentions grew, Ankara accelerated the preparations to reinforce its military forces in Thrace to deter and if necessary repulse a possible attack. The Bulgarians became alarmed by this concentration of troops and called for a declaration of nonaggression. The negotiations leading to the declaration got underway on 17 February 1941.

Turkey's main concern at this point was not the likelihood of a Bulgarian attack but the certainty of a German occupation of Bulgaria. Sofia knew that, as long as it remained neutral and refrained from any aggressive act that would come within the terms of the Balkan Pact, it had no cause to fear an attack from Turkey. Turkey's objective was to prevent or at least delay for as long as possible Bulgaria's accession to the Axis to ensure itself against a possible Turkish attack. Ankara wanted to make sure that its efforts to stay out of the war were not frustrated by the Germans marching into the Balkans and reaching the Turkish frontier.

The declaration was a reaffirmation of the 1929 Turkish-Bulgarian Treaty of Friendship and the 1929 Treaty of Neutrality. The declaration stated that the two countries had agreed to protect and enhance their mutual trust (article 2), to respect each other's territorial integrity, and to pursue their relations based on good neighbor-liness without attacking one another. Article 1 of the declaration announced that the two countries would "make refraining from aggression a permanent principle of their foreign policies." This undertaking went beyond the commitment in the 1929 treaty to maintain neutrality.

The declaration did not satisfy the Allies, who wanted to see Turkey taking a firmer stand against Bulgaria. Nor did it satisfy the USSR, which expected Turkey not to interact with Bulgaria in any way. There was speculation that, with the declaration, Ankara was drawing Bulgaria toward British policies, while some saw Turkey being drawn toward the Axis. In any case, the declaration did not prevent Bulgaria from joining the Axis on 1 March 1941. With German forces moving into Bulgaria, the German-Soviet-British tug of war over that country came to an end, with Germany the winner.

The concentration of German troops in the Balkans increased the probability of a sudden German move against Turkey or Greece. The motorized German units in Bulgaria could have moved against Istanbul and the Straits at any moment. On 3 March the USSR declared that the Bulgarian action was unacceptable, followed by Britain's severing of diplomatic relations with Sofia two days later. This situation led the USSR to review its previous policies and seek cooperation with Ankara, which shared the same concerns over Germany's intentions. Previously Moscow had been trying to work with Bulgaria to isolate Turkey.

The Turkish-Soviet Nonaggression Declaration

With the situation in the Balkans developing unfavorably, Britain sent its foreign secretary, Anthony Eden, to Ankara on 26 February to explore the possibility of resurrecting the Balkan Pact. Saracoğlu and Eden met again in Nicosia on 8–19 March. During the later meeting, Eden, already knowing that Yugoslavia was about to succumb to German pressure, asked Saracoğlu whether Turkey would consider sending a message to the Yugoslav government, stating Ankara's readiness to declare war on Germany if Germany attacked Greece and Yugoslavia declared war on Germany as a result. In reply Saracoğlu pointed out that Ankara would find itself in a very difficult situation if Yugoslavia rejected the Turkish offer. Saracoğlu also indicated that before sending such a message Turkey would in any case want to have a Soviet promise that the USSR would remain neutral in the event of a German attack on Turkey.

At this point the Turkish press and foreign press were full of reports that the Soviets had made certain demands on Turkey and were seeking to take advantage of Turkey's difficulties as it tried to cope with British pressure for it to become a belligerent. What really caused anxiety in Turkey was the rumor that Germany would move against Turkey from Bulgaria and that the USSR would then take advantage of the situation, attack from the east, and partition Turkey with Germany the way they had partitioned Poland. When the Turkish prime minister himself referred to this possibility (the "Polish syndrome"), Britain, which had been in negotiations with the USSR since November 1940 in order to conclude an agreement, redoubled its efforts to get the Soviets to give Ankara a guarantee of their neutrality. Eventually, on 9 March, Soviet deputy foreign minister Andrey Vyshinsky summoned Turkish ambassador Haydar Aktay and informed him that they had heard from British source; about Turkish anxieties regarding possible Soviet attacks if Turkey found itself involved in armed conflicts. Vyshinsky noted that such reports, also appearing in the Turkish press, were without foundation. He wanted to give assurances that, if Turkey was obliged to defend itself in the face of an attack, Ankara could count on "full Soviet understanding and neutrality" based on the 1925 Nonaggression Treaty. With Turkey giving similar assurances, all of this was reflected in the Communiqué of Nonaggression of 25 March 1941, issued at Turkey's request. This was the last official text recalling the 1925 Friendship and Nonaggression Pact that the USSR would denounce in 1945.

Upon reports appearing in the international press that if Turkey was compelled to enter the war then the Soviet Union would take advantage of its predicament and attack it, the Turkish government sought clarifications from the Soviet government. The reply of the Soviet government is the following.

- 1. Such reports are totally unrelated to the Soviet government's stance.
  - 2. If Turkey does find itself under attack and is compelled to defend its territory, then Turkey can count on the fullest understanding and neutrality of the Soviet Union based on the Nonaggression Treaty between the two countries.

Upon this declaration of the Soviet government, the Turkish government expressed its sincere appreciation and stated that, should the Soviet Union find itself confronted with an analogous situation, it can count on the fullest understanding and neutrality of the Turkish government.

From the wording of the Soviet communiqué, the possibility of Turkey becoming engaged in war without being attacked was explicitly excluded. Therefore, if Turkey declared war on Germany without first coming under attack, the Soviet threat would continue to exist. From previous negotiations it was known that the price for a broader Soviet guarantee would be very high. Nevertheless, on 9 March the Soviet Union had declared (for the first time since the outbreak of the war) that, if Turkey found itself in trouble with a third country, Moscow would not engage in any activity that might cause difficulties for Turkey.

It will be noted that the Soviet reaffirmation of non-aggression occurred only after the collapse of the USSR's Balkan plans and after German forces approached the Straits. Until then the USSR had done nothing to dispel Turkey's apprehensions. With its proposals to Bulgaria at the expense of Greece and Turkey, the USSR also prevented the development of a spirit of solidarity among the Balkan nations. The ambivalent Soviet approach to Turkey continued until it became clear that Yugoslavia and Bulgaria would definitely side with the Axis; only then did the Soviet Union adopt a more positive stance toward Turkey.

The biggest question mark in the Balkans at this time was Yugoslavia. Eventually Belgrade succumbed to the German pressure and joined the Axis on 25 March 1941. Two days later Yugoslav chief of staff Gen. Dusan Simovich came to power following a coup d'état. In response to this development, Britain made a new demarche in Ankara to have a message sent to the Yugoslav government in the same vein as the one requested earlier at the Nicosia talks. In a letter to İnönü, Churchill pointed out that this event should serve as a warning. He added that, if an anti-German coalition was not established in the Balkans, the Germans might well decide to overrun Turkey before attacking Greece. But when Germany attacked Yugoslavia and Greece on 6 April and the Allies had not yet carried out their commitments regarding the provision of military assistance, Turkey informed Britain that it would continue its policy of staying out of the war.

The German Proposals

Let us now examine the state of Turkish-German relations after the Turkish-Bulgarian Declaration. It will be recalled that the concentration of German troops in the Balkans was giving rise to concern in Turkey. The Turks feared that German units would march into Bulgaria at any moment and that Turkey would be the next objective of these forces. The Turkish fears were transmitted to Berlin by von Papen, who received the following message from von Ribbentrop: "As already stated on 7 January, Germany's measures in the Balkans are not aimed at Turkey but at Britain, which is trying to acquire a firm foothold in Greece. The Führer will send a personal letter to Inönü on the night of March 1, following Bulgaria's joining the Axis."

On 4 March von Papen delivered Hitler's letter to İnönü. In the letter Hitler gave assurances to İnönü that the German forces that had entered Bulgaria on 1 March would stay away from the Turkish frontier and that their movements were not directed at Turkey (Box 3-4). Subsequently von Papen called on Saracoğlu on 8 March to give assurances that the German units would under no circumstances come closer than a hundred kilometers to the Turkish border. In fact, the German forces came within sixty kilometers of the Turkish frontier before halting. İnönü responded to Hitler's letter on 12 March. In his letter İnönü expressed the hope that a Turkish-German confrontation would be avoided and reiterated Turkey's basic policy: "After the last Great War, in which we fought side by side and shared the glory as well as the pain, the policy of the new Turkey is the same as it was at the beginning of our War of Liberation: to defend Turkey's independence in the fullest sense without violating the rights of others to develop peacefully... Turkey would never consider preserving its territory and its integrity through political and military combinations with this or that country" (DGFP, vol. 12, Doc. No. 161).

But important events took place in the course of the first week of April that made Turkey's position even more difficult. As noted earlier, on 2 April Rashid Ali Geylani, a former prime minister known for his anti-British views, carried out a coup and took power in Iraq. On 6 April Germany and Hungary attacked Yugoslavia, while Greece was attacked by Germany and Bulgaria. Yugoslavia capitulated on 17 April and Greece on 23 April. At this point Berlin informed Turkey once again that the German forces

Box 3-4. Letter from Hitler to İnönü (1 March 1941)

I would like to take advantage of this occasion formally to reassure Your Excellency that these actions are in no way directed at Turkey's political and territorial integrity. Recalling the Great War that we conducted together, and the painful years that followed this conflict, I want to express to you my heartfelt and profound belief that all the conditions exist for true and friendly cooperation between Turkey and Germany in the coming years. This is based on the following considerations.

- Germany has no territorial ambitions in the region.
   When the dangers alluded to have disappeared, the German forces shall evacuate Bulgaria...and Romania.
- 2. The economic development that will take place in the postwar period to heal Europe's wounds will require that Germany and Turkey engage in trade once again, Germany is not merely interested in selling its manufactured products. It will also be in a position to import vast quantities of goods.

Furthermore, I am convinced that in the territorial rearrangements that will take place after the war Germany will not find itself in the position of having to oppose Turkish policy goals. Disagreement between the two countries will be equally harmful to the interests of the Axis and Turkey, I therefore see no cause for antagonism between our two countries, either now or in the future. With these thoughts in mind, I have ordered that the German forces now advancing through Bulgaria remain at a distance from the Turkish frontier in order not to lead to any doubts about their intentions. Of course, this will be on condition that the Turkish Government refrains from any measure that would force us to reconsider our decision.

(M. AYDIN) (Source: DGFP, vol. 12, Doc. No. 122)

advancing in Greece had been ordered to stay clear of Edirne and the Turkish frontier. As German forces reached the Black Sea and Aegean coasts, Berlin started worrying about Turkey's reaction. To forestall the possibility of a Turkish-Soviet rapprochement against Germany, Berlin started probing the Turks to determine if a nonaggression pact might be concluded between the two countries. In this context von Ribbentrop had a meeting with Turkey's Ambassador Gerede on 9 April, during which the German minister indicated that the Führer would like to see Germany's former friends on its side once again. Von Ribbentrop said: "[A]ll of our friends who have returned to our side have been able to place themselves in a position where they can realize their revisionist aspirations. This has been true for Hungary and Bulgaria, and these considerations shall apply once again in the current operations against Serbia and Greece" (DGFP, vol. 12, Doc. No. 303). Germany was hinting that, if Turkey joined the war on its side, new arrangements in Turkey's favor might be possible in the Aegean.

Until then Germany had been seeking to sway Turkey by reminding it of the Soviet threat. Now Berlin switched to a policy of seeking to influence Ankara through promises relating to postwar territorial arrangements. Von Papen presented to the Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs more detailed versions of von Ribbentrop's promises. Von Papen went to Berlin in late April and returned to Ankara on 12 May. Upon his return he proposed the conclusion of a mutual assistance agreement to Saracoğlu and İnönü. At his first meeting with Saracoğlu he pointed out that the Balkan operation had been concluded successfully and that the Führer had kept his promise to İnönü. Von Papen argued that this situation called for a fundamental change in Turkey's policies. He went on to enumerate the commitments that the Reich was ready to make to Ankara.

- 1. Our previous guarantee regarding the disposition of our troops [i.e., the German forces in the Balkans would stay away from the Turkish frontier] shall continue to be valid.
- 2. All Turkish interests and objectives shall be taken into account with fairness.
- 3. Germany declares formally that it fully respects Turkey's sovereignty and independence. Turkey's rights shall enjoy the same respect. Turkey's rights over the Straits shall be reinforced in the direction of Turkey's wishes.
- 4. We are ready to take up all political and economic issues with Turkey, and, should Turkey be interested, we can give full satisfaction to Turkey in its areas of security zones.
- 5. The region around Edirne and the islands in the Aegean close to the coast shall be ceded to Turkey.
- 6. We shall not request transit rights for our troops through Turkish territory. However, we may request the right to transport military equipment, in line with our existing trade convention.
- 7. If a gesture is forthcoming demonstrating trust and friendship between the two countries, we are ready to deliver all kinds of military equipment. As long as we can be assured that this equipment will not be used against Germany, we shall make no demands that might conflict with Turkey's existing commitments.
- 8. We undertake to sign an agreement that will not conflict with Turkey's secret or open commitments. (DGFP, vol. 12, Doc. No. 514)

At this point it has to be stressed that Turkey was not driven to these contacts and the search for avenues of cooperation with Germany by the German promises, which were imprecise and uncertain as to their postwar feasibility. Turkey's motive was its concern about possible German-Soviet cooperation and the desire to prevent Germany from taking this course. In a conversation held with von Papen on 14 May, İnönü argued that Germany's agreement with the USSR could only be short-lived and that in a year's time Germany might find itself in a much more unfavorable situation. If Germany would undertake not to enter into any commitments directed against Turkey with another country, Turkey would do likewise and refrain from commitments that might harm German interests and would commit never to engage in armed conflict with Germany. İnönü added that such commitments could be put in writing in a way that would not clash with Turkey's commitments to other parties.

As noted, Ankara's main worry was a German-Soviet agreement and the possibility of Turkey being made a bargaining element in such an agreement. To prevent such an outcome Ankara was prepared to sign an agreement with Germany. Turkey's fears were not unjustified, because it is known that, as the Germans were bringing their proposals to Turkey, they were also in contact with the USSR.

Turkey notified its ally Britain about the German demarches and received London's approval to continue these contacts. To avoid a German trap, in which Turkey and the USSR would be used against each other, Britain also expressed the need to notify Moscow about what was going on.

In the meantime Germany wanted to provide assistance to the Rashid Geylani regime in Iraq by using Turkey for transit purposes, but Ankara kept refusing to allow this. After the coup of 2 April, Britain landed troops in Basra in an attempt to reverse the coup. Hence the Iraqi regime's minister of defense came to Ankara to seek von Papen's assistance. Such German assistance would only be possible via Turkish territory. This situation would have allowed Germany to influence Iraq and to gain access to the Syrian bases that the Vichy government had placed at its disposal. It would have also allowed Germany to gain control of the oil fields of Iraq and Iran and then to reach for the Suez Canal, through which it could establish direct contact with the Japanese forces in the Indian Ocean.

In this framework von Papen delivered to Menemencioğlu on 23 May 1941 Berlin's draft treaty, which also had secret protocols in its annexes. The first protocol would relate to the delivery of German arms aid to Iraq. A second secret protocol contained the following provision: "When peace is achieved, the Reich will consider favorably Turkish wishes with regard to Thrace, the islands, and any changes in the status of the Straits. When military operations are extended, the same understanding shall be shown vis-à-vis Turkish interests in the east and the south" (DGFP, vol. 12, Doc. No. 545). In other words, should Turkey be prepared to engage in close cooperation, Germany was offering rectification of frontiers in favor of Turkey not only in the Balkans and the Aegean but also in the southern and eastern regions (i.e., in its frontiers with Syria, Iraq, and Iran).

Von Ribbentrop instructed von Papen, however, to make sure that in transmitting the German offer to the Turkish government he refrained from putting anything into writing and avoided being specific. From the correspondence between the minister and the ambassador, it is possible to discern that Germany was seeking to draw Turkey into closer cooperation with the Axis with vague offers, without making any binding concrete commitment. In the proposed agreement the objective was not only to secure the transit of military equipment to Iraq through Turkey but also, with another secret protocol, to secure a Turkish commitment not to prevent the equipment from being transported with its personnel. This amounted to allowing German soldiers to pass through Turkey masquerading as civilians.

On 26 May Menemencioğlu delivered the Turkish reply to the German offer: Turkey had no territorial claims whatsoever and should not be asked to do anything incompatible with the Turkish-British alliance. Consequently, the signing of secret protocols was out of the question. If Germany pledged not to attack Turkey, however, then Ankara would be ready to pledge to remain neutral in any war involving Germany (T.C. Dışişleri Bakanlığı 1973, p. 113). What spared Turkey from further German pressure on this ground was the surrender of Rashid Ali on 28 May. Britain regained control of Iraq, and a new pro-British administration was installed in Baghdad.

The Turkish-German Nonaggression Pact

Given the developments in Iraq, there was no more need for Germany to insist on transporting military equipment to Iraq through Turkey. Germany was still very interested in securing its right flank, however, by ensuring Turkey's neutrality on the eve of its attack on the USSR. With this goal in mind, Germany renewed its demarche for an agreement but removed the clauses relating to the shipment of arms to Iraq. On 1 January von Ribbentrop sent von Papen instructions to renew the talks to conclude a political agreement. Given the changed circumstances in Iraq, von Papen was not to make too definite formal commitments to Turkey. Berlin's draft agreement contained these provisions: Article 1: "Germany and Turkey shall mutually respect the integrity and inviolability of their territories." Article 2: "The parties shall enter into friendly consultations on issues affecting their common interests with a view to resolving them."

The secret protocol was drafted in the following terms: Article 1: "Germany recognizes Turkey's territorial sovereignty over the Straits and declares that it will support all Turkish efforts aimed at securing international implementation of this sovereignty. For its part, Turkey undertakes to take into account Germany's maritime requirements in connection with the question of the Straits." Article 2: "When peace is attained, the Reich government shall, to the extent possible, take into account Turkey's wishes regarding arrangements in the frontier in the region of Edirne" (DGFP, vol. 12 Doc. No. 583).

When Turkey expressed its reservations about the German proposals, von Papen delivered to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on 3 June a sharp message from von Ribbentrop in which he reminded Ankara that at the moment Germany and its allies were the undisputed masters of Europe and could easily ignore Turkey if they chose to do so. Consequently, according to von Papen's message, the cooperation being offered to Turkey and the accompanying guarantees for its territorial integrity were very much in Turkey's favor. The German policy of offering a carrot had now been replaced by the policy of the big stick.

By this time, Britain was truly alarmed over the possibility of Turkey drifting into the German camp. London started reminding Ankara that it stood to gain nothing from a political agreement with Germany and that such an agreement would make it difficult for Ankara to pursue an independent foreign policy. Britain also got the U.S. to intervene to prevent a possible Turkish-German agreement. On 15 June U.S. secretary of state Cordell Hull had ambassador J. V. A. MacMurray deliver a message to Ankara. It pointed out that, if Turkey relented in its resistance to the expansion of German aggression and Turkish-British cooperation came to an end, this would have a very negative effect on American public opinion. In such circumstances Turkey would not be able to continue benefiting from the Lend and Lease Law. But when MacMurray learned from his British colleague that the agreement was scheduled to be signed within a few days, he decided not to deliver the secretary of state's message right away. He felt that such forceful demarches would be counterproductive and sought new instructions from Washington.

The British also changed their tactics and shifted from trying to prevent the impending agreement to having a clarification inserted in the text declaring that the agreement would not weaken Turkey's alliance with Britain. In any case, during the course of negotiations Turkey had already asked Germany to insert a clause in the preamble of the agreement stating that Turkey's alliance with Britain would remain unaffected. Turkey would also reserve the right to appeal to Britain for help in case of an attack from a third party (meaning the USSR). With these insertions, the Turkish-German Nonaggression Pact was signed on 18 June. According to the pact, the Republic of Turkey and the German Reich would "base their relations on mutual trust and sincere friendship and conclude a treaty without prejudice to the existing international commitments of the two parties."

Article 1: "The Republic of Turkey and the German Reich undertake to respect mutually the inviolability and integrity of their territories and to refrain from any direct or indirect action against one another."

Article 2: "The Republic of Turkey and the German Reich undertake to remain in friendly contact in order to reach agreement for solving all questions affecting their common interests."

Article 3: "This treaty shall enter into force on the date of its signature and be valid for 10 years. At the end of this period, the high contracting parties shall reach a decision regarding the extension of the treaty."

The official title of the document was Treaty of Friendship between the Republic of Turkey and the German Reich. The phrase "without prejudice to the existing...commitments" contained in the preamble of the treaty meant that Turkey would not be forced to act in violation of the terms of the Tripartite Alliance of 1939 or the Turkish-Soviet Nonaggression Treaty of 1925.

This treaty, and its provision in the preamble, helped shield Turkey from external pressures coming from both the Allies and the Axis. The insertion, which Turkey introduced in the preamble, meant that Turkish territory could not be used against British interests. In other words, Germany had been forced to agree that German troops could not march through Turkish territory. At the same time, by agreeing not to engage in action directed against Germany, Turkey was preventing British aircraft from using Turkish air bases and British warships from passing through the Straits. From Germany's point of view, the treaty was a serious obstacle to any possible British assistance to the Soviet Union. With this treaty, Germany had secured its southern flank four days before launching its attack on the USSR. Italy made a proposal for concluding a similar treaty, but nothing emerged from this proposal because of Turkey's coolness to the idea.

After the war, President İnönü commented on the treaty in the following terms: "The nation was alone in confronting the Axis forces, which were practically at the gates of İstanbul. America was not yet a belligerent. Britain had concentrated all its forces at home to repel a possible German invasion. Furthermore, the Germans were bound to the Soviets with a nonaggression treaty. In such dire circumstances, how could anyone expect us to refuse a German guarantee not to attack us?" (İnönü, p. 393).

This shows that Turkey had made a realistic assessment of the situation on the basis of realities well known to all. Despite these considerations, the treaty caused displeasure among the Allies. As soon as the treaty was signed, the U.S., a strong backer of Britain, displayed its displeasure by suspending Lend and Lease aid to Turkey even though it was not yet at war with the Axis. This aid was subsequently restored through British intervention, although at a lower level. This demonstrated once again that Turkey had to tread a fine line and maintain a delicate balance between the belligerents without relying exclusively on the goodwill of either side.

With its southern flank ensured, Germany launched Operation Barbarossa on 22 June. As the German forces crossed the frontier and entered Soviet territory, the war acquired a totally new dimension. Turkey had treaties of alliance or nonaggression with all of the belligerent parties, except Italy and distant Japan. With this dramatic turn of events, Ankara felt much more secure. It had managed to stay out of the war and was now free of the fear of sharing Poland's fate when that country was partitioned following joint German-Soviet aggression. Ankara was soon to discover, however, that it still could not afford to relax its guard.

B. The German-Soviet Conflict and Turkey

With the attack of the German army on the USSR on 22 June 1941, an incongruous and artificial alliance came to an end. The war had now spread to Turkey's north. Although the German-Soviet conflict brought temporary relief from some of Turkey's anxieties, very soon Ankara started experiencing a new kind of pressure. Before the German attack, the pressure on Ankara was coming from Germany and the USSR to interdict the passage through the Straits of vessels belonging to Britain and its allies. The USSR had made such a big issue of this that Turkey even expected a possible Soviet attempt to occupy the Straits militarily. What stopped the Soviets from taking this course was Hitler's rejection of Soviet demands relating to Bulgaria and the Straits. At that stage the USSR felt itself unable to confront Germany on this issue (Aydemir, p. 183).

Now the situation was reversed. Although there was no formal agreement between them, the USSR and Britain found themselves fighting a common enemy. The German-Soviet arm-twisting to keep Allied shipping out of the Straits was replaced by British-Soviet pressure on Ankara to allow Allied shipping to go through the Straits.

From Turkey's viewpoint the nature of its worries had not changed much. In the past Ankara had worried that there might be secret bargaining over the Straits between the Soviet Union and Germany. In addition to the uneasiness it felt about the Axis, Ankara now started worrying about whether the Soviet Union would extract territorial concessions from Britain at Turkey's expense as the price for its war effort against Germany. Indeed the Soviet behavior toward the end of 1942 only helped to increase Turkey's worries.

Three days after the start of the German-Soviet conflict, Turkey delivered a note to the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs, stating that it would remain neutral in the conflict. This was in conformity with the Friendship Agreement between the two countries as well as the Declaration of Nonaggression of March 1941. Following the Treaty of Nonaggression with Germany, the Soviet attitude toward Turkey had been distinctly cool. After the German aggression, the Soviet attitude changed perceptibly. The German attack had greatly enhanced Turkey's strategic position vis-à-vis the USSR. Turkey was now in a position to affect the course of the war by joining the conflict on the side of one of the parties. Even in these circumstances, Turkey's uneasiness about the USSR continued, while the USSR was likewise concerned because of its tough line toward Turkey in the period from 1939 to 1941.

The U.S. started providing the Soviet Union with assistance as soon as it came under German attack but maintained its distant stance toward Turkey. Britain, however, appreciated the increasingly important position of Turkey. As long as Turkey remained nonbelligerent and free from German occupation, it would be denying the German forces access to the Middle East over its territory in accordance with the terms of the Tripartite Alliance. This was a great relief for the British forces in Egypt. Had Turkey joined the war on Britain's side, this would have required Britain to shift sorely needed forces from Africa and elsewhere to Turkey.

At this stage the Allies were experiencing great difficulties in providing help to the USSR. The Baltic route was blocked because of German control of Norway and Denmark. As long as Turkey stayed neutral, it would not open the Straits to Allied shipping because of the Turkish-German Nonaggression Pact. Even if Turkey had relented and opened the Straits, the southern access route would have remained blocked because of the German occupation of the Aegean islands. The long route over eastern Asia was also unusable, because Japan was Germany's ally. The only remaining route was through the Persian Gulf and Iran, but this country was pursuing a pro-Axis policy. Convinced that Iran would deny access to aid shipments through its territory, Britain and the USSR agreed to occupy Iran. Under the agreement, northern Iran would come under Soviet occupation. This meant Soviet troops on Turkey's eastern border. Rumors were also circulating that, after the German attack, Britain had made promises to the Soviet Union regarding the Straits reminiscent of the promises made during World War I.

To allay Turkey's anxieties on this score, both countries delivered notes to Turkey on 10 August 1941. The two countries confirmed their respect for the Montreux Convention and gave assurances that the USSR had no aggressive designs or claims on the Straits. This signified that the USSR was now renouncing the claims over the Straits that it had made to Saracoğlu in Moscow in 1939. Furthermore, both Britain and the USSR undertook to come to Turkey's aid in case of an attack by a European state. When Anthony Eden went to Moscow to confer with Stalin in December 1941, he took the British ambassador in Ankara, Knatchbull-Hugessen, with him. Turkey saw this as evidence of the importance of Turkey in the British-Soviet negotiations and renewed the fears of a possible Soviet-British deal at its expense. Germany was eagerly stoking these fears for its own benefit.

In the meantime Washington's coolness toward Turkey because of its Nonaggression Pact with Germany continued to cloud Turkish-American relations. Relations became even more strained when Turkey concluded a new agreement with Germany for the sale of chromium on 9 October 1941. Churchill, who had a better grasp of Turkey's delicate position and believed that Ankara should be strengthened to resist German pressure, wrote to U.S. president Franklin Delano Roosevelt on 20 October, urging him to restore aid to Turkey. Churchill pointed out that Turkey was very important for the protection of the rear of the British army in Egypt. But Churchill's urging failed to produce any change in the U.S. position. Nevertheless, Britain kept on transferring to Turkey some of the aid material that it was receiving from America.

As U.S.-Japanese relations worsened through the summer of 1941, President Roosevelt, worrying about the effects of possible Japanese entry into the war on the side of Germany, declared on 3 December 1941 that Turkey's defense was important to him. The American position finally changed after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor.

President Roosevelt ordered the restoration of Lend and Lease Law assistance to Turkey, starting from 1942.

As 1941 drew to an end, Turkey had freed itself to a large extent from the pressures of the belligerents and eased its relations with the Allies. As soon as the U.S. became a belligerent, however, German pressure on Turkey was renewed. It will be recalled that Germany had attacked the USSR after Turkey's neutrality had been assured. But now that the U.S. had joined the war, Germany started getting nervous about a possible second front in the Balkans being established by the Allies through Turkey. Until that time, this had been unlikely, because Turkey was staying out of the conflict, uncertain about the true Soviet intentions. But now that the U.S. was in the war, the situation could have changed.

Germany's plans for drawing Turkey to its side consisted of three elements. To prevent a possible Turkish-Soviet rapprochement, Germany revealed the Soviet demands in relation to the Straits put forward at the Hitler-Molotov talks in 1940 as the Soviet condition for concluding an agreement with Germany. The second element was to encourage Pan-Turanist currents in Turkey. Finally, there was an offer to transfer some of the Aegean islands under German control to Turkey (Armaoğlu, p. 16); Howard 1948, p. 71).

It cannot be said that Germany's efforts to draw Turkey into its camp were without effect. To begin with, the Soviet attitude during Saracoğlu's visit to Moscow in 1939 and the tough stand taken by the Soviet Union from 1939 to 1941 had thoroughly shaken the Turkish government's confidence in the USSR. Turkey feared that the balance in Europe would be upset in favor of the USSR in the event of an Allied victory. Furthermore, the occupation of Iran in August 1941 by Britain and the USSR brought to mind a similar event (occupation of Iran by Britain and the USSR) that had taken place in 1907. According to leaked information, during his visit to Moscow in 1941 Eden had also discussed the question of redrawing borders in Europe with Stalin. All this inevitably brought to mind the secret agreements concluded at Turkey's expense by Britain, Russia, and France during World War I. In the course of Eden's talks with Stalin over the postwar arrangements, Stalin proposed that the Dodecanese Islands, parts of Bulgaria, and northern Syria be awarded to Turkey. In a dispatch sent to Ankara in February 1942, Turkey's ambassador in Moscow, Haydar Aktay, reported that "it is surprising that the Soviet Union would favor us to this extent, even when we are not involved in the war. This should be seen as a matter for concern rather than satisfaction." Ankara was also taken by surprise and remained suspicious over Stalin's sudden friendship (Gürün 1983, pp. 87–88).

The general impression in Ankara was that, if Stalin was ready to award certain territories to Turkey, he would probably demand corresponding concessions, perhaps in the Straits, from Turkey (Armaoğlu, p. 164).

Eden's talks in Moscow ended without a definitive agreement over the question of frontiers. The question was taken up once again by Molotov during his visit to London in May 1942, but once again no agreement was reached, owing to Soviet demands relating to Poland. When Stalin accepted Eden's offer of an agreement that left out the question of frontiers on 23 May, however, the two countries were able to sign an alliance agreement three days later. On the same day, Eden informed the Turkish ambassador that Britain remained faithful to Montreux, that Turkey's territorial integrity would be respected, and that Britain would come to Turkey's aid in case of attack.

In the meantime Turkish public opinion was gradually turning more pro-German. With substantial secret funds from Germany, Pan-Turanist movements were gathering momentum. Von Papen received 5 million gold marks "to support friends of Germany...who are experiencing financial difficulties" (Box 3-5). Turkey and Germany even held talks on the subject of organizing the Turks in the USSR (Armaoğlu, p. 164). Among those who were engaged in these activities were prominent personalities such as Ahmet Caferoğlu, the former minister of foreign affairs of Crimea, who had migrated to Turkey after the Communists took over Crimea; Ayus İshaki; Prφfessor Zeki Velidi Togan; Mehmet Emin Resulzade, the former Speaker of the parliament of Azerbaijan; Nuri Paşa, the stepbrother of Enver Paşa; and Gen. Emir Erkilet. Among the secret German documents published by the Soviets after the war was a letter written on 17 November 1941 to General Erkilet: "We are now waiting for the press finally to publish the articles that have been promised to us and the world" (Gizli Belgeler, p. 47).

In the meantime there was a failed attempt to assassinate von Papen in Ankara on 24 February 1942. The investigation indicated that this was the work of the USSR, which was seeking to create a rift between Germany and Turkey. This was a further blow to Turkish-Soviet relations, and the Soviet ambassador was recalled. The instigators of the attempt were two Soviet citizens, who were sentenced to prison terms of sixteen and eight years. Both were to be released one week after Turkey severed its relations with Germany on 2 August 1944.

Despite the pro-German tendency of the general public, the Turkish government had no inclination to join the conflict on Germany's side. During his meeting with von Papen on 27 August 1942, the new prime minister, Saracoğlu, declared that as a Turk he ardently wished to

Personal to the Ambassador

In reply to your dispatch No. a-61154 of 20 November, I have issued instructions for the transfer to you of 5 million gold Reichsmarks to support friends of Germany in Turkey who are experiencing financial difficulties. You may use these funds freely and generously. Please keep me informed about how this money is spent.

see the collapse of the USSR, which he regarded as an opportunity that might come "once in a thousand years." But as prime minister he was convinced that Turkey must pursue a policy of strict neutrality (Armaoğlu, p. 164). That was an indication that Berlin's campaign to draw Turkey to the German side, which had been going on for a whole year, had failed. This angered von Ribbentrop, who instructed von Papen in September 1942 to end his negotiations with the Turkish government on the subject of the Turks in the USSR.

At this time, Churchill was in Moscow conferring with Stalin. In these talks Stalin emphasized the importance of a second front in France. On the subject of Turkey, Stalin did not appear to mind that Ankara continued to pursue a policy of neutrality. As the British position in northern Africa continued to improve in the course of the year, however, the subject of Turkey came up in connection with the supplying of war materiel to the USSR. In the fall of 1942 Churchill and Stalin reached an agreement about the need to press Turkey to join the Allies in the spring of the following year.

III. 1943–1945: NORTHERLY WINDS TOWARD THE END OF THE WAR

A. Allied Efforts to Draw Turkey into the War The German pressure on Turkey failed to produce results. Starting in the fall of 1942, however, it was the Allies' turn to exert increasing pressure on Turkey. After the German retreats in the battle of Stalingrad, which started in November 1942, the Allies started planning the final defeat of Germany. Because of Turkey's strategic location, it was only natural that Turkey would figure in these plans.

Stalingrad also constituted a turning point for Turkish-Soviet relations. The understanding and friendship toward Turkey displayed by the USSR following the German attack evaporated quickly, and relations returned to their pre-1941 state after the Soviet victory. Turkey saw that the outcome of the battle of Stalingrad would be bad for the Germans and started considering its long-term implications. After the victory at Stalingrad, would the Allies be able to prevent the Soviet Union from becoming the master of Europe? This question was at the base of Turkey's apprehensions. Nevertheless, Turkey was determined to stay out of the conflict. But the Allied pressure on Turkey intensified with each German retreat.

As the battle of Stalingrad raged on, the German forces had also been stalled in North Africa. With the German armies pinned down in both fronts, the idea of pressing the Germans by establishing a new front in western or southern Europe came to the fore. This would relieve the German pressure on the USSR, enabling it to counterattack and thrust into the Balkan Peninsula. According to Churchill, the key element in all these plans was Turkey. Until then it had been enough for Turkey merely to remain nonbelligerent in order to contain Germany within Europe. But now the Turkish stance was preventing the Allies from moving into Europe in order to squeeze Germany. On 18 November Churchill ordered his generals to exert the necessary effort to get Turkey to enter the war on the Allied side in the spring of 1943. Churchill believed that to achieve this goal Turkey had to be supplied with the necessary weapons throughout that winter and Britain, the USSR, and the U.S. had to guarantee Turkey's territorial integrity (Churchill, vol. 4, pp. 697-98). After obtaining Roosevelt's backing, Churchill took up this question with Stalin. Stalin's response on 28 November was that he favored making every effort to get Turkey into the war in the spring of 1943. Nothing happened on this, however, until the Casablanca Conference.

The Casablanca Conference

On 14 January 1943 Roosevelt and Churchill met in Casablanca, Morocco, and considered the progress of the war. It was there that they reached a very important decision: the war would be pursued until the enemy surrendered unconditionally.

Turkey was convinced that after the war Germany should be preserved as a stabilizing element against the USSR in order to ensure lasting peace in Europe. But, since Turkey was a nonbelligerent, its views were being ignored even though Turkey was among the important subjects considered at the talks. The two leaders concluded once again that a new effort must be made to get Turkey to enter the war and decided that Churchill should undertake this mission on behalf of both leaders. There was a tacit agreement at Casablanca that the U.S. would be responsible for dealing with China, while Britain would be responsible for dealing with Turkey. This even meant that the American military assistance to be provided to Turkey to secure its participation in the war would be delivered through Britain. Although it was not explicitly stated, this could well be interpreted to mean that in the postwar period Britain wanted to see Turkey in its zone of influence.

In line with their decision, the two leaders sent İnönü separate messages on 25 January calling on him to meet Churchill. İnönü agreed to do so.

The Adana Meeting (The İnönü-Churchill Talks)

The talks between İnönü and Churchill took place between 30 January and 1 February 1943 in the Turkish presidential train at the station of Yenice near Adana. The Turkish delegation included prime minister Şükrü Saracoğlu, minister of foreign affairs Numan Menemencioğlu, chief of staff Marshal Fevzi Çakmak, and a number of military advisors.

The subjects taken up at the talks were Turkey's nonbelligerent status, the state of Turkish-Soviet relations, the situation in the Balkans, and the need to build up the capability of the Turkish armed forces.

Churchill pointed out that the Allied victories at Stalingrad and in Egypt had largely eliminated the danger of a German attack on Turkey from the north or the south; but given the German need for petroleum, there might be a German thrust from the center toward the Middle East during the summer. He added that Turkey needed to be strengthened in order to be able to withstand such an attack. Furthermore, if the Soviets went on the offensive in the north and the Allies did likewise in the south through Turkey, Germany could be brought to its knees in a fairly short time. Churchill concluded by asking that Turkey enter the war on the side of the Allies before the end of 1943. In his response İnönü indicated first that the Turkish armed forces had to be equipped properly to enable Turkey to contemplate war. He added that Ankara was still unable to trust the USSR and worried that the Soviet Union would dominate Europe after Germany's defeat.

At subsequent negotiations it was decided that the necessary military preparations for Turkey to withstand a possible German attack must be undertaken at once and that, as a priority measure, Turkey must be provided with a one-year-supply of military equipment. In addition, a British aircraft squadron would be dispatched to defend localities likely to be targets of air attack, and some antiaircraft and antitank units would be placed under Turkish command.

On the second day of the negotiations, serious differences emerged on the subject of Turkish worries about the Soviet Union after Stalingrad. Churchill tried to dispel these Turkish anxieties by pointing out that he had talked to Molotov and Stalin on this subject, that they both wanted friendly and peaceful relations with Britain and the U.S., that the USSR would be preoccupied with reconstruction and development for the next ten years and would need technical assistance from the Allies, and that communism was in the process of changing. He concluded with the prediction that the USSR would maintain good relations with Britain and the U.S. İnönü and Saracoğlu referred to the possibility of the USSR emerging from the war as an imperialist power; following the final defeat of Germany, the Slavs and Communists might spread all over Europe and draw the former allies of Germany into the Soviet fold. Churchill countered that an international organization to maintain peace and security would be established after the war that would be much more effective than the League of Nations. He declared that he did not fear communism; should the USSR behave like Germany, the whole membership of the new organization would take a united stand against it.

It will be noted that at the Adana talks there was a sharp divergence between the Turkish viewpoint and Churchill's views regarding the USSR's postwar orientation. They agreed, however, on the need to strengthen the Turkish armed forces and that, even if it stayed out of the war, Turkey's position was of benefit to the Allied war effort.

In his memoirs von Papen wrote that at the time he had been issuing peace feelers in Ankara. Knowing this, İnönü proposed to Churchill at Adana that von Papen be used as an intermediary to transmit a peace offer to Germany. But Churchill turned down İnönü's proposal. Ş. Süreyya Aydemir (p. 263), however, claims that İnönü assured him that he had never made such a proposal to Churchill. Wherever the truth may lie, at that stage İnönü's main concern was to convince the Allies, and especially Churchill, that Germany must not be utterly destroyed but rather preserved as a stabilizing element against the USSR in Europe.

Although a major effort was made to keep the Adana meeting a secret, it soon became public knowledge and had major repercussions, above all in Germany. By remaining neutral, Turkey was effectively preventing the establishment of a new front in the Balkans. The first step in an Allied invasion of the Balkans would have to be getting Turkey into the war.

The feeling in Berlin was that Turkey would remain neutral for the time being. If the war continued to go against Germany, however, it was concluded that Turkey would reappraise its position. As a result Von Ribbentrop instructed von Papen on 6 February to spare no effort to keep Turkey neutral and especially to keep on stressing that what kept Turkey safe vis-à-vis the USSR was Germany's determination to shield Turkey.

When von Ribbentrop met Mussolini in Rome on 25 February to discuss the course of the war, Turkey continued to be one of the main subjects. According to von Ribbentrop's appraisal, Turkey actually wanted Germany to defeat the USSR, knowing that, with Germany out of the picture, Britain and the U.S. would be unable to resist Molotov's demands regarding the Straits that were made in November 1940. Consequently, according to von Ribbentrop, even if Turkey did not enter the war on the side of the Axis, it would not appear to be anti-Axis either.

These analyses were in large measure in conformity with the Turkish state of mind. Menemencioğlu had informed von Papen during a conversation that the reason Turkey resisted all the Allied demands and remained non-belligerent was because it still did not fully trust the Allied policies.

Despite these misgivings, Turkey's relations with the Allies in the months after the Adana talks were quite close. The British press praised Turkey for its policies and its loyalty to its alliance. In a statement in the House of Commons on 11 February 1943, Churchill declared that Britain had no intention of pressing Turkey and that Ankara had consistently stood up to pressures from all quarters, thus preventing the spread of the war to new theaters and rendering a great service to the Allies.

It was clear that all sides were quite satisfied with Turkey's stance, at least for the time being. Only Stalin remained fairly cool toward Churchill when he reported the results of his talks with Turkish leaders. In his letter to Stalin, Churchill proposed a Soviet goodwill gesture toward Turkey to put Ankara at ease, but Stalin was not inclined to comply (Gürün 1983, pp. 91–93). In his reply to Churchill, Stalin recalled that before the German attack on the USSR Ankara had not responded positively to Moscow's friendly overtures and that he failed to see how Turkey was going to be able to reconcile its commitments to the USSR, to Britain, and to Germany. If Turkey still wanted to maintain relations based on friendship with the USSR, however, it could signify its intentions and Moscow would meet Turkey at the halfway point. This was the first time that Stalin was saying, "If the Turks desire Soviet friendship, let them say so." This approach and the desire to see Turkey in a position of soliciting Soviet friendship would be displayed repeatedly by Moscow until the end of the war.

Upon receipt of Stalin's response, talks were started between Turkey and the USSR on Churchill's and Ankara's initiative. On 12 March Turkish ambassador Cevat Açıkalın briefed Molotov on the Adana meeting and indicated that Turkey stood ready to cooperate in seeking formulas that would help improve relations between the two countries. At subsequent contacts, however, the Soviet side, continuously stressing that the request for improving relations came from Turkey, tried to put Turkey in the position of a country making demands on the USSR rather than an ally engaged in bilateral talks. The USSR also rejected Turkey's request for a joint declaration on the ground that it was unnecessary. Moscow declared that the parties could make proposals in the future whenever necessary. This ambivalent Soviet stance only intensified Ankara's uncertainties (Gürün 1983, pp. 93-94). Subsequently Molotov twice received Açıkalın. On both occasions Molotov alluded to Turkey's nonaggression treaty with Germany and underlined the displeasure of the USSR over Turkey's good relations with Germany in a period when the USSR was struggling for its survival. He added that, at a time when Germany was being subdued, an intelligent move on the part of Turkey would have a positive effect on its relations with the USSR.

At this point both Turkey and the USSR were seeking to restore the atmosphere that had been lost in their relations four years earlier during Saracoğlu's visit to Moscow, when the Soviets rejected Ankara's offer to establish an alliance between the two countries. But Moscow was uncomfortable over the similarity of the Turkish and British positions that emerged at Adana. Moscow was also eager to see Turkey in the war at an early date. Turkey's policy at this juncture, however, was to preserve its strength in preparation for the postwar period rather than to become engaged in the war.

The Quebec Conference

Despite the USSR's misgivings and Turkey's resistance, Britain's efforts to get Turkey in the war on the Allied side continued after the Adana talks. If anything, these efforts were intensified as Italy's collapse loomed nearer. With Italy completely out of the picture, Turkey's anxieties over the Mediterranean would be overcome. This would make it easier to apply pressure on Turkey to comply with its alliance commitments.

In 1943 the war had reached a decisive turning point. On the eastern front, the Germans had retreated from Stalingrad, but the Soviet counteroffensive had not yielded the expected results. In North Africa, the Allies had scored important successes and were now in possession of Sicily. At a time when the Allies had seized the initiative, the pressure on Turkey to declare war reached a critical level.

It was in these circumstances, after the victory in North Africa had been sealed, that Churchill and Roosevelt met in Washington on 12–16 May 1943 to appraise the situation. When the question of landing troops in Sicily came up, the two leaders noted that Turkey's policies were being formulated mostly with Italy in mind and decided that the circumstances were right to make a new effort to get Turkey into the war. This would enable the Allies to use Turkish bases to attack the Romanian oil fields, which were of vital importance to Germany. It would also establish a new front in the Balkan Peninsula. Churchill was in favor of opening a second front in the Balkans, while Roosevelt insisted on a landing on the northern coast of France.

The Quebec Conference was held soon afterward, on 11–24 August 1943. The main theme of the conference was the approval of the plans for landing in Normandy, but the subject of Turkey also came up. The conclusion was reached that it was still too early for Turkey to join the Allies in the war, but an attempt would be made to secure the immediate use of Turkish air bases for a second front in the Balkans. At Quebec, it was also decided to continue providing Turkey with military assistance. Turkey would be pressed to stop its exports of chromium to Germany and to prevent the passage of German ships through the Straits.

In addition to these decisions regarding Turkey, the Soviet position at the conference was also a source of concern for Ankara. The USSR was adamantly against the British idea of a second front in the Balkans. Moscow insisted that Turkey must be forced into the war without further delay. The Soviets would also maintain this position after Quebec, declaring that Turkey's neutrality was serving Germany's interests to an increasing degree: being sure of its Balkan flank, Germany was now able to concentrate the bulk of its forces on the eastern front. Now that the outcome of the war was no longer in doubt, Moscow did not want to see the forces of the Western Allies in the Balkans, a region it considered to be its natural zone of influence. If Turkey entered the war, this would obviate the need for the Allies to establish a second front in the Balkans. During the course of 1944 and 1945 this Soviet position became even stronger.

The Moscow Conference

At Quebec, the question of holding a summit meeting with the participation of Stalin was also discussed. But subsequent correspondence revealed that Stalin was reluctant to attend, so it was decided to hold a meeting in Moscow at the ministerial level. At the preparatory meeting for the conference, Turkey did not figure in the agenda. The Moscow Conference acquired significance for Turkey, however, due to various bits of information reaching the Turkish government.

Shortly before the conference, the Turkish embassies in Madrid and Stockholm reported that rumors were circulating of a separate peace between the USSR and Germany (T.C. Dışişleri Bakanlığı 1999, p. 17). At this point in the war, all of Turkey's western borders from Crimea in the north to Rhodes in the south were under German control. Of the military material promised by Churchill at Adana, only a small fraction had been delivered.

Under these circumstances, the rumors of a separate Soviet-German peace gave rise to serious concern in Ankara, particularly when it became known that the Soviets had put forward numerous claims against Turkey in negotiations with Germany in Berlin in November 1940. When the news came that Eden and Hull were going to Moscow, the question arose in Ankara whether the Allies would modify their war plans and whether Britain and the U.S. were considering offering Moscow any concessions to prevent it from concluding a separate peace (T.C. Dışişleri Bakanlığı 1999, p. 18). At the dinner following the conference, Stalin declared that a separate peace with Germany was not on the agenda and that Berlin's soundings in this direction would be ignored. This confirmed that the rumors reaching Ankara were not groundless.

The meeting of Eden, Hull, and Molotov got underway in Moscow on 19 October 1943. At the first session, Molotov laid aside the agenda that had been agreed to at the preparatory meeting and proposed a new agenda, in which item 2 was Turkey entering the war. This agenda was adopted with no objection from Eden or Hull. In the course of the negotiations, Britain put forward the view that pressing Turkey to enter the war at that stage would lead to demands from Ankara for quantities of weapons that could not be met. If Turkey was allowed a grace period, however, it would eventually join the Allies of its own volition, and this would allow difficulties to be surmounted. Eden also felt that the timing of Turkey's entering the war would be influenced by German moves in the Balkans.

The American position was that forcing Turkey into the war would entail diverting large quantities of arms and equipment from the Italian front as well as from the supplies earmarked for the Normandy landing to Turkey. The U.S. was firmly against this. Instead it favored asking Ankara to allow the use of Turkish air bases, even if Turkey remained neutral. Also, the U.S. was stating clearly that it could not provide any arms to Turkey to secure its joining the war. In these circumstances, the burden of supplying arms to Turkey to get Ankara to join the Allies would rest exclusively with Britain. Britain was well aware that Turkey's requirements for air defense support in the event of Ankara's active engagement in the war could not be met without affecting preparations for the second front.

Molotov argued that it should not be necessary to provide Turkey with arms assistance if its entry into the war was going to be further delayed. It was not enough to ask Turkey to make its air bases available to the Allies: Turkey should be asked to enter the war right away. At a later stage it would not matter all that much. Finally, a proposal for the big three to address a joint request to Turkey for it to abandon its policy of neutrality was approved (Gürün 1983, p. 100). Eventually, on 1 November, Eden and Molotov signed an agreement. Lacking authorization to do so, Hull was not among the signatories.

One. In order to be able to join the united nations to accelerate the defeat of Hitler's Germany, which is the common objective of Turkey and other peace-loving states, the two Ministers consider it to be highly desirable for Turkey to participate in the war on the side of the united nations before the end of 1943.

Two. On behalf of the British and Soviet Governments, the two Ministers have agreed to request from Turkey, at the earliest possible date to be determined between themselves, to enter the war on the side of the united nations before the end of 1943.

Three. The Ministers have also agreed to request immediately that Turkey provide the Allies with bases and other military services as will be determined by the two countries [Turkey and Britain] in order to render all possible assistance to the united nations. (PRFRUS, vol. 1, p. 697)

"At the earliest possible date" and "immediately" were phrases that caught attention.

The USSR demonstrated the importance that it attributed to this question by taking the initiative in the signing of this special agreement. The Soviet Union felt that it had suffered enormous losses in resisting the Germans and that, if the war was to be shortened, there was no reason why Turkey should not make similar sacrifices. In making these requests, it was not in the least interested in providing Turkey with any material or moral support to induce it to fight against Germany. The USSR held the view that only by engaging actively in the war could Turkey earn the right to be taken into consideration in the postwar arrangements (PRFRUS, vol. 1, p. 700).

Clearly the Soviet Union was very interested in seeing Turkey in the war as soon as possible. But it is doubtful that the reason for this was to "shorten the war" as it claimed. Toward the end of 1943 the German pressure on the eastern front had abated, and the USSR was confident that it would emerge victorious from the conflict. It should be noted that, even as the Soviets insisted on Turkey entering the war right away and providing air bases to the Allies, they were obstructing the Allied project for American bombers to hit German industrial installations from air bases located on Soviet soil.

Turkey's leaders knew that the Soviet need to have Turkey involved in the war to relieve German pressure on the Russian front was in no way as acute as it had been in 1941 or 1942, so they tried to discover Moscow's real motives. Ankara concluded that the Soviet motives were either for the USSR to "liberate" Turkey from German occupation at the end of the war or to deal with a war-weary, weakened Turkey alone (Gürün 1983, p. 100; Armaoğlu, p. 170). In his conversations with Eden in Cairo on 5 November 1943, Menemencioğlu remarked: "You report that the Russians want us in the war in order to bring the conflict to an early end. But couldn't we also conclude that they would like to see a debilitated Turkey?" (T.C. Dışişleri Bakanlığı 1973, pp. 152–53). These comments shed some light on how Turkey's leaders analyzed the situation.

It has also been claimed that Moscow was intent on stemming the flow of military aid to Turkey and gave backing to Allied demands for Turkey to enter the war while knowing full well that Ankara would not comply. In other words, the Allies would ask Turkey to enter the war; when Turkey failed to do so, they would suspend their military aid. This would leave Turkey in a weaker condition vis-à-vis the USSR at the end of the war.

It is difficult to assess the correctness of these analyses. But Moscow was worried about the continuing supply of British arms and equipment to Turkey within the framework of the Adana agreement. The USSR suspected that the British were bolstering Turkey not only against Germany during the war but also against the USSR in the postwar period (T.C. Dışişleri Bakanlığı 1999, p. 27). These Soviet suspicions were probably the reason for their insistence on seeking Turkey's immediate entry into the war in Moscow, even though the subject was not on the meeting's agenda. Knowing that Turkey would not agree, Moscow was seeking to secure the suspension of arms deliveries to Turkey by this tactic.

As noted above, by 1943 the Soviets could start considering the postwar period. With German pressure reduced and the tide of war running against Germany, Moscow could now direct its attention from survival to postwar arrangements. In this context the USSR was seeking to prevent a second front in the Balkans, which would result in the region being overrun by British and American forces. Britain's insistence on a second front to be opened in the Balkans, in turn, could also be interpreted as being motivated by the desire to prevent the Soviets from taking over the Balkans in the course of their relentless drive westward against the German invaders. It is not easy to gauge the true intentions of the parties. But after the Moscow talks the USSR gradually abandoned its insistence on active Turkish involvement in the war.

The most noteworthy outcome of these talks was the commitment made to the USSR by Britain and the U.S. to establish a second front in France in the summer of 1944. After this, the question of a full-fledged front in the Balkans was dropped from the agenda. This might also explain why the Soviet Union stopped insisting that Turkey enter the war.

The First Cairo Conference (The Eden-Menemencioğlu Talks)

Even while Eden was in Moscow, he invited Menemencioğlu to Cairo to brief him on what transpired in Moscow. When the two ministers met on 5–6 November 1943, Eden sought to put Menemencioğlu at ease about Soviet intentions in the Balkans. On the basis of his observations, Eden indicated that the USSR was not expansionist (T.C. Dışişleri Bakanlığı 1973, pp. 151–66). Menemencioğlu dwelt at length on his suspicion that the USSR wanted Turkey in the war, not in order to shorten the conflict as it claimed but perhaps to weaken Turkey. He wanted to be convinced that, if Turkey entered the war, the USSR would continue to maintain close relations with Britain and the U.S. in the postwar period and would not do things that the two Western allies did not want. Eden replied by reiterating that there was no sign of Soviet expansionism and tried to intimidate Menemencroğlu by saying that, even if the Soviets had expansionist aims, Turkey could not change them by staying out of the war. Eden also put forward the request for the use of Turkish air bases. Menemencioğlu opposed this request on the ground that to comply would directly draw Turkey into the war.

The Turkish government considered Menemencioğlu's report following his return from Cairo and communicated its official reply to the British ambassador in a note delivered on 17 November. The request for bases was turned down, because it would inevitably lead to war between Turkey and Germany. On the general question of declaring war, the note stressed that "the sacrifices this would entail exceed by far Turkey's physical means." It further stated that declaring war would not bring any benefits to either Turkey or the Allies.

Menemencioğlu's report gave rise to debates both within the government and in the parliamentary caucus of the Republican People's Party. As a result of these debates, the caucus made a decision in principle to declare war and subsequently communicated this decision to the British ambassador. But this declaration of war was made conditional on Turkey being equipped with the means to repulse a possible German attack. Another condition was that there must be a prior agreement on the joint plan of operations of the Turkish and Allied forces in the Balkans. At the time, İnönü had a tight grip over both the party and the parliament. It is difficult to imagine that the party caucus would get in touch with a foreign embassy on such a sensitive issue without İnönü's knowledge and without reference to the parliament. It can be thus assumed that İnönü was seeking to keep under control the likely British reaction to an official negative response. --

The Moscow Conference and the Cairo talks demonstrated that Britain and the USSR were eager to see Turkey in the war as early as possible, but their expectations were divergent. The USSR wanted Turkey in the war because this would relieve the German pressure on the eastern front prior to the establishment of a second front in France. It would also prevent the arrival of British troops in the Balkans. Britain wanted the Mediterranean and the Aegean cleared of German forces in order to secure the safety of the imperial routes to the east. Meanwhile the U.S. was against opening a new front in the Balkans because it wanted to concentrate all its forces in Western Europe and Italy.

Turkey was being pressed by its allies to join the beligerents even though it was not under attack. Turkey was not against declaring war in principle but wanted to know beforehand what political guarantees it could count on regarding its military role during the war and its territorial integrity after the war. Turkey's first precondition for getting involved in the war was the provision of adequate defense aid. Even the aid that Churchill had promised at the Adana talks, however, had not yet been delivered. The second precondition was that the military and political cooperation plans should be drawn up as a preliminary stage to getting involved in the conflict. In this way Turkey wanted to secure political guarantees regarding postwar arrangements by basing its cooperation on solid foundations. This was important: although Turkey had an alliance agreement with Britain, it had no such binding agreements with either the U.S. or the USSR.

Before leaving Cairo, Menemencioğlu made some remarks to Eden in an informal context that gave an inkling of how the Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs viewed the inconsistencies in the Allied position and why it insisted on the preconditions described above:

On three separate occasions, you made proposals to us that were unsound. If we had agreed to any of these proposals, your cause would have suffered great damage. When Italy entered the war in 1940, you proposed that we do likewise. What would have been the result if we had listened to you? In 1941 you did the same thing in connection with Yugoslavia... Finally, you sought to get us to force the Germans to attack us before they attacked the USSR. You would have paid dearly if you had succeeded in bringing ruin upon us in this way. Your actions were reminiscent of a divisional commander desperately trying to plug holes when things start going wrong. When you were in serious trouble, such errors may have been inevitable. But today you are strong and have the upper hand. Yet you are committing the same errors. Your proposals would appear to make Turkey dispensable. You are needlessly treating Turkey as if it were expendable just to please the Russians. At a time when our army lacks the means to mount offensive action because the promises made at Adana have not been honored yet, it would be suicidal for us to challenge the Germans. If our defensive line at Catalca is breached and the Germans overrun Istanbul, the Straits, and the adjacent regions, what gain would that bring to the Allies? Are we to wait and hope for the Russians to best the Germans and liberate Istanbul? For whose benefit would the Russians be liberating Istanbul? While these facts are so obvious, you keep telling us that the delivery of war materials is difficult or practically impossible unless we declare war. Can't you understand that this is landing you in a vicious circle? As long as you withhold the military equipment, our combat capability will remain inadequate, forcing us to stay out of the war. As long as we stay out of the war, you will deny us the military equipment. Does that make any sense? (Gürün 1983, pp. 103–4)

The Tehran Conference and the Changed Soviet Position

While the Cairo talks were taking place, the decision was reached to hold a summit meeting of the big three in Tehran. While assessments were being made of the Cairo talks with a number of ambassadors stationed in Ankara, Churchill and Roosevelt met in Cairo on 23-24 November 1943 in order to exchange views before proceeding to Tehran for the summit meeting. When the subject of Turkey came up, Churchill dwelt on the benefits to be derived from Turkey's entering the war and proposed that they meet with İnönü after Tehran. Meanwhile British and U.S. military planners were working out the details of the second front to be established in Western Europe. In this context, they agreed that the Soviet proposal to force Turkey into the war would only be supported on condition that assistance to Turkey would not be to the detriment of the second front and that it would not involve any diversion of troops.

In this situation, the vicious circle that Menemencioğlu had brought to Eden's attention in Cairo became apparent. The Soviets wanted to coerce Turkey into the war, while the Americans would only accept this on condition that no forces were diverted to Turkey from other fronts. The British position was more complex: they were seeking a compromise solution acceptable to all sides. They argued that no diversion of forces would be necessary while trying to persuade Ankara that limited arms aid would suffice, because Germany was not about to attack Turkey. Ankara did not accept the British arguments and stood firm; it was not prepared militarily and had not received any political guarantees.

While these contacts were going on, it became apparent that one of the main subjects on the agenda of the Tehran summit scheduled to take place on 28 November—1 December 1943 would be Turkey. The British and American positions on this subject had not yet been harmonized. The topic of Turkey came up on each day of the four-day-long summit, while the different committees also discussed it in great detail. The subject of Turkey's entrance to the war was critical, because Ankara's action would have a profound effect on the course of the war and a decision to go to war could provide substantial advantages to the Allies. If Turkey entered the war, this would open a new supply route to the USSR through the Straits. All it would take to establish this route into the Black Sea would be to liberate some of the German-occupied Aegean islands lying off the Turkish coast. The establishment of this shorter route would be helpful to the USSR, while releasing considerable shipping for other purposes. Furthermore, it would be possible to hit sensitive targets under German control from bases located on Turkish soil. Among these would be the oil installations of Romania. This could also create conditions leading to the withdrawal of Bulgaria and Romania from the war (Berejkov, pp. 128-46).

It appears from the records that Stalin had reservations about Turkey's goodwill and its intention to enter the war under any condition. He openly asserted in Tehran that he did not expect Turkey to declare war and that he was prepared to allow British and American pressure to be applied to force Turkey to declare its true intention. From Stalin's point of view, this could also have the beneficial effect of bringing about a cooling in Turkey's relations with the Western Allies. Churchill was of the view that the USSR took a close interest in the subject and sought to reassure Moscow that the measures to be taken to assist Turkey would delay the landing in Western Europe by only two to three months.

Roosevelt was against any action that would delay the landing in Europe, and this included providing aid to Turkey to get it into the war. As the negotiations progressed, Stalin too adopted the position that the priority objective was the opening of the second front. He also took advantage of an opening provided by Churchill to raise the issue of the Straits.

On the second day of the conference, Churchill revealed the tactic that he would use to persuade Turkey to join the Allies: Turkey would be reminded that to ignore a plea made by the big three would have important consequences, especially with regard to the status of the Straits (T.C. Dışişleri Bakanlığı 1973, pp. 176–77). That day the matter was left there, but Stalin returned to the subject the next day and, with reference to the USSR's need for warmwater ports, declared that it was essential to revise the Montreux Convention. Churchill replied that he would be gratified to see the Soviet navy and merchant fleet in the high seas and in British ports, but to raise the issue at a time when they were trying to persuade Turkey to enter the war would be untimely and counterproductive. Roosevelt said that the Straits would be open to world trade. At that point the discussion of the subject came to an end.

On the last day of the conference, it was generally agreed that asking Turkey to enter the war would inevitably be linked to the question of what kind of aid Turkey could expect from Britain and the U.S. Apart from the seventeen air squadrons that Britain said it could provide to Turkey for its air defense, however, the parties refrained from specifying the type and quantity of aid that they could provide if Turkey declared war on the side of the Allies. It also became clear that the parties had no intention of sending any troops to Turkey. The leaders agreed that Turkey would not allow the use of its air bases prior to actually becoming engaged in war. The declaration containing the final decisions was eventually signed on 1 December. In the parts related to Turkey, it was stated that "it would be highly desirable from a military point of view for Turkey to enter the war on the side of the Allies before the end of the current year" (article 2); "if Turkey finds itself at war with Germany, and then Bulgaria declares war on or attacks Turkey," the USSR would immediately declare war on Bulgaria (article 3). It was also made clear that this was the last chance for Turkey to join the belligerents and earn the right to participate with the major powers to the peace conference (Gürün 1983, pp. 111-13).

The Second Cairo Conference

Even before the Tehran Conference was over, Roosevelt and Churchill got in touch with İnönü and invited him to Cairo for talks. Turkey's initial response to the invitation was cautious. If the purpose of the invitation was merely to inform Turkey about decisions reached with Stalin, İnönü would decline to go. If they intended to discuss how the common cause could best be served, however, İnönü would accept the invitation. Upon receiving assurances that the purpose of the meeting was the latter, İnönü proceeded to Cairo and met with Roosevelt and Churchill on 4–8 December 1943.

At this juncture the general public and the parliament were united in opposition to Turkey's direct involvement in the war. Although the government had gone to some lengths, especially in 1943, to prepare the public for war as a consequence of the Allied pressure on Turkey, public opinion was nevertheless generally opposed to declaring war without having been attacked. Many deputies within the Republican People's Party were even opposed to İnönü's trip to Cairo. In a dispatch to his government, the British ambassador in Ankara noted that a number of influential deputies in the parliament would strongly oppose İnönü and Saracoğlu if Turkey went to war in its state of unreadiness at that time. If things went badly wrong, there would be serious consequences for İnönü as well as the Allies (top secret message, dated 3 December 1943; T.C. Dışişleri Bakanlığı 1999, p. 77). By agreeing to go to Cairo in these circumstances, İnönü was taking enormous political risks.

At the talks that began on 4 December, Churchill was particularly insistent on Turkey's early entrance into the war. He pursued the tactic that he had outlined in Tehran and emphasized the advantages that would accrue to Turkey if it agreed to go to war: Turkey would benefit from friendly relations with all of the Allies, including the USSR, and at the end of the war would take its place among the victors as a friend and ally. If it failed to heed the Allied calls, it would find itself isolated and, instead of "being among the powerful, it would be a mere spectator walking in the corridors" (Armaoğlu, p. 171).

Under heavy Allied pressure, İnönü finally agreed "in principle" to enter the war, but only if the necessary arms and supplies for the country's defense would be provided before Turkey's declaration of war. He also wanted the joint operational plans to be drawn up before taking any action. After this, the Turkish and British delegations spent a great deal of time on what was to be understood by the preparatory stage. Turkey interpreted this as the period when the army and air force would acquire their new equipment and complete their training, while Britain maintained that Turkey would be ready when the air bases had been made ready and the aircraft were delivered. Turkey stated that the delivery of aircraft would be tantamount to a declaration of war and might well lead to a "preemptive strike" by Germany, which had made a practice of striking preemptively up to that time. Britain declared that the air bases from which British aircraft would operate would be ready by 15 February 1944 and called on Turkey to declare war on that date. İnönü argued that the arrival of British aircraft did not signify that the Turkish army was ready and that to comply with the British request might well result in the army having to fight against Germany single-handedly. Consequently, he held his position that Turkey could only declare war at the end of the preparatory stage.

The negotiations remained deadlocked over this issue. Roosevelt tended to agree with the Turkish view and before leaving Cairo on 7 December told İnönü to "start your preparations right away and do not feel bound to take any particular course of action" (PRFRUS, p. 711).

Inönü and Churchill continued their talks for another day and left Cairo on 8 December without reaching any firm decision. Before leaving Cairo, Churchill handed İnönü a plan with a request that a reply be given in four or five days. İnönü made no commitment, however, other than repeating his agreement "in principle" that war would be declared if certain conditions were met. As a result, Turkey was able to gain time in Cairo and refused to be bound by the decision reached in Tehran to get Turkey into the war by a certain date.

An important development from Turkey's point of view was the absence of the Soviet Union from the Cairo meeting despite the Tehran decision for it to take part. Stalin pleaded that his schedule did not permit him to participate and appointed deputy foreign affairs commissar Vyshinsky to represent him in Cairo. Vyshinsky was also absent from the meeting, however, and the Soviet ambassador in Ankara, Sergey Vinogradov, who did go to Cairo, did not attend the meeting. It can be surmised that Stalin had changed his mind about Turkey's participation in the war after Tehran. He probably concluded that the USSR was capable of defeating the Germans on the eastern front single-handedly and was firmly against seeing any Allied troops in the Balkans under any circumstances. Furthermore, he did not want the USSR to be a party to any assistance or "rewards" that would be bestowed on Turkey as a condition for it to declare war. In this way Stalin was able to evade any commitments regarding postwar arrangements and would remain free to negotiate with Turkey in a manner "that suited the new circumstances" (T.C. Dışişleri Bakanlığı 1999, p. 76).

B. The Crisis of Confidence: Tensions between Turkey and the Allies

At the second Cairo Conference, the efforts of the Allies to get Turkey into the war reached their peak. When İnönü returned to Ankara, the question was taken up in the cabinet, which concluded that the British plan would not be acceptable as it stood. This decision was communicated to the British embassy.

According to the British plan, the air bases would be made ready by 15 February, munitions and other military equipment would be delivered to Turkey by then, and the war plans and political issues would be discussed and settled. On 15 February permission would be sought from Turkey for the British aircraft to come to Turkey. If the response turned out to be negative, the Allies would give up their plans to cooperate with Turkey and transfer their military resources to other theaters. In the event of a positive response, the supplies of materials and equipment for the Turkish army and air force would continue, British armored and antitank units would be brought forward, a maritime supply route to Turkey would be established, and Turkey would declare war according to a predetermined plan. There was also an annex to the plan describing the aid materials that would immediately be forthcoming.

According to Churchill's plan, British aircraft would reach Turkey long before the Turkish army was ready for even a defensive war from the point of view of equipment and ammunition. İnönü kept pointing this out to the British. In the event of a German attack in response to Allied bombing of German targets from Turkish bases, Turkey would have to resist such an attack alone and without adequate preparation. To reinforce the Turkish army with British armored and antitank units would take at least one or two months. The Ottoman Empire had been drawn into World War I against its will and unprepared, as a consequence of the actions of two warships operating out of Turkish ports under the command of a German admiral when they attacked Russia. It could not be expected that those who had lived through that experience would allow Turkey to go through a similar experience in World War II.

The note dated 12 December 1943 addressed to the British Embassy stated that, although Turkey accepted the Cairo proposals in principle, it could not accept a situation that might lead to an attack on Turkey before the Turkish army and air force had been adequately reinforced. It also stated that, in addition to the military equipment to be supplied by Britain, Turkey and Britain would have to prepare joint military plans and subsequently reach common positions on political questions. Thus it would not be possible to give a positive response to Britain's proposals for a declaration of war by 15 February before these conditions had been met (T.C. Dışişleri Bakanlığı 1973, p. 205).

In other words, the Turkish government wanted to complete all of its military preparations before declaring war and was also trying to see its way into the future as much as possible. By insisting on the preparation of joint military plans, the government was seeking to ascertain the role that the Turkish army was to play in the conflict. In referring to the settlement of political questions, the government also gave an indication that it wanted to reach an understanding in regard to the postwar situation.

This demonstrated that Turkey had concerns about postwar arrangements. In fact, the message to the Turkish Embassy in London conveying the decision of the Turkish government indicates that the minister of foreign affairs suspected that it was probably in response to Soviet insistence that Turkey was being asked to commit itself to going to war before its minimum defense needs had been met. Furthermore, information had been received to the effect that the agreement signed at the Moscow Conference by Eden and Molotov contained secret clauses dealing with Turkey. These were some of the concerns and suspicions that motivated the Turkish leaders in Cairo.

Despite Turkey's negative response, Britain proposed that the commanders of the land, sea, and air forces as well as the commander of Middle East Forces meet in Ankara with the chief of the Turkish General Staff to consider the situation at a technical level. The arrival in Ankara of these senior Allied officers would be contrary to the decision made at Cairo to refrain from any action that might provoke Germany at the preparatory stage. Britain was notified of this, and an exchange of notes resulted in the arrival in Ankara of a low-level military delegation in January 1944 to hold talks with the General Staff. After almost a month of fruitless talks, the delegation left Turkey abruptly on 3 February, putting a strain on Turkish-British relations.

Britain was beginning to suspect that the Turks were asking for excessive amounts of military equipment. Deliveries of such large amounts could not be completed until the end of the war, so Turkey would be able to stay out of the war until it was over. As for the Turks, they were concerned that Britain had made promises to the Soviets and the Greeks regarding the Balkans and the Aegean islands. As a matter of fact, Menemencioğlu wrote a personal letter to Knatchbull-Hugessen in which he accused Britain of reaching an agreement with the Soviet Union to establish zones of influence in which London would allow full freedom to the USSR in the Balkans and also get Turkey into the war (Knatchbull-Hugessen, pp. 196–97).

One day after the British military delegation left Turkey, the Foreign Office sent a cable to the U.S. State Department reporting that the talks with the Turks had ended and that Turkish-British relations had been frozen and requesting the U.S. to follow a similar course. On 7 February 1944 the U.S. ambassador in Ankara, Laurence Steinhardt, was instructed to cool off relations with Turkey. Britain suspended its military aid to Turkey on 2 March, and the U.S. did likewise on 1 April. Turkey's relations with the Allies were now at their lowest point.

The Problem of the Export of Chromium to Germany

At this point Turkey and the Allies were going through a crisis of confidence. Britain and the U.S. were reluctant to share their war plans with neutral Turkey, while Turkey refused to get involved in the war without being informed about where, how, and when the Turkish army would have to fight.

At this juncture relations with the Allies became even more strained because of the question of chromium sales. As relations reached a low point in April, the Allies kept pressing Ankara at least to end the sale of chromium to Germany. The question became a hot issue because the Turkish-German trade agreement was due to expire on 30 April 1944. A German delegation had already been in Ankara since the end of March to negotiate an extension of the agreement.

On 9 April U.S. secretary of state Cordell Hull made a statement in which he called on all neutral states to end their trade relations with Germany. The British and the U.S. ambassadors subsequently delivered notes to Ankara in which they threatened to apply to Turkey the blockade measures in force against other neutrals if Ankara kept on delivering strategic materials to Germany.

After the delivery of these notes, the Turkish government received intelligence reports that strained relations even further. According to these reports, the two ambassadors had recommended to their governments that, in the event of Turkey continuing its sale of chromium, this should be disrupted through sabotage or by bombing the two bridges on the Meriç (Maritsa) River.

This question was finally resolved when Turkey first agreed to impose a monthly quota of 4,200 tons on its chromium dispatches to Germany and subsequently, on 21 April 1944, stopped exports altogether on the grounds that Turkey was not a neutral country. Turkey's hesitance to stop the trade altogether from the beginning was not just because of political concerns but also because of the economic difficulties that Turkey expected to experience as a result. Turkey calculated that to suspend sales of chromium to a major trading partner would have inflicted losses that the Allies were not in a position to make up.

After the sales of chromium came to an end, the Allies demanded that the sale of all other strategic materials also be terminated. After negotiations, a trade agreement was concluded toward the end of May by Britain, the U.S., and Turkey, in which Britain and the U.S. agreed to make up for any diminution in Turkey's exports and imports and Turkey agreed to undertake to reduce its trade with the Axis countries by 50%.

The Question of German Ships Passing through the Straits

Just as the question of strategic products was settled, the question of German shipping through the Straits came up. Actually, the question first came up in mid-January when Turkey's relations with the Allies started souring. At that time, the British ambassador informed the Turkish authorities that four small cargo ships suspected of being warships had sailed through the Straits and that five other ships of the same class were preparing to enter the Straits from the Black Sea. Investigations had revealed that the vessels carried no weapons, however, and were too small to be considered auxiliary vessels (see Box 2-13 in Section 2). Similar British complaints nevertheless followed until June. Turkey was allowing these vessels through the Straits because it had determined that they were merchant vessels of small tonnage; according to the Montreux Convention, it could not inspect these ships except on health grounds. Britain contended that these ships had to be stopped because they either were carrying well-camouflaged weapons or were transiting the Straits without weapons but were being armed once they were in the Aegean and then used for military purposes.

Conversely, Turkey's stoppages and inspections of the German ships from time to time on the Turkish Straits based on British complaints were straining its relations with Germany. The difficulties came about because it was not possible to determine the true characteristics of the German ships sailing through the Straits. Furthermore, the British were also demanding that German merchant vessels, which did have a right to transit the Straits, be prevented from using the waterway. It can be argued that, having failed in its attempts to get Turkey into the war, Britain seemed determined to press Turkey in different areas and used the question of German shipping to this end. In contrast, Turkey was interpreting the Montreux Convention in a strict manner and was usually allowing suspicious German ships to sail through the Straits after a perfunctory sanitary examination.

By the end of May the crisis reached its climax when the USSR joined Britain in protesting Turkey's action. Finally, on 5 June, the German navy sought permission for a number of vessels to sail through the Straits on their way to Romania. Britain asked Ankara to deny this request on the ground that the ships in question were auxiliary naval vessels. When Germany gave assurances to Turkey that these ships were not war vessels, Turkey granted permission for the ships to sail into the Black Sea. When the Allies protested this action, Menemencioglu declared that the ships, which had not yet entered the Black Sea, would be allowed to proceed only if German ambassador von Papen gave his personal assurances. In the interval, officials conducted a search in the ships and, upon discovering weapons, radar equipment, and naval uniforms, prevented the ships from entering the Black Sea.

In the meantime the German vessel Kassel, proceeding from the Black Sea, refused to submit to a search. When the ship was searched anyway, it was discovered that it was an auxiliary naval vessel with armor, a camouflaged thirty-ton derrick, and a heavy machine gun. Von Papen claimed that the Kassel was actually a merchant vessel equipped with defensive weapons, but Britain's intelligence had proved to be accurate this time. Turkey delivered a protest to Germany for violating the terms of the Montreux Convention. Germany was also notified that henceforth all German vessels passing through the Straits would be inspected and that vessels of the EMS and Mannheim classes would be turned away without inspection. These measures brought about a tangible improvement in Turkish-British relations.

A few days after this decision, Minister of Foreign Affairs Menemencioğlu resigned on the ground that the policies he had been implementing no longer enjoyed the support of the government. Prime Minister Saracoğlu took on the job as acting minister of foreign affairs until 13 September 1944, when Hasan Saka took up the post. He had been assistant delegate at the Lausanne Peace Conference. Throughout the war years Menemencioğlu had resisted British efforts to get Turkey into the war. Britain perceived him as pro-German. Now that Germany's defeat was a certainty and it was time for Turkey to move closer to Britain, he was being sacrificed in order to shield the state from embarrassment. Actually, Menemencioğlu had been carrying out policies that had the support of both the government and President İnönü. But he assumed full responsibility and resigned to make way for new policies.

C. The End of the War and Turkey

The landing in Normandy on 6 June 1944 and the opening of the second front signified the beginning of the end of the war in Europe. Toward the end of June, Britain and the U.S. started asking Turkey to sever all commercial and diplomatic links with Germany. As the end of the war approached, there was a certain apprehension in Turkey about the postwar arrangements and the way Turkish-Soviet relations would develop.

As a result, Turkey was motivated to seek a rapprochement with the USSR. In this context, strong measures were introduced in May to quell Turanist activities, which had become very noticeable during the war years. In his address on the occasion of the Youth Day festivities of 19 May 1944, İnönü accused the Turanists of plotting a coup d'état. He declared that "the racists and the Turanists have been resorting to covert activities and plots. We shall steadfastly defend our nation against such seditious elements." In stating this, he was giving the first sign of the new mood in the country. In his speech İnönü also recalled the contribution of the USSR to the national struggle following World War I, thus making explicit Turkey's desire to patch up its differences with the USSR. In the meantime twenty-three Turanists, accused of "establishing an illegal association to overthrow the government, engaging in activities contrary to the national interest, and spreading propaganda designed to weaken national feelings," were arrested and put on trial on 18 May. (The defendants, who were subsequently sentenced to various prison terms, did not serve their time, because the Court of Cassation quashed the sentences in 1947, when relations with the USSR became very strained.) The individuals who had been convicted for the unsuccessful attempt to assassinate von Papen were also released from prison on 9 August 1944 (Oran, pp. 253-56).

The first formal action of the government in its attempt to improve relations with the USSR came on 22 May, when Menemencioğlu met with Ambassador Vinogradov. Menemencioğlu proposed that the two countries conclude an agreement that would provide for consultations on issues relating to the Balkans. The Soviet reply to the Turkish proposal came on 5 June: there could be no political cooperation unless Turkey's relations with Germany underwent a radical change. The USSR would make no agreement if Turkey did not sever its relations with Germany immediately and enter the war on the side of the Allies.

The contacts with the USSR were interrupted by the resignation of Menemencioğlu. But Cevat Açıkalın, secretary-general of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, met with Vinogradov on June 22, seeking to revive the broken contacts. Nothing came from this attempt at rapprochement, however, because of the Soviet insistence on Turkey's declaring war on Germany. On 30 June the British ambassador paid a visit to Saracoğlu and handed him a note, which stated that, with the opening of the second front, the time had come for Turkey to consider severing its commercial and diplomatic ties with Germany. Such a course would allow Turkey to "shed light on its policies that had become murky and mixed up as a result of recent developments" (Gürün 1983, p. 128). The note concluded: "Turkey can play a fitting role both during the war and in the peace that will follow." On 1 July the U.S. ambassador called on Saracoğlu to indicate that his government supported the British request.

It is interesting to note that neither of them made any reference to Turkey's alliance with Britain. Until then the Allies had kept reminding Turkey of its alliance obligations when pressing it to enter the war. Now that the war was drawing to an end and preparations were actively underway for postwar arrangements, the reference to alliance obligations had suddenly been dropped from their notes. Turkey saw this omission as ominous. When Saracoğlu sought clarification from British ambassador Knatchbull-Hugessen, he replied that London was trying to determine whether the 1939 Tripartite Alliance was still alive. This reply did nothing to put the Turkish government at ease in its concern over the possibility that after the war it would find itself alone to confront a muchstrengthened Soviet Union.

Saracoğlu summoned the two ambassadors on 3 July. He explained to them that Turkey would encounter problems and difficulties if it severed relations with Germany and let them understand that he was expecting them to assist Turkey on this matter. He also told them that the severance of relations with Germany would strengthen and reaffirm the ties of alliance established in 1939 with Britain. This should lead to Turkey's being treated as an equal partner and allowed to take part in the settlement of all international questions when peace was being made. The Lend and Lease Programs for Turkey should also be resumed. Military equipment, and especially aircraft, should be provided to repulse a sudden attack. If Turkey was attacked as a result of this decision, Britain should guarantee to provide the aid needed for Turkey to defend itself. Turkey was also seeking alternative suppliers and outlets for the imports and exports that would come to an end as a consequence of the severance of trade links with Germany. Turkey also wanted the additional financial burden imposed by the war to be shared. Saracoğlu concluded that, if these requests could be met, Turkey would be prepared to honor its alliance obligations and carry out Britain's request.

While these contacts were going on between Turkey, Britain, and the U.S., the USSR complained about Turkey's foot-dragging. Moscow asserted that it was no longer enough for Turkey to break its diplomatic relations with Germany and charged Britain with not carrying out the decisions reached in Moscow and Tehran to bring Turkey into the war. Moscow also complained about London's new offers to Ankara. Stalin wrote to Churchill on 15 July, accusing the Turkish government of pursuing "evasive and ambivalent policies toward Germany" and concluding that it would be best to let Turkey go its own way. The letter ended with the phrase "naturally, this will nullify any Turkish claims to have a say in the settlement of postwar questions" (Churchill, vol. 6, p. 71). Nevertheless, Britain accepted Turkey's offer on July 23. The government then obtained parliamentary approval and informed the Allies that relations with Germany would be severed, effective 2 August 1944. In the communication made to London, the government also took issue with the British description of Turkey's policies as "murky" and "mixed up" and expressed the desire to see more appropriate terminology used in the future.

In a reply dated 27 July, Britain expressed its gratification in regard to Turkey's decision and declared that it viewed this action as confirmation of the Turkish-British alliance. Consequently, Britain would consider Turkey to be its ally once again.

Meanwhile the USSR replied to the Turkish proposal to confirm the friendship between the two countries. In a chilly tone, the Soviet message drew attention to the fact that Ankara had resisted the calls made since November 1943 for Turkey to enter the war in order to shorten the conflict. At this date, the Turkish proposal to exchange letters to confirm the friendship between the two countries would be useless, because it would not have the effect of shortening the conflict.

Furthermore, when the USSR found out that Turkey's decision to sever relations was made not in order to please the Soviets but at the request of Britain and the U.S., its resentment grew. From then or, the USSR lost all interest in getting Turkey into the war. In a note delivered to the U.S. by the Soviet ambassador in Washington on 22 June, the Soviet view was explained in the following terms: the question of Turkey's entering the war had been delayed for too long by protracted negotiations and half-hearted measures. In the present circumstances, the matter had ceased to carry any importance. Turkey should be pressed no further and left to its own devices.

As Turkey moved toward declaring war, the USSR was eager to appear uninterested in Ankara's actions. Moscow was keen to avoid any commitment to reward Turkey for its decision. It was also seeking to use the British demarches made without obtaining prior Russian approval as a pretext for evading its own commitments made at the Tehran and Moscow conferences to act in concert with Britain and the U.S. when dealing with Turkey. All of this can be taken as laying the groundwork for the Soviet demands that would be made on Turkey at the end of the war.

Turkey had indicated that breaking relations with Germany on 2 August would be a step toward an eventual declaration of war. But no request came from the Allies for such a step to be taken. In fact the British ambassador told Saracoğlu that "it was now too late for Turkey's belligerency to make any difference." It could be said that Britain and the U.S. had also lost interest in Turkey's becoming involved in the war.

Ankara would have welcomed this loss of interest earlier in the war. In the circumstances of 1944, however, it was a cause for much alarm. Ankara could see the hardening of the Soviet position as the end of the war approached and was uncomfortable with the notion that Britain and the U.S. no longer needed Turkey. Against this background, the entry of Soviet forces into Romania and Bulgaria in the summer of 1944 created anxiety, while the British landing in Greece in the autumn of that year brought relief. This was perceived as restoring some sort of balance in the Balkans. With these considerations in mind, Turkey wanted to establish close cooperation with Greece in the postwar period. Accordingly, Ankara informed Greece in November 1944 that it had absolutely no claims over the Dodecanese Islands (Armaoğlu, p. 174).

At this stage, Turkey regarded the October 1939 alliance as its only source of assurance in the face of its growing anxiety over the USSR's hostile behavior. Churchill's visit to Moscow on 9 October 1944 and the reports filtering out increased this anxiety even further. By now Churchill felt that Turkey's decision in respect to the war would not have any discernible effect on either the course or the length of the war. He was therefore in a more receptive mood for possible demands by Stalin regarding changes in the Montreux Convention in the framework of postwar arrangements (OTDP, p. 192). As a matter of fact, at the meeting with Stalin at which they agreed on the percentages of their respective zones of influence after the war, Churchill accepted in principle the Soviet demand to have the Montreux Convention amended. He requested that the detailed Soviet proposals be submitted to the Allies for their consideration. This was what triggered the Straits crisis at the end of the war.

Turkey's hitherto successful policy of staying out of the war was now turning into a liability as the war drew to an end. As Churchill was dividing up the Balkans with Stalin, he indicated his special interest in Greece but said nothing about Turkey (Churchill, vol. 6, pp. 198–99, 204, and 211). In these circumstances Turkey's postwar foreign-policy concerns would be largely determined by Soviet demands for amendments to the Montreux Convention and the reaction of Britain and the U.S. to these demands. As agreed between Churchill and Stalin, this issue would be on the agenda of both the Yalta and Potsdam conferences.

Even before the war ended, however, there were signs of discord among the Allies. As indicated above, having failed in its attempt to get Turkey in the war, the USSR was now pursuing a policy of leaving Turkey isolated so that it could negotiate changes in the Montreux Convention with the Allies rather than directly with Turkey. At this point the U.S. and Britain wanted Turkey to sever diplomatic relations with Japan. The U.S. signed a Lend and Lease Agreement with Turkey. These were signs of a divergence in the policies of the U.S. and Britain on the one hand and the USSR on the other.

The Yalta Conference

By early 1945 it was clear that the Axis powers were approaching their final defeat. It was now becoming necessary to determine the shape of Europe after the war. On 4–11 February 1945 Roosevelt, Stalin, and Churchill came together at Yalta in the Crimea (USSR) to take up these questions and also discuss the issues of direct interest to Turkey.

Turkey was on the agenda on 10 February when Stalin raised the issue of the Straits and the status of the Montreux Convention. Stalin believed that the convention dated from a time when the Western states were not all that well disposed toward the USSR. The convention was a product of the defunct LoN system and did not correspond to the new era. It was time to change it. Stalin objected to Turkey's right to close the Straits not only in time of war but also when there was a threat of imminent danger of war. Stalin wanted a regime of free passage through the Straits. He wanted a new arrangement for the Straits that would safeguard Turkey's legitimate interests, but clearly it was out of the question to allow Turkey "to establish a stranglehold" (Gürün 1983, p. 137) over the Soviet Union. Roosevelt and Churchill were favorably disposed toward the Soviet position. It was decided that the Soviet proposals regarding the Straits would be submitted to the forthcoming meeting of the foreign ministers of the three countries.

Another important decision reached at Yalta dealt with the issue of the San Francisco Conference of the United Nations, which was due to be convened at the end of April. It was decided that only those countries that were in a state of war with Germany and Japan on 1 March 1945 would be invited to attend the conference as founding members of the new organization. Turkey had already broken all commercial and diplomatic relations with Japan before the Yalta Conference on January 6. Now it declared war on both Germany and Japan, effective February 23. This was done to secure an invitation for Turkey to attend the UN conference as a founding member.

The Molotov-Sarper Meeting and the Soviet Note of 19 March 1945

Turkey's actions did not satisfy the USSR. Seven weeks before the end of the war in Europe, on 19 March 1945, Molotov summoned Turkish ambassador Selim Sarper to his office and handed him a note. Turkey was being informed that the Treaty of Friendship and Neutrality (Nonaggression) of 17 December 1925, which had been the basis of Turkish-Soviet relations for twenty years, would not be extended: radical changes had taken place during World War II; therefore the treaty was being denounced in accordance with the terms of the protocol dated 7 November 1935. What Turkey had been dreading throughout the war years had now come to pass.

Germany surrendered on 7 May and Japan on 14 August. World War II had come to an end, and Turkey had succeeded in avoiding the ravages of this terrible conflict without having fired a single shot. Now it had to strive to survive in a transformed environment where the balance of power in Eastern Europe had shifted dangerously in favor of the USSR after Germany's defeat. True, Turkey had been spared from the presence of Soviet troops on its territory either as occupiers or as liberators. But Turkey was now confronted with a different kind of Soviet threat.

On 4 April Turkey replied to the Soviet note of 19 March and inquired about the Soviet proposals. Turkey also proposed the conclusion of a new pact. No reply came from Moscow until June. Molotov invited Sarper to the ministry on 7 June and informed him that to renew the treaty between the two countries it would be necessary to settle certain outstanding questions: (1) the revision of Turkey's frontier with the USSR (the ceding of the region of Kars and Ardahan); (2) the granting of bases to the USSR in the Straits to ensure the joint defense of the waterway; and (3) the revision of the Montreux Convention (Box 3-6). All of these points had been put forward by the USSR in 1940 in the course of its negotiations with Germany. This was the price demanded by Moscow for joining the Axis. It was clear that the Soviet demands in connection with Turkey had remained unchanged throughout the war.

During the war years Ankara had been receiving signals regarding Soviet demands. With the denunciation of the 1925 treaty, the Turkish government was thoroughly alarmed and placed in a difficult situation (examined in detail in "Relations with the USSR" in Section 4). Until

Box 3-6. The Molotov-Sarper Meeting of 7 June 1945

Selim Sarper had a two-hour meeting with Molotov on 7 June 1945. His report to Ankara contains the following exchange:

Molotov: Before we conclude a new alliance agreement, we must resolve all of the outstanding questions between our countries. I will now enumerate these questions. The 1921 treaty, which brought about some territorial changes, was concluded at a time when the Soviet state was in a weak condition. Our first task must be to correct this.

Sarper: Are you referring to changes to be made in Turkey's eastern frontiers?

Molotov: Yes, I am referring to righting past wrongs.

Sarper: The 1921 treaty was not imposed on the Soviets by force. In regard to the search for past wrongs that need correction, this can be done by scrutinizing the bilateral relations of the two countries over the centuries, but such a search can yield no positive results. In any case, I do not consider the outcome of the 1921 treaty to be a historic wrong but rather the correction of a past injustice. It was Lenin himself who detected a wrong and decided to correct it. Molotov: An unfair treaty signed between the Soviets and Poland in 1921 has been rectified by Poland. As a result of this, It has become possible to establish a long-term friendship between Poland and the Soviet Union.

Sarper: ... First of all, no Turkish government could explain such a course to the public. Furthermore, I could not convey such a message to my government. Finally, I personally cannot justify what you are saying to myself... There is no way that your request can be met... I am therefore asking you to set this matter aside. Molotov: Let us now pass to another subject... In the course of this war we have suffered grievous losses. Even during our darkest hours, we had to worry about our security in the Black Sea. We may have been mistaken in our concerns, and in the final analysis Turkey's policies and actions did not create any difficulties for us. However, the fate of 200 million people is ultimately dependent on Turkey's goodwill... We have no doubts about Turkey's goodwill. But we must be sure that the Straits are properly defended. Sarper: If Turkey's defense inadequacies lead you to the conclusion that bases must be granted in the Straits to the USSR, ... let me say right away that this is out of the question.

Molotov: You appear not to want to provide bases in time of peace, Could you consider doing so in time of war?

Sarper: I implied nothing of the sort...

Molotov: It will be useful to conduct the negotiations for the revision of the Montreux Convention parallel to the negotiations for a treaty of alliance.

Sarper: ... I do not consider it of any use to discuss this ... When we exercise our sovereign rights, contractual obligations apart, we do not seek anyone's permission ...

(M. AYDIN) (Source: T.C. Dişişleri Bakanlığı 1973, pp. 261–63, Bilge, pp. 269–71)

then Turkey had been successful in preventing either German or Soviet soldiers from setting foot in Turkey under any pretext. But in the immediate postwar period Turkey's relations with Britain and the U.S. were still not established on a firm basis. Nor was there a full accord among the Allies about the postwar arrangements. In these circumstances İnönü and the government were concerned that Turkey was on its own in confronting the USSR.

When initial Soviet demands were firmly rejected by Turkish leaders, Turkey came under intense pressure from the Soviet Union from the middle of 1945 onward. As Molotov communicated the Soviet demands once again to Sarper on 18 June, any hope of replacing the 1925 treaty between Turkey and the USSR with another compact came to an end.

As will be seen in Section 4 (in "Relations with the USA and NATO"), in the period from 1945 to 1960 Turkey sought to draw the U.S. closer to counter the USSR. In the period leading up to the Potsdam Conference, Ankara also sought to align the U.S. position in regard to the Straits with Turkey's own position. Although various problems were cropping up between Britain/the U.S. and the Soviets, however, the former still entertained hopes of maintaining harmonious relations with the USSR in the postwar years. They were therefore reluctant to confront Moscow openly on the issue of the Straits. Unlike other European states, Turkey's wartime policies would place it in a precarious position on the issue of zones of influence in the postwar era.

Turkey at the End of the War

The big three Allied leaders met in Potsdam from 17 July to 2 August 1945 to consider developments in Europe and the pursuit of the war in the Pacific theater. At the meeting Stalin tried to get the Allies to agree that the issue of the Straits was a private matter between the USSR and Turkey and made his demands on the Turkish Straits known to other Allied leaders. He also asked for a base in Alexandroupolis (Dedeağaç) on Greece's Aegean coast. This revealed very clearly the Soviet ambition to gain control of the Straits.

When the conference came to an end, the Allies had agreed in principle to revise the Montreux Straits Convention. They would submit their views to the Turkish government. On 8 August 1946 the USSR submitted its tentative proposals regarding the Straits to the Turkish government without prior consultation with its allies. After this, different interpretations of the agreement reached at Potsdam between the U.S./Britain and the USSR emerged, which brought the U.S.-British positions closer to Turkey's. In February 1946 Britain informed Turkey that it considered the Tripartite Alliance of 1939 still binding and, as a consequence, would come to Turkey's aid in the event of an attack. Subsequently, on 5 April 1946, the U.S. battleship Missouri anchored in the harbor of Istanbul, bringing the body of the former Turkish ambassador in Washington, Münir Ertegün, who had died at his post before the end of the war. This was an unusual gesture, going well beyond the customary courtesies shown to a deceased envoy. These events signified that Turkey's wartime isolation was coming to an end. When the Soviet note of 8 August and another note dated 22 August renewing Soviet claims reached Ankara, the USSR's demands were rejected, this time with full British and American backing. The Soviet demands were formally submitted one last time on 24 September, without, however, being pursued further.

During the war years Turkey's policy had been to steer away from adventurism, not to become overly bound to any one side, and thus to keep out of the war for as long as possible. The leaders in Ankara were aware that Turkey's capacity and means were not sufficient to ensure the country's integrity. That is why they tried to keep the belligerents at arm's length by maintaining cooperation with both sides as necessary. The leaders were convinced that the Western Allies were in a position to ensure Turkey's long-term security, so they pursued policies that would bring about closer relations with these countries without, however, compromising Turkey's sovereignty. These policies were implemented in the war years without confronting the USSR. Early in the war the Italian threat appeared to be paramount, but maintaining friendly relations with Germany made it possible to neutralize this threat. The intensive economic relations with Germany were balanced by developing the economic relations with Britain. But the anxiety felt about the intentions of the bigger northern neighbor weighed upon the Turkish leaders all through the war.

This explains why the main objective of Turkish foreign policy during the war was to secure Allied guarantees that would ensure Turkey's safety without appearing to be anti-USSR. Turkey pursued a pro-Allied policy on the basis of its alliance with Britain and France while seeking to follow a balanced policy toward Germany. Apart from the period from November 1940 to June 1941, Ankara never felt particularly threatened by Germany. The main source of apprehension after June 1941 was not the possibility of German occupation but rather the possibility of being liberated from occupation by the USSR. In fact the threat that awaited Turkey after the war was precisely the threat that Turkey had been able to avert during the war, which was to be confronted, all alone, with a northern neighbor whose appetite had become voracious as a result of the new international environment. This threat was to be the defining feature of Turkey's domestic and international policies after World War II. Ankara would now try to counter the perceived Soviet threat by courting U.S. support. This course would not be questioned until 1960.

Appraisal of the Period

I. THE INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENT AND DYNAMICS

Significant changes occurred in Europe as well as in the international system in the years following World War II.

The Western world had become divided between the democracies and the Fascists following World War I. Then came the U.S. and USSR to compete with Europe. At the end of World War II, Europe had lost its dominating position. The world was no longer Eurocentric, and Europe was now just another region of the globe.

A. A Bipolar System

The international system had been completely transformed politically, militarily, and economically.

- 1. Politically: the most universal of international organizations, the United Nations (UN), was established in 1945. But its universality was reflected only in the General Assembly. The Security Council was under the control of the veto-wielding big five and reflected the power balance of the period. The U.S. predominated in the General Assembly, which upset the balance of the UN in America's favor.
- 2. Militarily: the defeat of the Nazis and Fascists in Europe was not the work of Western Europe but of the U.S. and the USSR. As a result, other countries tended to cluster around these two powers. The "bipolar system" that emerged from this clustering was the main feature of world politics for twenty years. This was the period of the Cold War, which started after 1946 and reached its peak in the mid-1950s (see Box 4-4 below).
- 3. Economically: both because of its geographic extent and because the capitalist system was the only workable system on a global scale, one side had a clear superiority over the other in this bipolar system. Even before the war ended, the U.S. had scored a coup by convening a conference at Bretton Woods in New Hampshire. The conference was to adopt the system proposed by the U.S. to regulate and manage the world economy.

The Bretton Woods institutions—the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank (WB)—have the function of overseeing the management of the global economy under the control of the major capitalist countries (Boxes 4-1 and 4-2). The purpose of the IMF is to oversee the timely repayment of loans, while the purpose of the WB is to ensure "structural adjustments" that will allow the members to build an economic system that is in tune with the international capitalist economy. The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), which came into effect in 1947 but was only institutionalized much later, was designed to secure the liberalization of international trade.

The Bretton Woods system made the U.S. the uncontested leader of the global economy until 1971. It recovered this position of leadership in the 1980s. The U.S. then led in the institutionalization of GATT in 1995, when the World Trade Organization (WTO) was established. It was in the WTO that the U.S. sought to set up the Multilateral Agreement on Investments, the "basic charter of globalization" (see Box 7-4 in Section 7).

B. The Eastern Bloc

Russia had been overrun by France in 1812 and by Germany twice within a period of thirty years. These invasions had come from Eastern Europe. Furthermore, Russia had experienced the intervention of the West in its civil war after 1917 and had also witnessed how the second front had been delayed in World War II, presumably to wear down the Soviet Union. In the light of this experience, it is no wonder that Russia wanted a buffer zone between itself and Western Europe to ensure its security. This buffer zone was to be Eastern Europe.

Contrary to what has been written, the Communist regimes established after the war in Eastern Europe were not the work of the USSR. These regimes were set up by local Communists. When the aristocracy and the bourgeoisie of these countries fled in the war or collaborated

Box 4-1. The International Monetary Fund

The International Monetary Fund (IMF) is one of the specialized agencies of the UN. Its main function is to prevent international trade from being affected by balance of payments difficulties. It also seeks to check inflation in the international field. The IMF carries out its function by allowing countries experiencing balance of payments problems to borrow from it to cover their deficits.

The IMF came into being in 1946. Its resources consist of the quotas contributed by member states as well as its borrowings. Members' quotas reflect their share of international trade and are revised every five years. The size of a member's quota determines the number of its votes as well as the amount it can borrow from the IMF. Members sign an agreement with the IMF when their borrowings exceed half of their quotas. When a member experiences temporary balance of payments difficulties, it signs a standby agreement and submits a letter of intent that lays out the economic policy recommended by the IMF. This allows the IMF to monitor its economic policies and performance.

As a rule, these loans are short-term (three to five years) and the rate of interest is below the market rate. In other words, these loans are not designed to support the development efforts of developing countries, because they cannot remedy structural problems. Consequently, it is not right to criticize the IMF for not doing what it is not intended to do:

But developing countries must borrow from developed countries or international markets to improve their economies. But since the 1974 oil crisis, international banks have been reluctant to provide loans to countries that do not have the IMF's "green light." Without a sound balance of payments, repayment of loans becomes difficult; countries must adhere to the discipline imposed by the IMF. As a result, the IMF has gradually turned into an insurance system for the repayment of loans to developed countries that can no longer place a lien on a debtor's revenues the way this was done in the nineteenth century (the Ottoman Public Debt was a striking example). Through this practice the IMF has assumed a new role that was not assigned to it at its inception.

To remedy any imbalance, the IMF usually recommends devaluation as part of its "magic recipe." This ensures that exports grow and internal demand is contained. To curb inflation, public expenditures have to be reined in and wages frozen. The main concern of the IMF is to ensure repayment of loans and to prevent a member's difficulties from spilling over into international markets. Any internal imbalance resulting from IMF-imposed measures, such as growing disparity in incomes, is the member's internal problem.

At present the main function of the IMF is to ensure the free flow of trade by securing the observance of the necessary financial conditions and, in addition, to create the conditions that will allow borrower countries to service their debts.

> (B. ORAN) (Source: Gürsel, vol. 2, pp. 486–94)

with the Nazis, it was the Communists who led the struggle against the occupiers. When the Nazis were evicted, the Communists were able to get elected, joined the governments of their countries, and, from that position, eliminated the other parties. It was only after 1948 that the USSR turned the Eastern European countries into satellites. Stalin feared that the local Communists might remove their countries from Russia's orbit the way Josip Broz Tito had done, so he replaced them with officials who were totally subservient to Moscow (Sander 1993, pp. 208–11). The Cominform (Communist Information Bureau) was set up in 1947 to ensure the ideological alignment of these countries with Moscow. With the establishment of COMECON (the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance) in 1949, the system was completed. The Eastern Bloc had been consolidated, and the USSR's security belt was now in place.

While the USSR completed its security arrangements, the nations of the Western world, and especially the USSR's neighbors, naturally started worrying about their own security. Where the Soviet security concerns ended and where Soviet expansionism began became a very contentious issue.

In the meantime (as we shall see below) the U.S. had started taking economic initiatives even before the end of the war. With the military pacts established after the war,

Box 4-2. The World Bank (International Bank for Reconstruction and Development)

The World Bank (WB) is one of the specialized agencies of the UN. In a sense it is the twin of the IMF. While the IMF provides short-term loans to correct temporary imbalances in a country's current account, the WB provides long-term loans for investments. Loans are extended to a member state or to a state-guaranteed corporation. The purpose of WB loans is to support the recipient country's structural adjustment to the global economy. From the point of view of the Third World, the IMF plays the role of the "bad cop," while the WB is perceived as the "good cop."

The WB came into being at the end of 1945. Its membership is open to IMF members only. Membership in the WB is required to join the other bodies in the WB group: the international Development Association and the International Finance Corporation. All of these bodies are intertwined.

The voting rights of member states in the WB are based on their shares in the bank's subscribed capital, which in turn is based on their quota in the IMF. As a consequence, the policy of the WB, as well as of the IMF, is determined in large measure by the U.S., Britain, Germany, Japan, and France. With a share in the bank's capital of 20.61%, the U.S. has provided all of the presidents of the bank since it came into operation.

(B. ORAN) (Source: Gürsel, vol. 2, pp. 472–73) it assumed the leadership of the western half of Europe. The Western Bloc or capitalist bloc was able to extend its influence over a major portion of the world, militarily through NATO and economically through its economic aid programs launched after 1947.

As would be expected, each outpost that the U.S. and its allies established exacerbated the chronic feeling of insecurity of the USSR. In this atmosphere, the Cold War became self-sustaining, with each action leading to a reaction, which in turn led to a further reaction. Also, it became harder to discern whether the U.S. presence in Europe and the world was serving the purpose of "containing communism" or protecting U.S. interests.

The rigid bipolar system, with its sharp cleavages, was somewhat attenuated by the changes that occurred in the USSR after Stalin's death. Molotov's call for a thaw in 1954 and the advent of the principle of peaceful coexistence between the two blocs brought about important changes in the international climate. This trend was reinforced by the emergence of the nonaligned movement, which rejected any allegiance to either bloc. These changes created new opportunities for the countries within the blocs as well as for the smaller, nonaligned countries.

Nevertheless, especially during the early stages of the Cold War, the "Aron paradigm" or model (referred to in the Introduction) became operative. It was no longer possible for medium powers considered by the bloc's leader to be important from a geostrategic point of view to pursue an independent foreign policy. Such a course was unfeasible and unrealistic.

c. The Western Bloc

1. The USA

Objective

The main U.S. objective after the war was to make sure that the USSR did not overrun Western Europe the way it had overrun Eastern Europe. Western Europe was in a shattered condition after the war and would need some time to recover. As the defense industries shut down and unemployment increased, it was essential for the American economy to capture this potentially rich market as quickly as possible. The Soviet threat to Greece and Turkey gave urgency to the American effort and facilitated Washington's task.

Methods

After the Monroe Doctrine was proclaimed in 1823, the U.S. remained aloof from European entanglements. Having now decided to get fully involved in European affairs, it employed three methods to reach its objectives.

1. Psychological preparation: the American public was used to being focused exclusively on the Western Hemisphere. It took a shocking event like the raid on Pearl Harbor to get the U.S. into World War II. Now it was necessary to persuade Americans to get involved in European affairs, from which the U.S. had traditionally stayed aloof. For this, it was necessary first to prepare the public psychologically and second to do this on a global scale.

At this point two individuals became prominent. The chairman of the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, Arthur Vandenberg, although a Republican, supported Democratic president Harry Truman and declared that the first task in the Cold War was "to scare the hell out of American people" to galvanize their fighting spirit. The fear of the Soviet Union and of communism had to be turned into a mass psychosis engulfing the U.S. and indeed the whole world. The other individual who gained prominence was U.S. senator Joseph McCarthy, who caused public alarm by claiming that there were 205 Communists in the State Department. At a time when the spread of communism in Eastern Europe and China was sowing fear, the senator launched investigations that caused many officials to lose their jobs, while others found themselves disgraced and cast out of society. McCarthyism became a byword for the persecution of individuals by labeling them as Communist and for forcing Americans to become compliant citizens. McCarthy would pursue his campaign for five years, until he was finally stopped when he accused Republican president Dwight D. Eisenhower of being soft on communism. McCarthy ruthlessly questioned his civilian and military victims in hearings that were broadcast on television for thirty-six consecutive days. McCarthyism was to spread to other countries, including Turkey, where members of the intelligentsia were to lose their jobs and university posts.

2. Military measures: the first U.S. action occurred in connection with an urgent issue. On 12 March 1947 President Truman enunciated the Truman Doctrine, under which Greece would receive $300 million in military aid and Turkey $100 million. The objective was to counter the Soviet threat to these two countries and bring them under U.S. influence. In this way, the U.S. would also be freed from the burden of having to ship U.S. military equipment in Europe back to America.

This was followed by more comprehensive military measures. Under the policy of "containment," the Eastern Bloc countries were encircled by military pacts under U.S. leadership. The most important was NATO, established in 1949. This was to be followed by the policy of "roll back," which meant the liberation of Eastern Europe by driving socialism back to the Soviet frontier. The driving spirit behind this policy of using force was U.S. secretary of state

John Foster Dulles, who became famous for his so-called pact-mania. During his tenure, new geographical concepts would be elaborated to respond to American military needs: the "Inner Crescent" and "Northern Tier." The U.S. Air Force's Strategic Air Command (SAC) was established during Dulles's term in office (see Box 4-8 below).

Economic measures: in the year when NATO was established, the U.S. Congress enacted the Export Regulation Law. This law set up a comprehensive trade embargo against the socialist bloc. All of the NATO members and Japan eventually joined in the embargo. Under this system, U.S. exports to Eastern Europe, which amounted to $400 million in 1948, plummeted to $2 million in 1953. In the same period, U.S. imports from Eastern Europe dwindled from $236 million to $46 million. By 1952 to 1954 fully half of the products in international trade were on the proscribed list (Walter Krause and F. John Mathis, "The U.S. Policy Shift of East-West Trade," Journal of International Affairs 28, no. 1 [1974]: 26, quoted in Gerger, p. 31; G. Adler-Karlsson, Western Economic Warfare, 1947–1967 [Stockholm: Almquist and Wiksell, 1968], pp. 146–47). This led to a major shift to intrabloc trade, and the split in the blocs acquired an economic dimension.

But the main U.S. measure was the Marshall Plan, which came into effect in April 1948. This project was the economic counterpart of the Truman Doctrine and NATO.

The main feature of the Marshall Plan was that it provided loans on very favorable terms: a low rate of interest (2.5%), a fifteen-year grace period, and repayments extending over forty-four years (Gürsel, vol. 2, p. 474). Although the terms were attractive, the mechanism for disbursing the loans favored U.S. producers and suppliers. The recipient country indicated its requirements to the American aid mission, which transmitted the requests to the Economic Cooperation Administration (ECA) in Washington. The required product was procured in the U.S. and shipped, as a general rule, on U.S.-flag vessels. The manner in which the aid would be utilized was determined in consultation with the U.S. In this way the U.S. was able to influence the economic policies of the recipient states. The local currency counterpart of the loan was deposited in a special U.S. account in the central bank of the recipient state. These counterpart funds were spent with U.S. approval, which gave Washington a second lever to influence the policies of the recipients (Avcıoğlu, p. 272).

The Marshall Plan had three objectives. The first was to secure the restoration of the economies of Western Europe and allow them to resume their place in the international trading system. The second was to control the economies of the recipient countries (the USSR and its Eastern European partners refused to take part in the project). The third was to stimulate the U.S. economy by securing new markets for its products. All of these objectives were successfully achieved.

To sum up, by employing these methods the U.S. was able to establish a new world order, known as the Pax Americana. In the political and military spheres, it was launched by the Truman Doctrine, followed by NATO. In the economic sphere, it began with the Marshall Plan, followed by dollar loans. Countries not yet fully in the capitalist stage of development were given structural-adjustment recommendations. All of this turned the U.S. into a global hegemon (see Box Intro-3 in the Introduction).

2. Western Europe

Western Europe was heir to a deeply rooted civilization and a long industrial tradition. It also had a large reservoir of skilled labor. Thanks to the Marshall Plan, it was able to recover in a relatively short time, to become a valuable economic partner of the U.S.

Two other factors explain Western Europe's rapid recovery (Kuruç, pp. 27–28). The first factor was that the nineteenth-century order had changed fundamentally, and Western Europe was aware of this change. The Western European nation-state of the second half of the twentieth century was to be established on the basis of new institutions, above all, the welfare state. Western Europe understood that without this the nation-state could not gain legitimacy and continue. This applied to both the winners and the losers of the war.

The second factor was that Europe perceived that the nation-state could survive only if it became involved in cooperation on a continental scale. European integration was a concept designed to secure the continuation of the nation-state within a wider union.

At the end of World War II, Turkey was faced with this international environment and the U.S. and European models.

II. THE DOMESTIC ENVIRONMENT AND DYNAMICS

Even though Turkey's economic, political, social, and psychological condition after the war presented an integrated picture, we shall examine these under two headings: economic and political.

A. The Economy

When we examine Uluğbay's table (Table 4-2; see Box 2-1 in Section 2), the following features stand out.

- 1. The foreign trade balance, which was in surplus every year during the 1930s (1938 being the exception), registered a deficit of $21.3 million for the first time in 1947. This deficit increased progressively until 1960, when it reached $147.5 million.
- 2. The ratio of foreign trade to GNP increased rapidly until 1952 and remained high until 1954. From then on it started to fall (this aspect is examined in detail below).
- 3. Turkey's foreign indebtedness until 1957 as reflected in the table understates the actual amount, because the accounting was never conducted properly. When Turkey applied to the IMF in 1958 for a rescheduling of its foreign debts, the IMF compiled Turkey's foreign debts and came up with the true picture for the first time. As shown in the table, the cumulative debt (starting from the beginning of the period) exceeded $1 billion. This represented more than a 7.5-fold increase in the total debt since 1945. That made it very difficult for Turkey to obtain new loans.

Unrestricted Exposure to the Outside World (1946–1953)

At the end of the war, the economy was abruptly opened wide to the outside, which led Turkey into difficulties. This was the result of the Marshall Plan, which Turkey joined with great enthusiasm. (Turkey originally was not due to receive any loans under the plan, but Ankara fought successfully to reverse this decision.) The main goal of the Marshall Plan was to integrate Western Europe into the global trading system while allowing Turkey to become the supplier of foodstuffs and raw materials to Western Europe.

Starting in 1946, various American reports on Turkey appeared. One of these was written by M. W. Thornburg and entitled "Turkey—An Economic Appraisal." He recommended the dismantling of statism, the sale of the Karabük Iron and Steelworks, the manufacture of metal ploughshares and hand tools rather than locomotives, and the abandonment of plans to set up chemical fertilizer factories. Thornburg also recommended the adoption of legislation encouraging foreign investments and granting such investments equal treatment with local businesses. He underlined that this was not a return to the capitulations, because foreign businesses were not seeking special privileges but only equal treatment. Thornburg favored a wider distribution of American books and magazines in Turkey. He was seen as a great friend of Turkey by the local press and notably by the newspaper Vatan. Another one of these reports was written by James M. Barker, who had led a World Bank team to Turkey. Barker was more moderate in tone than Thornburg. He recommended that industry be given a lower priority and that comprehensive planning be abandoned. His emphasis was on agriculture and the production of raw materials. Barker also favored lowering the rate of growth to keep inflation under control (Aycioğlu, pp. 270–72).

Many years later, Süleyman Demirel, who could hardly be described as anti-American, was to make the following statement: "The West was never comfortable with Turkey's industrialization. This was the approach of the Barker report as well as others, where the emphasis was always on agriculture and light industry. But Turkey disregarded these recommendations in the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s and pressed forward with its industrialization. True, we are still in the early phases of this process, but if we had heeded their reports, Turkey would have no proper industry today" (Yetkin, p. 113). Mithat Perin, a deputy of the Democratic Party (DP), recalled that F.R. Zorlu walked out of a meeting he was attending in Germany when the Germans refused to consider the construction of refineries and iron and steelworks in Turkey (Yetkin, p. 51).

The implementation of the Marshall Plan, starting in 1948, progressed in this direction. Turkish analyses in the late 1960s usually defined the aim of the plan as transforming the country into "the greengrocer of Europe."

Thanks to Marshall Plan loans, vast sums were invested in agriculture. Prime Minister Menderes was always keen to gain the votes of peasants. New land was being brought under cultivation. The number of farm tractors grew from 1,000 in 1945 to 40,000 in 1955. The building of new railroads was halted while construction machinery was imported to undertake the building of roads and harbors. These would have a dual purpose: to allow the country to export its products and to supply the military bases that the U.S. was then constructing in Turkey. Industrialization no longer had priority.

The result of these policies was a big jump in agricultural production. New lands had been opened up to agriculture, while mechanization, increased use of fertilizers, and favorable weather conditions had all helped. The transportation, storage, and export of crops was now much easier than before, and the Korean War in 1950 led to increased demand for Turkey's products, especially cotton. The Democratic Party government had also utilized monetary reserves in the amount of $245 million accumulated by the previous CHP governments. Marshall Plan loans helped flood the market with imported goods. Money earned through the black market and profiteering during the war years was now being directed to investments. Per capita income soared by 28% from 1950 to 1953.

Table 4-2 also shows that exports grew rapidly after 1950 and increased by a factor of 1.7 between 1949 and 1953. In the 1954 election, the Democratic Party was able to increase its share of the votes, and as a result the proportion of its deputies in parliament grew from 86% to 93%. The traditional support that the DP and its political heirs (the Justice Party, the True Path Party, etc.) enjoyed in rural areas and among those with a rural background is based on the fact that peasants were able to earn a decent income for the first time during this period.

The Consequences of Unrestrained Extravagance

There was a serious deterioration in the economy after 1954. This was not just due to bad weather, the ending of the Korean War, and the restoration of agricultural production in Europe. The real reason was that the Turkish economy was being managed without any heed to planning or programming. Money was being printed and spent without control, causing inflation to climb. The increase in imports and agricultural subsidies was leading to deficits in the trade balance and the budget. The rate of inflation, at 0.8% in 1952, had climbed to 11% in 1954, 16.8% in 1956, and 18.7% in 1957. That is why the increase in the GNP in both dollars and Turkish liras (TL) was illusory. The increase in TL terms was due to inflation, while the increase in dollar terms was due to the fixed parity.

Actually, the reason for the rapid deterioration of the economy within a period of just three years can be traced back to earlier periods. The Recep Peker government had devalued the currency on 7 September 1946 to secure Turkey's membership in the IMF. The Turkish lira was devalued from 1.28 to the dollar to 2.80. Trade was liberalized, as demanded by the U.S. In 1947, the year following the devaluation, exports increased by $8.7 million while imports rose by $125.8 million. This was a period of plenty, and the excess production was used not for investments but for imports and subsequently to cover deficits. Since the Marshall Plan did not favor industrialization, Turkey's imports did not include capital goods that could have contributed to future production gains. To cite an example, the automobiles that would use the new roads under construction would require further imports, especially of fuel to run them.

The Economy's Dependency on Foreign Resources

The economy gradually started becoming overly dependent on foreign countries, who were counseling liberalization and emphasizing agriculture. As a matter of fact, the foreign trade to GNP ratio went from 9.77% in 1946 to 19.21% in 1952. Imports were growing faster than exports. While exports grew by $148 million, the corresponding figure for imports was $437 million.

After 1952 there was a rapid decline in the ratio of foreign trade to GNP. But this decline was not because the Turkish economy was becoming less dependent on foreign resources. On the contrary, agricultural production was falling at a time when foreign loans could no longer be obtained. This situation was strangling foreign trade. There was a continuous and sharp decline of both imports (from 1952 to 1959) and exports (from 1953 to 1958); afterward these two items started to recover but never reached the 1953 level during this period.

Another reason for the decline was the overvaluation of the Turkish currency. The official value of the lira was 108% higher than its real value (Sönmez 2001, p. 94). As explained earlier, the steadily increasing GNP was not rising all that much in real terms. The increased GNP seen in the statistics was due to inflation, while the increased dollar value of foreign trade was because the official price of the dollar was kept artificially low. In other words, in real terms the GNP was not increasing, while foreign trade was declining.

An Unsatisfactory Model for Borrowing: 1958

Turkey's poor economic condition led it to seek new foreign loans. In 1952 Turkey had drawn $355 million from the IMF and its foreign debt to GNP ratio was at the acceptable level of 7.42%. But in the period from 1950 to 1954 there was excessive printing of money, and the economy suffered from the debilitating effect of liberalization. The reserves accumulated over the years by CHP governments had been exhausted in less than two years. The shortage of inputs and drought had also reduced agricultural production. The economy was face to face with a crisis, and relations with the IMF came under severe strain. In 1954 the IMF recommended a devaluation to relieve inflationary pressures and eliminate the deficit in foreign accounts. In a year when he was facing an election, Menderes rejected the IMF's recommendation and maintained the previous course even after the election. By 1957 Turkey was insolvent. The saying started circulating that "Turkey could not even afford to import a single horseshoe nail" (Gürsel, vol. 2, pp. 495-96).

The government eventually submitted its first letter of intent to the IMF on 4 August 1958, accepting a substantial devaluation of the Turkish lira. In 1956 the government had refused to devalue the lira from 2.80 TL to the dollar to 6. Now it was devaluing the lira to the level of 9 TL to the dollar. At the same time, it negotiated the rescheduling of debts amounting to $600 million and received $250 million in new loans. Instead of implementing the new rate of exchange in all transactions, however, the government applied a tax of 6.20 TL to the old rate in a good number of transactions. This is why the exchange rate appears as 2.80 in Table 4-2 for 1958 and 1959 and the calculations are based on this rate. After the May 1960 military coup, the tax on foreign exchange was annulled and the exchange rate fixed at TL 9. The exchange rate in Table 4-2 for 1960 appears as TL 4.73 as an annual average for the purpose of converting GNP to dollars. In compliance with the letter of intent, the government brought the printing of money under control, raised the prices of the products of state economic enterprises, promised to balance the budget, and introduced tax increases.

These measures eventually came to be known as "IMF recipes." Actually, the agreement concluded by Menderes was almost identical to the proposals made by the British delegation that came to Turkey in 1854 when the Ottoman Empire was seeking a British loan. Lord V. H. Hobart and Mr. N. H. Foster called for an immediate cut in public spending and an end to the printing of banknotes. Over the medium term, there would have to be reductions in the number of civil servants and reform of the judiciary to combat corruption (Emine Kıray, "Turkish Debt and Conditionality in Historical Perspective: A Comparison of the 1980s and the 1860s," in The Political Economy of Turkey, ed. Torun Arıcanlı and Dani Rodrik [New York: St. Martin's Press, 1990], quoted in Attila Sönmez, "IMF ve Türkiye: Lütfen Sızlanmayı Bırakalım," Dünya, 3 April 2001).

When the Menderes government overcame the 1958 setback, it quickly forgot its commitments to the IMF and went back to its spendthrift ways. Turkey became the first country to exceed its IMF quota in borrowing and to seek a rescheduling of debts when payments became due. In 1958 the volume of its debt repayments in arrears equaled its total export earnings for that year (Anne O. Krueger, Foreign Trade Regimes and Economic Development: Turkey, vol. 1 New York: National Bureau of Economic Research, 1974], p. 30, quoted in Sönmez 2001, pp. 95-96). Meanwhile the industrialization policies based on import substitution that previously had been abandoned came into effect once again out of sheer necessity. When the supply of imported goods dried up, local production came to the rescue. But this industrialization was on a smaller scale than that which took place from 1923 to 1939. Furthermore, the financial incentives, inputs below real cost, and subsidies provided to industrialists contributed to the growing budget deficits.

The 1958 crisis established an undesirable precedent for the crises that would follow. First, the form of borrowing had changed fundamentally. As in the days of the Ottomans, borrowing was being resorted to in order to repay past loans and cover deficits. Second, starting in 1958, relations with the IMF were strained by irresponsible policies. Fiscal discipline was relaxed as soon as there was temporary relief. The government approached the IMF too late, when the economy was already in dire straits, which meant an agreement reached under the worst possible circumstances. The IMF corrective measures would be applied belatedly and even then half-heartedly. The tendency was always there to return to the bad old ways at the first sign of an improvement in the economy's performance (Sönmez 1999, pp. 59–60).

The poor performance of the economy had a very negative social impact on the masses. Agriculture was adversely affected after 1954, when tractors became inoperable owing to the shortage of imported spare parts. There was an accelerating exodus of peasants from the countryside to urban areas, reminiscent of the migrations that took place in Britain in the nineteenth century. In Britain the migrants took up jobs in industry, whereas in Turkey the development strategies of the Marshall Plan and of the Menderes government had not provided for industrialization. The result was the growth of squatter settlements in the periphery of cities and armies of unemployed people.

B. Politics

The characteristic feature of this period was that politics developed in a direction and manner that reflected the special circumstances of the time. There was a deep sense of isolation in Turkey after the war and an acute awareness of the Soviet threat, made worse by the harping on the subject by the Western media. Necmettin Sadak, later to become minister of foreign affairs, described the situation as "a war of nerves" (Ayın Tarihi 148 [March 1946]: 66, quoted in Oran, p. 60).

The prevailing mood was one of anxiety, even fear. Turkey had categorically rejected the Soviet notes on 22 August and 18 October 1946 and was now seeking the support of the West. In order to become a founding member of the UN, Turkey had declared war on Germany and Japan on 23 February 1945. After this, politics developed along two different tracks.

In the first track, a process of liberalization both in the economy and in politics became clearly discernible. The National Development Party was established on 7 September 1945, followed by the Democratic Party on 7 January 1946. The import of automobiles was permitted, starting on 15 February. On 11 May 1946 the title of "National Leader" attached to President İnönü's name was removed from the CHP's charter. On 5 June the ban on political parties based on class was lifted. On 12 June universities were granted autonomy. On 7 September a devaluation of the currency was carried out, to pave the way to membership in the IMF. On 11 March 1947 Turkey became a member of the IMF and the World Bank. The Truman Doctrine was proclaimed the next day, and the agreement concerning the aid to be received within the framework of this program was signed on 12 July. On the same day, President İnönü made his "12 July Declaration," in which he promised equal treatment to opposition parties. On 13 November it was decided at the CHP's congress to relax the strict implementation of statism and secularism.

In the second track, there was a progressive increase in McCarthyism as well as in "religious tolerance," which signified a deviation from strict secularism (laicism). On 4 December 1945 the premises of the left-wing newspaper Tan, as well as a number of publishing houses identified as leftist, were vandalized. On 15 December four academics in the Faculty of Languages, History, and Geography were suspended. On 11 December 1946 calls were made in the TGNA to rid the university of all leftists. On 16 December two leftist parties and two workers' associations were closed down. On 27 January 1947 the ban on the teaching of religion outside of schools was lifted. In the course of the debate in the TGNA on 29 January, minister of the interior Şükrü Sökmensüer labeled certain magazines published by professors as Communist, while minister of education R. S. Sirer was holding talks with those who were calling for the dismissal of these professors. Kenan Öner, the chairman of the İstanbul branch of the Democratic Party, accused Hasan Ali Yücel, the former minister of education who had founded the Village Institutes (rural schools where boys and girls in their late teens were trained as teachers and community readers) and initiated the mass publication of world classics, of being a Communist. Yücel sued Öner for slander on 17 April but received no backing from his party, the CHP, during the trial.

After this, the fear of being labeled Communist prevented liberal and progressive views from being expressed, as in the case of the McCarthy investigations in the U.S. On 18 April students in İzmir wrecked Mehmet Ali Aybar's Zincirli Hürriyet (Shackled Freedom) printing press (in 1962 Aybar would become the leader of the Turkish Labor Party). On 2 July permission was given to establish religion courses. The Ministry of Education was destroyed in a big fire on 23 December, and the perpetrators were alleged to have been Communists. On 27 December a number of students went to the lecture of Professor Pertev Naili Boratav, a well-known folklorist, with the intention of causing a riot and forced the rector, Şevket Aziz Kansu, to resign after threatening to throw him out of the window. On 11 January 1948 the University of Ankara fired P.N. Boratav, Behice Boran, Niyazi Berkes, Mediha Berkes, Adnan Cemgil, and Azra Erhat (all renowned humanists and social scientists of the time). On 11 June Muzaffer Şerif Başoğlu (one of the founders of social psychology, known in the U.S. as Muzafer Sherif) was also sacked, and all of the positions held by these academics were eliminated by the TGNA to prevent them from returning. On 2 April the author Sabahattin Ali was murdered on the frontier by intelligence forces, as would be learned later. On 4 June the Faculty of Divinity was established in Ankara. On 25 November elective religious courses were introduced in primary schools. On 15 January 1949 courses for preachers were established in ten provinces. On 28 March the executor of the Village Institutes project, İsmail Hakkı Tonguç, was shifted to a new job: giving drawing lessons in a high school. On 2 May the mass arrest of Communists began. On 14 May 1950 the Democratic Party came to power. On 16 June it was announced that the call to prayer, made in Turkish since 1932, would be made in Arabic again. The president and secretary-general of the Turkish Peace Association were arrested on 29 July for opposing Turkey's participation in the Korean War. Each was subsequently sentenced to forty-five months of imprisonment. On 25 August the head of the Religious Affairs Department declared that Islam rejected communism. The Turkish brigade left for Korea on 28 September. On 21 October courses of religion became compulsory in primary schools. On 14 December leftist students studying abroad saw their foreign exchange allocations canceled. On 26 October 1951 there was a further mass arrest of Communists. On 18 February 1952 Turkey joined NATO.

It was at this point, when America was perceived as a "savior," that the battleship Missouri cast anchor in Istanbul on 5 April 1946, bearing the body of ambassador Münir Ertegün, who had died sixteen months earlier at his post in Washington. This was a highly symbolic visit demonstrating that the U.S. was ready to back Turkey. President Inönü remarked that "the closer American ships come to Turkey, the better" (Cumhuriyetin 75 Yılı, p. 296).

In this atmosphere, the bureaucracy saw the Truman Doctrine in 1947 and the Marshall Plan in 1948 as underpinning the country's security, while the new bourgeoisie regarded the links to the U.S. as a safety net and a guarantee for obtaining loans. Except for the insignificant leftist opposition, all segments of society welcomed the American connection. In 1954 C.B. Randall, the president of the U.S. Foreign Economic Policy Commission, prepared the draft of the Law for the Promotion of Foreign Investments (LPFI) while Max Ball, a legal advisor of the international petroleum companies, prepared the draft of the Petroleum Law (PL). Both of these drafts were milestones in this period of economic and political change. The LPFI opened up agriculture and commerce to foreign investments. Article 10 provided that "foreign investments would enjoy all of the rights, immunities, and privileges enjoyed by local capital." The equality of treatment claimed by giant foreign firms meant in practice that they would be acquiring a privileged position in the market. The PL was a straightforward concession law. Under article 2, the state gave up its right to prospect for oil or to produce it. Only the private sector was allowed to be active in these fields, so the state's oil-producing agency, the Turkish Petroleum Company, had the status of a joint stock company. Under article 136, this law could only be amended with the approval of the foreign oil companies.

When the draft of the LPFI came to the TGNA, the opposition came out against some of its provisions. The word "privileges" in article 10 was changed to "facilities," and article 136 of the PL was removed at the insistence of the opposition. The debates in the TGNA gave an indication of the philosophy and inclination of the Democratic Party (Avc10ğlu, pp. 324–26).

III. THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE PERIOD

After the war, the U.S. became Turkey's most important trading partner. Britain remained a major trading partner until 1950. From 1945 to 1948 these two countries accounted for about 40 to 50% of Turkey's foreign trade.

Around 1950 Germany replaced Britain as Turkey's second trading partner and maintained this position until 1960. From 1954 to 1960 more than one-third of Turkey's foreign trade was conducted with the U.S. and Germany. In the 1950s Britain, Germany, and especially the U.S. were in the forefront in providing Turkey with financial assistance. From 1960 to 1980 Germany was to overtake the U.S. and become Turkey's first trading partner.

The table showing Turkey's foreign trade (Table 4-3) reflects the country's dependence on the West. As indicated above, Turkey felt very isolated after the war and found the international environment extremely threatening. In these circumstances it was only natural for Turkey's foreign policy decisions to be fully aligned with the West. Turkey had never been able to join any alliance since the Ottoman Empire with the ease with which it joined NATO, with hardly a single dissenting domestic voice.

Taking this radical step posed no difficulties in the circumstances. International and domestic conditions aside, Turkey had been moving toward the West for centuries. Russia had been the threat throughout history. Greece and Iran were in a somewhat similar situation, with a covert Soviet threat in the form of Soviet infiltration, while the threat to Turkey was overt and external. This was the same threat confronting the West. Furthermore, the U.S. was not perceived as imperialistic.

In former times Turkey would have hesitated for fear of becoming a satellite; but now, unlike Greece, it joined NATO without first going through the process of a national debate. During this period the only foreign policy issue that created any controversy was the decision to send a brigade to Korea without first seeking parliamentary approval. These circumstances prevailed for about ten years when foreign policy remained outside the scope of party politics (Hale, p. 120).

The difference between Turkey and its neighbors Greece and Iran was most probably due to the fact that these countries had not suffered from profiteering and the black market to the same extent as Turkey had. This led the class structure to develop in such a way that, unlike in Greece and Iran, a powerful anti-Communist sentiment in Turkey persisted even after the USSR underwent important changes.

After the NATO and Korean decisions, foreign policy decisions were made in a steadily deteriorating political and economic situation. At first Turkey had sided with the Arabs at the UN; but in 1948 it voted for the Conciliation Commission for Palestine. In 1948 Archbishop Athenagoras, a U.S. citizen, was allowed to take over as Patriarch of Phanar. In 1949 Ankara stayed away from the Congress of Asian States. After 1950 it supported Britain on the Cyprus question. After 1954 it voted to keep the Algerian question off the agenda at the UN. In 1955 it helped set up the Baghdad Pact and incurred the wrath of most Arab countries. In 1955 Turkey attended the Bandung Conference at America's request and offended the developing countries by defending U.S. interests. It sided with Britain and France during the Suez crisis of 1956 and almost provoked a war during the Syrian crisis in 1957. In 1958 Turkey allowed the U.S. to use NATO bases to transport troops to Lebanon, and F. R. Zorlu expressed "the hope that the operation would be extended to Iraq" (Gerger, p. 87). In 1960 it provoked the USSR with the U-2 incident and the military bases established on its soil. In the Cuban crisis of 1962 Turkey was in danger of suffering a nuclear attack.

From the Perspective of Joining NATO

1. It is generally accepted that the main reason for Turkey's joining NATO was the Soviet threat. There is no point in considering whether Stalin actually had the intention or the capability to move against Turkey, because in international relations perception is important: Turkey perceived a very real danger stemming from the Soviet Union.

Contrary to the generally held belief still prevalent in Turkey, the notion that the country was saved from the Soviet threat by U.S. action is erroneous.

Leaving aside the 1939 Saracoğlu mission to Moscow and the note of 19 March 1945, the latest date at which Soviet pressure was actually felt was 7 June 1945, when Molotov and Sarper met. The first sign of U.S. support for Turkey, however, was not until 5 April 1946, when the Missouri arrived in İstanbul. During the intervening ten months, Turkey had successfully stood against the USSR all by itself.

It is also worth considering whether the arrival of the Missouri was of much significance. The Soviets started submitting their notes to Ankara four months after the battleship's arrival, with the first note bearing the date 7 August 1946. The Missouri clearly had not deterred the LISSE

Finally, if we accept the Truman Doctrine as the beginning of U.S. involvement, this doctrine was proclaimed on 12 March 1947, five months after the last Soviet note was rejected by Turkey on 18 October 1946. The actual implementation of the Truman Doctrine began nine months after the note's rejection, on 12 July 1947.

2. It must be accepted that the circumstances in which Turkey joined NATO made it difficult for a strategic medium power like Turkey to pursue a policy independent of the blocs (see the concept of the "Aron paradigm" in "The Military, Political, and Economic Background of Turkish Foreign Policy" in the Introduction). We know that NATO did not pressure Turkey to join the alliance. On the contrary, there was considerable opposition to Turkey's membership from Britain and the Scandinavian members. Turkey had made an unsuccessful bid to join when NATO was in the process of being formed in November 1948 (Hale, p. 116) and subsequently on 11 May 1950 and 1 August 1950 (Sander 1979, pp. 70 and 76). All of these bids were turned down. Clearly, it was Turkey that was eager for membership. In order to attain this objective Turkey participated in the Korean War and lost 721 men there. Developments were influenced not by the international system but by Turkey's social and psychological makeup and its class structure that made use of it.

It would be wrong to attribute Turkey's economic woes to NATO, however. NATO can be perceived as restricting Turkey's independence, but it did not prevent Turkey from developing from a peripheral to a semi-peripheral position. Although the U.S. did not want to see Turkey industrialized during this period, Turkey's economic difficulties were essentially the result of its unplanned and haphazard economic policies.

3. Another reason why NATO membership received widespread support at the time was the belief that this would help bring democracy to Turkey. Many today support Turkey's accession to the European Union for precisely the same reason. On this basis it can even be concluded that a yearning for a better democracy can lead a country to join international groupings without too much questioning or caution.

A week after the decision to send a military contingent to Korea, Turkey made its second application to join NATO. NATO's response was that Turkey could not become a full member but would be accepted as an associate member. Ankara considered this to be second-class membership and turned down the offer (Hale, p. 118).

4. According to William Hale, Menderes had a "phobia of communism that exceeded even Dulles's phobia," and this led him to pursue a foreign policy that constrained Turkey's independence. It would be erroneous, however, to seek the reason for this phobia in Menderes's psychological makeup. The reason was that the economically bankrupt regime was seeking to obtain foreign aid and foreign loans by constantly overplaying the Communist menace. Even when the Soviet policies changed radically, Turkey refused to see this, acted as if the nonaligned movement did not exist, and did everything to sharpen the differences arising from the Cold War. Only after losing his last hope for further Western credits did Menderes make a U-turn and start planning an official visit to Moscow.

From the Perspective of the General Nature of Foreign Policy

1. In the broadest sense, this period is the antithesis of the two preceding periods from 1923 to 1939 and from 1939 to 1945. Those two periods reflected a degree of relative autonomy, while this third period did not. This period was the direct result of the policies pursued during the war and the accumulation of capital. In this respect, it resembles the Özal period starting in 1980, but with a difference. From 1945 to 1960 the effects of the war years (that is, the external dynamics) led to excessive dependence on outsiders, whereas in the post-1980 period internal dynamics (that is, the mistakes of the period from 1960 to 1980) led to external dependence.

2. Turkish foreign policy during the Menderes period followed the traditional Western orientation but veered from the usual pro-status quo foreign policy based on balancing conflicting outside influences. The Menderes policies disregarded the balances between East and West as well as the balances within the West. Turkey's foreign policy confined itself to following the American line exclusively, without taking into account international developments. This drastically reduced Turkey's freedom of maneuver.

Furthermore, Turkey's foreign policy under Menderes steered away from its traditional regard for legitimacy and its traditional caution. An active foreign policy was pursued without much concern for the risks involved. A medium-sized power with a key geostrategic location should have paid more attention to following a cautious line.

From this point of view, the Menderes period was the precursor of the Özal period.

Relations with the USSR

I. TENSION IN RELATIONS (1945–1953) A. The USSR after the War

Following World War II, the USSR went through a period of drastic restructuring in its economy, its federation, its armed forces, its party, and its politics.

The Soviet economy had suffered grievous losses during the war. Depending on the source, 20 to 27 million Soviet citizens perished in the conflict. With the transfer of thousands of factories to the east during the war, new industrial centers emerged throughout the land. The first step in the postwar restructuring was the launching in March 1946 of the Fourth Five-Year Plan. While the objectives of the plan in the field of heavy industry were largely attained, the results in the fields of agriculture and consumer goods were far from satisfactory. Even in 1950 agricultural production had not reached the level attained in 1940. In the course of the restructuring, the antireligious policies that had been relaxed during the war were resumed. The languages of the nationalities began to be written in the Cyrillic alphabet, and their histories were rewritten. On 25 February 1946 the Red Army was renamed the Soviet Army. The party too was reorganized. The word "Bolshevik" was discarded from the party's name at the 19th Party Congress, held in October 1952. (The previous congress had been held in 1939.) Important changes were made in the party structure: all power was now concentrated in Stalin's hands, while differences emerged among his subordinates. The ideology that prevailed after the war was known as Zhdanovism.

The wartime alliance with the U.S. had created a degree of sympathy toward that country, especially among Soviet intellectuals. After the war, A. A. Zhdanov worked hard to eradicate all traces of this. His sudden death in 1948 unleashed an ideological battle within the party. One group, headed by G. M. Malenkov, was for improving relations with the West. The other group, headed by L. P. Beria, the chief of the secret police, would prevail.

In the field of foreign policy, America's possession of the atomic bomb had a critical influence on the actions of the USSR. Having suffered enormous economic losses and casualties during the war, the main concern of the Soviet Union in these postwar years was security. The USSR was able to overcome its fears on 25 September 1949, when the Soviet news agency TASS (Telegrafnoe Agentstvo Sovetskogo Soyuza) informed the world that the USSR had successfully tested an atomic bomb on 29 August.

After the atomic bomb, another factor that influenced Soviet foreign policy was the appearance of the new socialist regimes, first in Europe and then in Asia. The USSR was eager to become the leader of these countries and soon succeeded in this through the creation of the Cominform in September 1947 and of the COMECON in October 1949. All of the countries of Eastern Europe came under Soviet influence, with the exception of Albania and Yugoslavia. Both of these countries had been able to end the occupation of their countries through their own efforts. When the People's Republic of China was established on 1 October 1949, the "socialist bloc" acquired the potential to challenge the capitalist system in every field.

Another factor that helped shape Soviet foreign policy after World War II was the policy of containment conceived in the Cold War period (see Box 4-4 below). The USSR tried by every means to frustrate this policy pursued by the West under U.S. leadership. After the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan, followed by the establishment of NATO, the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO), the Balkan Pact, and the Baghdad Pact, the foreign policy of the USSR was largely shaped by security concerns. Soviet territory had been occupied twice all the way to Moscow. Moscow's compelling desire to establish a "security belt" against the West has been used to explain the tight Soviet hegemony over Eastern Europe.

B. The Soviet Demands on Turkey and Their Consequences

The developments following World War II caused almost irreparable damage to Turkey's relations with the USSR and affected bilateral relations for many years.

On 19 March 1945, seven weeks before the unconditional surrender of Germany on 7 May 1945, V. M. Molotov handed Ambassador Sarper a note informing him that the USSR would not extend the 1925 treaty (see "The Molotov-Sarper Meeting and the Soviet Note of 19 March 1945" in Section 3). It will be recalled that the 1925 treaty was extended for two years by the 1929 protocol, for a further five years by the protocol signed on 30 October 1931, and for ten more years by the protocol signed on 7 November 1935. When Molotov notified Sarper of Moscow's denunciation of the treaty, he stressed that conditions had changed fundamentally in the postwar period. He added that the USSR was prepared to start talks on concluding a new agreement in line with the changed conditions.

Turkey had feared such a development all along. Now the USSR would demand a say in the future regime of the Straits before it would agree to conclude a new treaty. The situation had changed completely since 1939, and Moscow now had the upper hand. A month earlier, at Yalta, Stalin had told Roosevelt that the Montreux Straits Convention had become outdated. Roosevelt reacted with the remark that the Soviet view "made sense."

Turkey replied to the 19 March note on 4 April and inquired about the Soviet conditions for a new treaty. This was followed by talks at the ambassadorial level. On 7 June 1945 Molotov received Sarper and informed him of the Soviet conditions for the treaty.

As will be remembered (see Box 3-6 in Section 3), Molotov first dealt with the 1921 treaty and started talking about "repairing the injustice of 1921." He pointed out that the Soviet Union had been weak at the time and that the frontier traced by the Turkish-Soviet Treaty of 16 March 1921 should now be revised by ceding the districts of Kars and Ardahan in eastern Turkey to the USSR. Sarper's reply to this Soviet demand was firm: "The 1921 treaty itself was designed to repair a previous injustice and was signed by Lenin himself. The USSR needs neither more land nor more people. It is not worth alienating Turkey and losing its goodwill with such claims. In any case, the issue is nonnegotiable." Although the Brest-Litovsk Treaty returned Kars and Ardahan to the Ottoman Empire in 1918, the provinces were actually transferred to Turkey only in 1921, which Sarper had in mind when he referred to redressing an injustice. Sarper's dispatch to Ankara contained the following passage: "I do not consider that the Soviets will cut off negotiations; nor will they insist on territorial concessions. They have advanced these claims only as a negotiating tactic" (İkinci Dünya Savaşı Yılları [1939–1946], p. 267).

After this, Molotov dealt with the Straits, declaring that "the fate of 200 million people depended on the actions of just Turkey alone." Sarper replied: "[I]f what you are saying implies Soviet bases in the Straits, this is out of the question." Molotov complained that the Montreux Convention was out of date and had to be changed. Sarper reminded Molotov that this was a multilateral compact and that the other signatories had to be consulted (Gürün, pp. 283–86).

By making these claims, the USSR committed a serious tactical error. Its real purpose was to ensure its security in relation to the Straits. By raising territorial issues, it hardened Turkey's position on the Straits and pushed it closer to the U.S.

On 18 June Molotov received Sarper one more time and repeated the Soviet claims. Thus the possibility of concluding a friendship treaty between the USSR and Turkey to replace the 1925 treaty was completely lost.

To apply pressure on Turkey in connection with the Straits, the USSR kept demanding territorial concessions. The Soviet demands were incorporated in the decisions adopted on the solemn occasion of the election of the Armenian patriarch at Etchmiazin. By this means the USSR sought to influence the U.S. through the Armenian diaspora living in America.

The Soviet Demands at Potsdam

At the Postdam Conference held by the Allies from 17 July to 2 August 1945, the Soviet claims were taken up once agair. The main topics at Potsdam were the Polish question, Germany's frontiers, the progress of the war in the Pacific theater, and war reparations. The question of the Straits came up at informal talks. At dinner on 18 July Stalin informed Churchill that an alliance between Turkey and the USSR was possible only following the settlement of differences but that Turkey was refusing to cede Kars and Ardahan to the USSR or to discuss revising the Montreux Convention (Churchill, vol. 6, p. 549). On 23 July Stalin asked Churchill whether it would be possible to obtain a base for the USSR at Alexandroupolis (Dedeağaç) in Greece if it proved impossible to gain a fortified position in the Marmara Sea. This clearly revealed Stalin's intention of gaining control of the Straits for the USSR. Churchill replied that he would support an arrangement in the Straits that would accommodate Soviet wishes but only on condition that Turkey's territorial integrity was not violated. He also stressed that a revision of the Montreux Convention had to be carried out within a multilateral framework.

Stalin responded by handing out a text calling for the termination of the Montreux Convention, the ensuring of security in the Straits jointly by Turkey and the USSR, and the establishment of Soviet bases to allow the USSR to assume its share of the responsibility for security in the waterway. In addition, he also demanded revisions in the Turkish-Soviet frontier. Churchill indicated that the demand for a base was unacceptable. Stalin responded with these words: "The result is that a small country with British backing is allowed to apply pressure on the throat of a major power and deny it free access to the world." Paragraph 16 of the protocol adopted at the end of the Potsdam Conference stated that the three governments had agreed that the Montreux Convention no longer suited the new conditions and had to be revised, but there was no joint decision on how the convention would be updated. It was therefore decided that each government would take up the question with Turkey through bilateral channels.

Unlike Churchill, who stressed the need to respect Turkey's territorial integrity, Harry Truman felt that the territorial issue had to be settled by the Turks and the Russians between themselves (Truman, pp. 415–16). In summary, Turkey had not been able to secure the backing of the West in the early stages of the postwar negotiations between the USSR and the West and was quite alone in confronting the Soviet demands.

It has been claimed that the Russian and English versions of paragraph 16 (regarding the Straits) of the protocol signed on 1 August at Potsdam differed somewhat and allowed for different interpretations. The English version stated that each of the three signatories would submit to Turkey its views on the Straits regime on an individual basis, while the Russian version stated that each of the signatories would negotiate the regime of the Straits with Turkey individually (OTDP, p. 196). In the Soviet documents, the text reads "direct negotiations with Turkey on an individual basis" (Vneshnaya Politika SSSR: Sbornik Dokumentov, p. 444). Veteran diplomat Feridun Cemal Erkin, who served as minister of foreign affairs and was an expert on the Straits and relations with the USSR, agrees with this interpretation.

The Article of the Georgian Professors

During this interval, public opinion in both countries was becoming aroused. On 4 December 1945 an anti-Soviet demonstration was organized in İstanbul. The demonstrators ransacked two bookstores selling Russian books and wrecked the premises of the leftist newspaper Tan while the police stood by and watched. On 8 December the USSR delivered a note condemning the demonstrations. These attacks would be recalled as "the events of the Tan press" in later years.

Two professors, members of the Georgian Academy of Sciences, later wrote an article on the subject of territorial claims entitled "Our Legitimate Claims on Turkey." It was first published in the newspaper Komunisti in Tbilisi on 14 December 1945 and later republished in the newspapers Pravda and Izvestiya on 20 December. The article ended with these sentences: "The Georgian people must reclaim the territories they never gave up and never shall. These include the lands grabbed from Georgia, known as Eastern Lazistan, consisting of Ardahan, Artvin, Oltu, Tortum, İspir, Bayburt, Gümüşhane, and the Giresun and Trabzon regions." In 1948 and 1949 scholarly articles supporting the Soviet claims followed. On 9 March 1946 Ambassador S.A. Vinogradov met with Prime Minister Saracoğlu to complain about personal attacks directed at Soviet public figures appearing in the Turkish press and demand that they be prevented. When Saracoğlu asked whether the Soviet Union had retracted its claims, the ambassador replied that Molotov had advanced these claims and only he could retract them.

The events surrounding the claims during the period from March 1945 to August 1946 can be summarized as follows. The Soviets advanced their claims through Molotov, without putting anything down in written form. Because nothing was done formally, the U.S. and Britain were at first hesitant about taking an official position on the subject. The USSR then raised the issue with Britain and the U.S. at the Potsdam Conference, but no decision was reached. Although the international press took up the question, no official statement on the subject emerged from the Turkish government. In this way, Turkey gave the USSR the opportunity to abandon its claims without loss of face.

The Battle of Notes

In line with the decision taken at Potsdam, the first note delivered to Turkey came from the U.S. on 2 November 1945. The U.S. was proposing the following amendments to the Montreux Convention:

(1) The Straits must remain open to all merchant vessels at all times; (2) the Straits must remain open to the transit passage of warships of the littoral states of the Black Sea; (3) the Straits must remain closed at all times to the warships of nonriparian states of the Black Sea above an agreed tonnage, unless a littoral state has granted its special consent or the warships are on a mission on behalf of the United Nations; (4) the League of Nations must be replaced by the United Nations and Japan must be excluded from the signatories of the revised convention.

The U.S. was also proposing the convening of an international conference to carry out these changes. Turkey was not happy with the proposal that Black Sea riparian states should have the right to use the Straits freely in time of war. This was because in the event of Turkish neutrality in time of war Soviet warships sailing into the Mediterranean might be pursued into the Straits by other warships on their return journey. There might even be naval engagements within the region of the Straits, causing embarrassment to Turkey and compromising its neutrality. A British note with a similar content followed the U.S. note.

The first Soviet note, which led to important developments in Turkish-Soviet relations, was delivered on 8 August 1946. A copy of this note was also sent to the U.S., which answered it on 19 August (see "The Visit of the Missouri and Turkish-American Rapprochement" in the chapter "Relations with the USA and NATO" below).

The events of the last war have clearly proven that the regime of the Straits established by the Montreux Convention signed in 1936 no longer corresponds to the security interests of the Black Sea states; nor does it meet the conditions that would prevent the Straits from being used to the detriment of Black Sea states... The Conference of the three states held in Berlin took the following decisions... For its part, the Soviet government is proposing a new regime for the Straits based on these principles.

(1) The Straits shall remain open to the merchant vessels of all states at all times; (2) the Straits shall remain open at all times to the warships of Black Sea states; (3) the passage through the Straits of warships of non-Black Sea states shall be forbidden except for special cases; (4) the establishment of the regime of the Straits, the natural waterway for entering and exiting the Black Sea, should be the exclusive responsibility of Turkey and the other riparian states of the Black Sea; (5) Turkey and the USSR are the countries most interested in the freedom of commercial navigation through the Straits and also the most capable of ensuring their security, so they should jointly undertake their defense to prevent the waterway from being used by others against the interests of Black Sea riparian states.

Even before Turkey replied to the Soviet note, the U.S. responded on 19 August and Britain on 21 August. Both countries were against the Soviet proposal that the regime of the Straits be formulated exclusively by the Black Sea states. They also stressed that the defense of the Straits was Turkey's responsibility.

Turkey's reply was delivered on 22 August. In the Turkish note, the first issue taken up was the Soviet contention that certain ships passing through the Straits during World War II had violated the terms of the convention. The circumstances surrounding each case were expounded in the Turkish note, which reminded Moscow that the USSR had made no complaint during the war regarding the passage of any vessel through the Straits. Turkey accepted the proposal to convene an international conference to revise the Montreux Convention to bring it into line with technological developments and prevailing conditions. Turkey also accepted the first three Soviet proposals but declared that the fourth and fifth proposals were unacceptable. "The 4th point in the Soviet Note would establish a new regime of the Straits to be drawn up exclusively by Turkey and other Black Sea states and leave all the other interested states out... As for the 5th point, this Soviet proposal would restrict Turkey's sovereign rights, something Turkey would never agree to, and also endanger its security."

On 24 September the USSR submitted a note with a similar content. Moscow defended its fourth point by reminding Turkey that the Black Sea was an enclosed sea and that, under the terms of the treaty of 1921, Ankara had accepted the proposition that the status of the Straits would be determined by the Black Sea riparian states. The USSR also insisted on its fifth point. "The Soviet government is of the opinion that the implementation of its proposal would in no way constrain Turkey's sovereignty, and that the measures taken jointly by Turkey and the USSR to defend the Straits would be more effective than Turkey's single-handed measures, thus enhancing Turkey's security."

The second Soviet note also drew an American and a British response on 9 October, even though it had not been forwarded to Washington and London. These responses stated that it was time to end the correspondence underway in accordance with the decision made at Potsdam. This was followed by Turkey's response on 18 October. This response was forwarded to all of the signatories of the Montreux Convention, with the exclusion of Japan, in order to inform them of an eventual international conference.

In its notes, the USSR had raised four issues: (1) the decisions reached at Potsdam; (2) Turkey's alleged failure to carry out its responsibilities during World War II; (3) the inadequacy of the current regime of the Straits; and (4) its proposals for a new regime. Each of these issues was addressed in Turkey's reply.

The exchange of notes regarding the Straits was followed by the Truman Doctrine and the U.S. aid that came with it. In 1948 the USSR consolidated its grip over Eastern Europe, while Turkey participated in the Marshall Plan.

As soon as the Truman Doctrine was proclaimed, the Soviet press launched a campaign against it. This was followed by a campaign against the Marshall Plan in the following year. The USSR was deeply suspicious of Turkey's efforts to join NATO and of its support for the project to establish a Middle Eastern command. On 3 November 1951 the USSR delivered a note condemning Turkey's efforts to join NATO. Moscow notified Turkey that by joining it would become a party to NATO's aggressive objectives and would have to shoulder the consequences of this move. Moscow regarded the membership of Greece and Turkey in NATO as an aberration, because these countries were at the doorstep of the USSR, while they were far removed from the Atlantic Ocean.

Turkey responded to the Soviet note on 12 November 1951 and reminded Moscow that NATO was a defensive pact. When it joined NATO in February 1952, it became the second member country (after Norway) to have a common border with the USSR. The project to set up a Middle Eastern command also elicited a Soviet protest in the form of a note dated 24 November 1951, to which Turkey replied on 19 December. The Soviet note of 28 January 1952 would remain unanswered. By now Turkey was fully integrated in the Western Bloc.

The Causes of the Soviet Demands

The USSR's post-1945 claims against Turkey have been generally appraised in Turkey from a pro-American and anti-Soviet vantage point. To bring some balance to this approach, it will be useful to look into the causes of these claims and also to see the question from the Soviet point of view. Let us start with the claims on Kars and Ardahan on the eastern frontier. This was the issue that poisoned bilateral relations most; but, paradoxically, Molotov advanced the claim only verbally during his talks with Ambassador Sarper on 7 June 1945 and only as a bargaining chip in the ongoing negotiations. As noted above, Moscow would pay dearly for advancing this territorial claim.

From the Soviet point of view, the question of the Straits was primarily a security issue. The manner in which the Nazis used the Straits during the war justified Soviet concerns, based on the desire to restrict the access of outsiders to the Straits. These concerns were voiced at Lausanne in 1923, at Montreux in 1936, and in connection with the subsequent proposal for the joint defense of the Straits during the Saracoğlu mission to Moscow in 1939. They were reiterated during the war. In February 1945 the USSR persuaded Britain and the U.S. at Yalta that the Montreux Convention must be revised, and the notes it delivered to Turkey were based on the decisions reached at Potsdam in July and August 1945. The USSR had complained that the Germans had used the Straits during the war to further their aims and was now worried that the Western powers would use the Straits to strike at its soft underbelly.

To achieve its objectives, the USSR applied pressure on Turkey and also used threats but did not resort to the use of force. In fact it was too risky to apply force against Turkey before acquiring the atomic bomb. This is why Stalin was able to give assurances to British foreign secretary Ernest Bevin on 19 December 1945 (PRO, FO 371/59242) and to the American ambassador in Moscow, W. B. Smith, in early 1947 (Bilge 1992, p. 333) that Turkey would not be attacked. After the rejection of the second Soviet note, the USSR dropped the subject altogether. Following Stalin's death in 1953, it formally declared that all of its claims had been dropped.

The Consequences of the Soviet Demands

From the Soviet perspective, the demands on Turkey can be regarded as a failure. Moscow failed to achieve its aspirations, while it pushed Turkey into the Western fold. Looking at the matter from Turkey's perspective, some observations are in order.

At the end of the war, Turkey took its place in the Western orbit, seriously straining its relations with the USSR, its neighbor and the leader of the opposing bloc. On this issue, there is some debate about how one development led to the other. A. Suat Bilge argues that the territorial demands pushed Turkey into the Western Bloc. "These demands drove Turkey into the Western camp, although such a move was never contemplated at the outset" (Bilge 1992, p. 352). Kamuran Gürün reaches a similar conclusion when he states that Turkey's membership in NATO would not have come up had it not been for the Soviet demands. In his view, even if Turkey had contemplated membership, it would not have been possible to obtain the USSR's consent as called for by the 1929 protocol (Gürün, p. 315).

In another view, although Turkey was able to remain neutral during the war, it was compelled to maintain half a million men under arms. Because of the Soviet threat, Turkey was unable to demobilize its army, which rendered it dependent on military aid, which in turn led to its membership in NATO (Ülman, p. 12).

Feridun Cemal Erkin is right in concluding that the Soviet demands were the result of the competition between the USSR and the Anglo-Saxon powers for domination following World War II. If the USSR had succeeded in bringing Greece and Turkey under its control, it could have altered the balance in the Mediterranean and the Middle East. This explains why the U.S. came to the aid of these two countries and Turkey came swiftly under Western influence. After joining NATO, Turkey became an important military partner of the West in the Middle East and the Mediterranean, thanks to the bases established on its soil. From Turkey's vantage point, membership in NATO was seen as a "search for security in the face of demands that jeopardized both its territorial integrity and its sovereignty" (Bilge 1983, p. 15).

Another factor was that joining the Western alliance reinforced Turkey's anti-Communist tendency (present since the foundation of the Turkish state) by adding anti-Soviet sentiment. These two overlapping anti-Communist and anti-Soviet streaks became the determining factors shaping Turkey's domestic and foreign policies.

To sum up, the USSR's demands from Turkey following World War II resulted in long-term damage to bilateral relations, which would take many years to repair.

An Appraisal of the Soviet Demands

Within the dynamics of the Cold War, the Soviet claims were focused on the Straits and Montreux. The claims were formally advanced in 1946 and were promptly rejected by Turkey. These events caused Turkey to go through an extremely jittery period in its foreign relations. It was at this juncture that the West reassured Turkey. First, Britain notified Ankara in February 1946 that the 1939 alliance was still operative and that Britain was bound to come to Turkey's assistance in case of an attack. The second reassurance came from the U.S. when the body of the Turkish ambassador in Washington, Münir Ertegün, was sent to İstanbul on board the battleship Missouri in April 1946. Despite a generally held but erroneous view, the Turkish government resisted the Soviet demands regarding the Straits not with American backing but on its own. This situation was clearly explained by Ahmet Şükrü Esmer, a professor of political history and director-general of the press and broadcasting from 1949 to 1954, writing in the context of the 1964 Johnson letter (see the next chapter):

The years 1945 and 1946 were the most perilous times for Turkey. Ankara's attempts to draw the attention of the United States and its ally Britain to the dangers confronting it proved fruitless. When we went to San Francisco in April 1945, our efforts to explain our situation to the United States were of no avail. We were reminded that Russia's heroic struggle had saved the lives of many of their sons. The Truman Doctrine came in March 1947. But Turkey resisted Soviet demands throughout 1945 and 1946 when it was all alone. We are thankful to America for its aid, even if it was delayed. But it would be a historical error to claim that this aid "saved" Turkey. We cannot allow [Lyndon] Johnson or Dean Rusk to assume the role of our "saviors." From whom did they save us and how? The Russian pressure was heavy, and if it was going to lead to war, this would have happened in 1945 and 1946. After that the situation changed. The Russians were forced to evacuate their forces of occupation even from Iran after 1946. There is no evidence that Russia was planning to extract its demands from Turkey by force of arms. If Russia had intended to follow up its pressure by going to war against Turkey, Ankara would have accepted the challenge and fought alone to defend itself. There is no indication from their attitude in 1945 that either Britain or America, which now likes to pose as our "savior," would have come to our rescue in that contingency. (Esmer, Ulus, 13 March 1966, quoted in Oran, p. 71)

II. FROM TENSION TO DÉTENTE (1953–1960)

A. The USSR after Stalin

As we have already noted, industrial production in the USSR after World War II achieved the planned objectives, but agricultural production lagged. Great efforts were made in the 1950s to improve farm output. Starting in 1953, budgetary resources were diverted from heavy industry to agriculture and consumer goods industries. The Soviet economy was geared to the goal of overtaking America. Nikita Khrushchev explained Soviet economic policies thus: "We shall not destroy capitalism with bombs. Capitalism shall be dealt the biggest blow when we surpass the USA in per capita production of meat, cooking oil, and milk" (Gibney, p. 26). On 4 October 1957 the Soviet satellite Sputnik I was placed in earth orbit. This was a good indicator of the advanced technological level attained by the USSR. The economy would return to the agenda in the mid-1980s with the drive for perestroika (restructuring).

Stalin's death on 5 March 1953 was a turning point in the history of the USSR. It signaled a change in the relations between the people and the administration. The system of collective leadership had begun. Malenkov, who was regarded as the natural heir to Stalin, came to the fore and adopted a policy consisting of three main elements. In international relations, tensions would be eased. The economy would be restructured, and, to this end, relations with farmers would be placed on a new footing. Agricultural reform, launched in 1953, had an important place in this process. Khrushchev played a key role in the elaboration and implementation of these reforms. Malenkov resigned in February 1955 and was succeeded by Khrushchev as party secretary-general and N. A. Bulganin as prime minister.

These political developments and the attendant changes in the economic and bureaucratic structures also helped change the foreign policy of the USSR. According to Soviet scholars, this foreign policy rested on four pillars: carry out the prescriptions of socialism and communism along with the other socialist states (communism); promote the friendship and fraternity of the socialist states and peoples (internationalism); pursue peaceful coexistence and the preservation of humanity from a new world war (pacifism); and support wars of national liberation and the ending of exploitation (anti-imperialism). The 1950s saw the implementation of these principles in Soviet foreign policy.

One of the main features of Soviet foreign policy in this period was the attempt to control the other socialist states, and above all the People's Republic of China, by maintaining the closest relations with these states. The USSR saw the establishment of the People's Republic of China on 1 October 1949 as a momentous event. With the success of the Chinese revolution, socialism was to become a world system embracing 800 million souls. Under Soviet leadership, the eight socialist states of Europe met in Moscow in 1954 and again in Warsaw on 11 May 1955, when they established the Warsaw Pact as a direct response to the membership of the Federal Republic of Germany in NATO. The pact, officially known as the Friendship, Cooperation, and Mutual Assistance Treaty, was signed on 14 May and had a duration of twenty-five years. The military alliance bringing together the Western states (NATO) now had its counterpart in a military alliance bringing together the countries of the socialist bloc (the Warsaw Pact).

After Stalin, the USSR revised its foreign policy and placed its relations with the capitalist countries on a new basis. Its policy toward the West was now based on the principle of peaceful coexistence. At the 20th Congress of the CPSU, the principle of "different paths to socialism" was adopted. Although this created problems within the Eastern Bloc, it opened up new avenues of cooperation between the USSR and the countries of the Third World. These developments and especially the policy of peaceful coexistence allowed the USSR to take significant steps in improving its relations with its neighbors, including Turkey.

B. The Development of Bilateral Relations

1. The Soviet Note of 30 May 1953 and Turkey's Reply

The process of normalization of relations between Turkey and the USSR began on 30 May 1953. For the first time after World War II, the USSR took a step to restore relations to their former state on that day. This step was followed with further initiatives. On 30 May 1953 the USSR delivered a note informing Turkey that the demands that had been made following World War II were being formally withdrawn.

The Soviet Government has recently been examining the issue of the relations of the USSR with its neighbors, and, in this context, it has focused on the state of Soviet-Turkish relations.

It will be recalled that, some years ago, the representatives of the two states engaged in official talks on the question of Soviet-Turkish relations in connection with the expiration of the Soviet-Turkish Treaty of 1925. At these talks, the territorial demands on Turkey of the Armenian Soviet Socialist Republic and the Georgian Soviet Socialist Republic were taken up as well as the considerations of the Soviet Government on the question of dealing with possible threats to the security of the Soviet Union that might come from the Black Sea Straits. The distress that these issues caused to the Turkish Government as well as to the Turkish public did not fail to affect Soviet-Turkish relations.

To further good neighborly relations and reinforce peace and security, the governments of Armenia and Georgia now deem it possible to renounce their territorial claims against Turkey. The Soviet Government has reviewed its previous position regarding the question of the Straits and considers that it is possible to ensure the security of the Soviet Union in the region of the Straits in conditions acceptable to the Soviet Union as well as Turkey.

The Soviet Government hereby declares that the Soviet Union harbors no territorial claims on Turkey.

The note referred to the USSR's desire to improve relations. By declaring explicitly that all territorial claims had been withdrawn, Moscow signaled its intention, as the federal power, to remove this negative element introduced by Armenia and Georgia from the bilateral relations of the two countries. Finally, the note indicated that Moscow had reconsidered its position on the subject of the Straits.

It will be useful to examine how Turkey and its Western allies assessed the Soviet note. At the time of its delivery, Prime Minister Menderes was on a visit to London, so he assessed it with his British hosts on 1 June. Britain's first reaction was to establish a link between the note and Turkey's membership in NATO. Moscow was taking a step back. The Soviet initiative was also interpreted as an attempt to pull Turkey away from its Western allies as well as to frustrate the establishment of the Balkan Pact and the Middle East Command. France, for its part, saw the Soviet move as being motivated by the desire to bring about detente in East-West relations.

Turkey held the view that the note contained both positive and negative elements. First, it provided Turkey with the opportunity to cut its defense spending (which accounted for half of the budget) by one-third. At the same time, the note raised the possibility that Western aid to Turkey might be reduced. Another Turkish concern had to do with the Straits. The Montreux Convention had a duration of twenty years, and the two-year period for notice of renunciation was due to begin in approximately one year, in July 1954. In other words, starting on that date, one of the signatories could give formal notice that it wanted to terminate the convention. Turkey was concerned that the Soviet position on the Straits was somewhat ambiguous and was apprehensive that the USSR might denounce the convention during this period. It would later become clear that these fears were groundless.

Turkey formulated its reply in the light of these considerations and delivered its note to Moscow on 18 July 1953.

The Government of the Republic of Turkey notes with satisfaction the declaration of the Government of the Soviet Union that the USSR has no territorial claims on Turkey.

With reference to the Soviet statement that it wants to maintain relations of good neighborliness and reinforce peace and security, the Government of the Republic of Turkey declares that this corresponds fully to its own past position as well as the position it will continue to maintain in the future.

As the Soviet Union is aware, the question of the Straits falls within the terms of the Montreux Convention, a fact that the Government of Turkey wishes to underline.

The second exchange of notes that took place in July clearly revealed Turkey's concerns in connection with the question of the Straits area. Two days after the receipt of Turkey's reply, the USSR submitted a new note on 20 July, complaining about the ever-increasing number of American and British warships in the Straits. Turkey responded on 24 July by stating that "such courtesy visits are fully in compliance with the Montreux Convention and do not call for prior notification." The USSR submitted a similar note to Greece on 26 October 1953, pointing out that "turning Greek territory into a base for the forces of the Atlantic bloc endangers peace and security in the Balkans. The Soviet Government cannot remain indifferent to such developments and ... all responsibility for increasing international tension will have to be borne by the Greek Government" (Ayın Tarihi 239 [October 1953]: 205). The Soviet note was a reaction to the anti-Soviet alliance being forged in the Balkans.

By submitting its note to Turkey, the USSR was taking the first step toward the normalization of bilateral relations that had reached a breaking point following the claims made immediately after the war. The USSR had made a clear U-turn. Turkey's reply indicated that the new Soviet position was viewed positively but still considered unsatisfactory.

The note of 30 May and the Turkish reply reflected the foreign policies of the two countries. From the point of view of the USSR, the note was not just the consequence of Stalin's death; nor was it a deviation from traditional Soviet policy. As explained earlier, the country's social and economic profile was changing as it broke free from Stalin's influence, and its foreign policy began to reflect this. Just as important was the desire of the leadership to break out of the "containment" policy directed against it.

Similarly, Turkey's response reflected the objectives of its foreign policy. At that time, Turkey's main concern was not revising its relations with its neighbors. Ankara's goal was to reinforce its position within NATO and use its strategic location to obtain economic aid.

The USSR's statements and other steps aimed at improving bilateral relations continued throughout the 1950s. In his speech delivered on 8 August 1953 at the Supreme Soviet, Malenkov stressed that the Soviet note was designed to develop good neighborly relations between the two countries and added that this could only be possible if Turkey nurtured similar desires. Subsequently, on 26 April 1954, Malenkov complained that Turkey was not trying hard enough to improve relations.

At the reception held at the Kremlin on 7 November 1954 on the occasion of the anniversary of the October Revolution, Bulganin told the ambassadors of Turkey and Iran that mistakes had been made in the conduct of relations with their countries in the recent past because of Stalin but that these mistakes would not be repeated. In his speech at the Supreme Soviet in December 1955, Khrushchev alluded to the cordial relations during the Atatürk and İnönü eras and their subsequent deterioration. He added that it would not be correct to blame only Turkey for this and emphasized that uncalled-for remarks from the Soviet side had also contributed to negative developments. Khrushchev declared that they had taken the necessary steps to improve relations but that this had not been reciprocated by the Turkish leadership. He also referred to American military activities in Turkey. Finally, he reiterated that the time had come to develop relations on the basis of good-neighborliness and friendship. In a broadcast in July 1957, Radio Moscow held Molotov responsible for the deterioration of relations.

2. Turkey's Bloc Policy

Turkey's response to the USSR's overtures starting in 1953 was to pursue a bloc policy that would determine the course and nature of relations. This led to numerous problems between the two countries.

U.S. Bases and Activities in Turkey

Turkey's membership in NATO, the military bases established on its territory, and the joint military exercises carried out angered the USSR. On 4 February 1956 Moscow delivered notes to the U.S. and Turkey complaining about balloons released from American bases in Turkey and alleged that these were being employed to gather military intelligence. In its response delivered on 11 February, Turkey claimed that this operation was designed to gather meteorological data, that the public had been informed of this by the semiofficial Anatolia Agency, and that it would be incorrect to interpret this as a threat to Soviet security. The Turkish note showed that Ankara would not be deflected from its policy of blocs.

Turkey's Part in the Policy of "Containment"

Turkey's decision to become one of the principal actors in the policy of "containment" upset the USSR. Moscow kept quiet about the Balkan Pact initiative because this coincided with its note of 30 May 1953, but it used Bulgaria as a surrogate. Bulgaria issued an official statement declaring that it was disturbed by the intentions of the alliance of the "fascist aggressors" who had turned their attention to the Balkans and the Middle East.

With respect to the Baghdad Pact, the USSR expressed its misgivings without intermediaries. In its note dated 18 March 1954, Moscow declared that it considered the agreement signed between Turkey and Pakistan to be a new instance of American expansionism, which directly threatened the USSR's security and regional peace. The USSR reiterated that it desired good relations with all countries but especially with its neighbors, including, naturally, Turkey.

Turkey replied to this note on 8 May. Ankara declared that each step that it took to cooperate with peace-loving countries of goodwill to strengthen peace and security was met by a Soviet effort to depict its actions as being a threat to peace.

Despite the Soviet claims, Turkey argued that the Baghdad Pact had been established to counter the Soviet threat. The Baghdad Pact had the effect of enhancing Soviet influence in the Middle East, however, because this was a time of decolonization and the nonaligned movement was rapidly gaining in strength. As Soviet influence grew in the Middle East, this had a direct influence on Turkey's regional policy. Starting in 1955, the USSR became an important negative factor in Turkey's deteriorating relations with its Arab neighbors.

In the Balkans, the USSR reviewed its relations with Yugoslavia and prevented the envisaged military cooperation in the region from taking shape.

Despite its misgivings over Turkey's policies, Moscow refrained from adopting a totally negative stance toward its neighbor during this period. Moscow saw Turkey's policies and its actions in pursuit of these policies as the direct consequence of the aggressive and expansionist designs of the imperialists in the Middle East and the Balkans and strove to end Turkey's links with these forces.

The Syrian and Iraqi Crises

In the course of the Syrian crisis of 1957, Turkey and the USSR came closer to an armed clash than at any other time since 1920, when relations were first established (see the chapter "Relations with the Soviets" in Section 1). The USSR's policy toward Syria was in line with its general policies toward the Middle East and the Third World. When the crisis was at its height, Khrushchev made a statement to the New York Times on 9 October 1957. "Turkey is extremely weak, and in the event of a war, it would not last even for a day. We are very close to Turkey and you Americans are very far, far away. If the guns start firing, rockets would also start flying and it would be too late to reconsider." On the surface, this statement sounded like a direct threat; but in view of the manner in which the message was conveyed, we might conclude that it was addressed to the U.S. rather than Turkey, as an appeal for America to review its policies.

The coup that took place in Iraq on 14 July 1958 strained Turkish-Soviet relations once again. Following the coup, Turkey toyed with the idea of intervening in Iraq. Khrushchev declared on 16 July that any attempt by Turkey to change the course of events would lead to a Soviet armed response. The moderate tone of Turkey's conciliatory response was attributed to the influence of its Western allies.

After this came the Soviet note of 24 July 1958. It referred to foreign minister F. R. Zorlu's statement to the Daily Mail in which he alluded to the 500,000 ethnic Turks (Turcomans) in Iraq as well as the 50 million Muslims in the USSR. The note also drew attention to military movements in Turkey's southern border region. It warned that Turkey would have to bear the consequences of any intervention in Iraq. The Soviet note was an attempt to intimidate Turkey.

As in the case of the Syrian crisis, what kept Turkey from undertaking military action in Iraq was not just the tough position taken by the USSR but also the policy of the U.S., which wanted to avoid a direct confrontation with the USSR over an issue that was not of immediate concern to Washington.

The Nuclear Missiles and U-2 Crises

In December 1957 the deployment of Jupiter missiles in Turkey became a hot issue. On 13 December Bulganin sent a letter to Menderes (the third letter during that year). The exchange of letters had become an important means for dealing with bilateral problems. Bulganin's letter stressed that by allowing its territory to be used against its neighbors Turkey was needlessly exposing itself to grave dangers. Countries that allowed the deployment of missiles on their territories would become the targets of counterstrikes. Bulganin reiterated that the USSR wanted nothing but good relations, good neighborliness, and more trade. This was the beginning of the missile crisis, which would last until 1962, when, as a result of negotiations between the USSR and the U.S. over the Cuban missiles, they would be removed from Turkey.

Bulganin sent Menderes a fourth letter on 8 January 1958 in which he recalled the important steps he had taken toward peace and disarmament and voiced his wish to end the Cold War and sign a disarmament agreement between the two alliances. He went on to remind Ankara that missiles acquired without payment could not enhance Turkey's security because it would never be allowed to use such missiles. His letter ended with the warning that a single match could start a big conflagration and Turkey would be the first country to be consumed by such a disaster.

Menderes replied to this letter on 25 February and indicated that all the measures taken by Turkey were of a defensive nature. Although the USSR interpreted Turkey's measures as aggressive, the USSR itself had all manner of bases and missiles, he pointed out, asking how Turkey was to interpret that.

The USSR delivered a note to Turkey on 13 December 1958, drawing attention to the signing of a new military agreement between Turkey and the U.S. that provided for the deployment of nuclear weapons and missiles. The note stated that it was contrary to the interests of the USSR for Turkey to become NATO's nuclear base. The USSR made an official statement on 25 March, alleging that the military agreement was in conformity with the Eisenhower Doctrine. By ignoring the USSR's pleas for improved relations and by signing the agreement, Turkey was turning itself into a target at a time when it was going through an economic crisis. This agreement was the result of a blind adherence to the dictum of "being well armed, even if naked."

The uneasiness of the USSR over military bases reached its climax with the U-2 incident. When the U-2 spy plane was shot down and the U.S. was forced to admit its responsibility, the Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs issued a statement in which Ankara declared that Turkey had not given permission for any American plane to fly over Soviet territory. The statement added that the aircraft that had been shot down had not taken off from Turkey and concluded by declaring that, outside of its airspace, Ankara could only accept responsibility for the activities of Turkish aircraft. This did not prevent the USSR from delivering a note on 13 May, reminding Turkey that it was serving America's aggressive policies through its military bases. The note warned that the necessary measures would be taken should Turkey continue to allow such flights in the future. Turkey replied to this note on 18 May by emphasizing that the facilities provided by Turkey to its allies were only for defensive purposes. This incident prevented the holding of the U.S./USSR summit but led to no serious crisis in Turkish-Soviet bilateral relations, because Menderes had announced that he would be visiting the USSR in July. This visit was planned as the consequence of dissatisfaction with the level of economic aid being provided by the U.S.

3. Economic Relations

After World War II, economic relations between the USSR and Turkey came to an end and were resumed only in 1953. In 1954 and 1955 Turkey's imports from the USSR grew to $11.7 million from nil in 1953, while the USSR's imports from Turkey in 1953 to 1955 amounted to $12.8 million.

These trade relations started with the USSR's participation in the International İzmir Trade Fair in 1954. When the USSR signaled its intention to participate in the fair in January 1954, it was allocated a modest stand in an out-of-the-way location. Nevertheless, the USSR indicated that it would participate again in 1955. At a time when strong anti-Communist and anti-Soviet policies were being pursued, the authorities ensured that these Soviet overtures received little press coverage in Turkey. Turkey basically used the Soviet efforts to increase trade exchanges as a leverage against the West.

After 1956 bilateral relations received a new boost. Early in April the president of the İzmir Chamber of Commerce and a group of industrialists from that city were invited to the USSR. The Turkish press, however, did not view the development of economic relations in a positive light. The offer of Soviet economic aid made in February was rebuffed by the journalist Hüseyin Cahit Yalçın in these terms: "We can accept no military or economic aid from Russia, since we are perfectly capable of assessing the true cost of such aid" ("Türkiye ve Rusya," Ulus, 26 March 1956). Other journalists dwelt on the political dimension of economic aid and, recalling the bitter experience of the Ottoman Public Debt, called for the rejection of Soviet aid offers in order to keep economic relations at a minimum level. These journalists failed to note, however, that Russia had no part in the Ottoman Public Debt. They also ignored the efforts being made at the time to obtain ever more U.S. aid and loans.

When the new Soviet ambassador, Nikita Ryzhov, arrived in Ankara in April 1957, he proposed that bilateral relations be restored to their 1920 state. In 1957 İş Bankası and Soviet enterprises signed an agreement for the transfer of technology within the framework of the building of a plate glass factory in Turkey. The USSR extended a threeyear loan of 3.4 million rubles at 2.5% interest and guaranteed to buy the factory's products for a period of three and a half years. Economic delegations were exchanged, and economic relations developed markedly. Because Turkey was suffering from an economic malaise, there was increasing support for more trade with the USSR. The press, however, remained ambivalent. While expressing admiration for the USSR's rapid economic growth, the press was skeptical about the effectiveness of Soviet aid to Third World countries. While the importance of Western aid was being underlined, trade with the Eastern Bloc was seen as unprofitable. These arguments were being made at a time when the Syrian crisis was at its height.

In 1950 the volume of trade between Turkey and the USSR was 1.2 million rubles. By 1958 this had increased more than fifteen-fold to 18.3 million rubles. The press kept on warning that Turkey should beware of increasing its trade with the USSR beyond the current level. According to the media, the USSR used its loans as a means for exerting political pressure. Excessive dependence on trade with the Soviet bloc was dangerous. It would also be diplomatically inconsistent for Ankara to accuse countries like Syria, Egypt, and Afghanistan of receiving foreign economic aid that did not serve peaceful ends if Turkey engaged in similar practices.

A similar reaction came from Bülent Ecevit (a CHP member of parliament), when he addressed five questions to the government on this subject. In his reply to these questions on 12 June 1958, foreign minister F.R. Zorlu stated that the latest loan agreement with the USSR had been signed on 24 January 1934. This was the protocol for an $8 million loan to finance the construction of the Kayseri textile mill and the Nazilli combine. No official delegation had gone to Moscow; nor would there be any Soviet experts stationed in Turkey. İş Bankası's agreement for the construction of a plate-glass factory with an annual capacity of 37,500 tons and Sümerbank's agreement to purchase textile machinery worth $1,018,525 were private contracts. The government could only intervene in these private transactions within the framework of Turkey's general trade policies. The basic principle that applied was reciprocity. Over the last three years, the USSR's share in Turkey's foreign trade had fluctuated between 1 and 2.5%.

In his reply, Zorlu tried to brush off Ecevit's criticism by claiming that the transactions were between firms and not states. But this was not altogether persuasive, because everyone knew that the Soviet firms were all government owned and controlled, while neither İş Bankası nor Sümerbank could act without the knowledge and approval of the government. Turkey's increased trade with the Eastern Bloc countries and the USSR was largely due to its shortage of convertible currency. This shortage forced Ankara to trade more with those countries that employed the barter system. Furthermore, increased trade with the USSR would enable Turkey to ask for more economic assistance from the U.S. So, for a variety of reasons, economic relations with the USSR grew considerably, especially after 1957.

It is noteworthy that economic relations were developing at a time when political relations were in a constant state of crisis. While Turkey was in the grip of virulent anti-Communist and anti-Soviet sentiments, the USSR was deeply concerned by the deployment of nuclear missiles close to its southern borders. But these factors were ignored by the USSR in its quest to break free from the consequences of the containment policy, while Turkey was motivated by sheer economic necessity. The development of relations was not confined to the economic field but also included cultural, artistic, and sports contacts. The twenty-year period when the two countries completely ignored one another had come to an end.

4. Menderes's Plan to Visit Moscow

Toward the end of the 1950s there was a thaw in relations between the two blocs, which also helped improve Turkish-USSR relations. Actually, this thaw was not particularly desirable from a Turkish point of view, because a reduction in tension weakened Turkey's hand when it sought American aid by advancing strategic reasons. But these developments were beyond Turkey's control, and Ankara was forced to make the necessary adjustments in its policies.

As usual, the first step came from the USSR. On 31 October 1959 Khrushchev declared in a speech that despite the missiles that threatened Soviet security Moscow would like to improve relations with Turkey. Unlike previous overtures, this one evoked a positive Turkish response. In 1959 the Turkish leadership had also started making positive statements aimed at improving relations. In a speech made on 28 February 1959, Zorlu declared somewhat vaguely that détente between the two blocs would enable Turkey, despite its bloc-oriented policies, to improve its relations with the USSR. This was followed by the speech made by president Celal Bayar at the inauguration of the new session of the Turkish Grand National Assembly on 1 November in which he supported the process of détente. The press was also beginning to dwell on the need for improved relations.

As a result of these developments, a delegation headed by minister of health Lütfi Kırdar went to Moscow in December. Before the departure of the delegation, minister of foreign affairs F. R. Zorlu hosted a dinner in honor of Ambassador Ryzhov on 26 November 1959. Although this function was merely a courtesy extended to the ambassador, it was significant because it constituted a first and came on the eve of President Eisenhower's visit to Ankara. Kırdar carried out his visit on 9 December, just a few days after having suffered a heart attack, and spent twelve days in the USSR.

This was the first ministerial-level visit to the USSR since 1939. Both Zorlu and the leader of the opposition, İnönü, made statements declaring that the Soviet administration was sincere in its efforts to improve relations and that the present leaders were trying to distance themselves from the errors committed by their predecessors. Zorlu added, however, that the new policies were the result of the rapprochement between the two blocs and concluded by declaring that "within its bloc, Turkey was neither in the forefront nor lagging behind. It was in full solidarity with the bloc, always ready to do its share to preserve peace" (TBMM Zabit Ceridesi, p. 502).

In 1960 mutual visits by the heads of government were on the agenda. On 11 April it was announced that Menderes's visit would take place on 15 July and that there would later be a return visit by Khrushchev. This would have been an important visit as a turning point in Turkish foreign policy and a new beginning in bilateral relations. At the preparatory talks before the visit, Turkey got the USSR to agree that it would continue to pursue policies consistent with its membership in NATO and CENTO (the Central Treaty Organization, the new name of the Baghdad Pact) in matters dealing with national security, political alliances, and disarmament, that the question of missiles would not be discussed, and that no negotiations would take place in connection with issues concerning CENTO members. The visit never took place, however, because of the military coup of 27 May 1960 in Turkey.

Some have claimed that this proposed visit was one of the causes of the coup. This argument is difficult to sustain. At the time, the U.S. and the other NATO members were in the course of developing their bilateral relations with the USSR. Before the decision regarding the visit, Zorlu had informed the U.S. ambassador. The coup was not caused by the prospective visit, but the visit was prevented by the coup. Especially in foreign policy matters, cause and effect should not be confused. It would take a further five years for an official visit to the USSR by a high-level Turkish delegation to occur.

Relations with the USA and NATO

I. RELATIONS DURING THE TRANSITION TO A MULTIPARTY SYSTEM

A. The Turkish Straits and the U.S. after the War

A fortnight before the Potsdam Conference convened on 17 July 1945, the U.S. State Department prepared a briefing paper for President Truman. In this paper, dated 29 June 1945, U.S. relations with Turkey were described in these terms: "Relations between Turkey and the USA from Admiral Bristol's time to the present have been peaceful and friendly. These relations have been based on the following principles. (1) The right of people to freely choose their political, economic, and social systems. (2) Equality of opportunity in commerce. (3) Freedom of the press to gather and publish information. (4) The preservation of American educational institutions operating in Turkey. (5) Protection of the rights of U.S. nationals" (Armaoğlu, p. 134).

These principles applying to Turkey were grounded on the basic objectives of U.S. foreign policy dating from the latter years of World War II. The first two principles reflected the basic tenets of capitalism. The third principle reflected political liberalism. The last two principles reflected imperialism, which strove to shape the postwar international order and sought to control world markets.

The State Department paper asserted that Turkey, despite its location in a region with diplomatic, economic, and military disputes, could escape the fate of becoming a Soviet satellite if it continued to receive British support. Turkey had to be kept free of Soviet influence to safeguard vital U.S. interests. The status of the Straits was at the top of the list of vital interests. The U.S. took a close interest in the future of the Straits even though it was not a party to the Montreux Convention. Prior to the Potsdam Conference, the U.S. Department of the Navy had submitted a report to President Truman, which outlined U.S. policies with reference to the Straits. "In peacetime, the Turkish Straits must remain open to the merchant vessels of all states as well as to the warships of Black Sea littoral states. In a war involving a Black Sea state, the warships of nonlittoral states should not have access to the Straits. No state other than Turkey should possess fortifications in the Dardanelles. If Turkey is at war or faced with imminent threat of war, it should be free to make whatever arrangements it deems fit in the Straits" (Armaoğlu, pp. 137–39).

On the eve of Potsdam, the priority for the U.S. was to prevent the Straits and the Black Sea from coming under Soviet control. The territorial claims against Turkey contained in the Soviet note of 19 March 1945 and reiterated at the Molotov-Sarper meeting of 7 June 1945 were not a source of additional concern to Washington. Truman told Stalin at Potsdam that the question of Turkey giving up territory was "a matter that had to be settled between Turks and Russians" but added that "the question of the Straits was of concern to the U.S. and the whole world" (Foreign Relations of the United States, p. 302).

When the question of the Straits came up for discussion at Potsdam, Truman reflected the U.S. position outlined above. At the conference, he signed, along with Stalin and the newly elected British prime minister Clement Attlee, a protocol that provided for the revision of the Montreux Convention to conform to the changed postwar conditions. The U.S., Britain, and the USSR were to communicate to Turkey their views on the envisaged revisions. The contents of this protocol, however, were not reflected in the final document of the Potsdam Conference.

This protocol was giving the U.S. the right, for the first time, to take a position on the subject of the Turkish Straits. Truman and Stalin had agreed on the need to revise the regime established at Montreux, but nothing had been said about the nature of the revision. At Potsdam, Truman held that the Straits should be given the status of an international waterway. As the Balkans came under increasing Soviet domination, however, he would abandon this position and call for the maintenance of Turkish sovereignty over the Straits.

Turkey was closely following the proceedings at Potsdam in connection with the Straits. When the U.S. and the USSR reached agreement on revising the Montreux Convention without specifying how this was to be done, Ankara submitted notes to Washington and London on 20 August 1945, calling for American guarantees to ensure freedom of navigation and peace in the Straits. Ankara wanted the arrangements in the Straits not to encroach on Turkey's sovereignty. It also wanted to see steps to block Soviet demands.

This was a clear indication that Ankara had greater trust in London and Washington than in Moscow, that it perceived Soviet claims as a threat, and that it sought, for the first time, Western backing to block these claims.

American ambassador Edwin Wilson submitted a note on 2 November 1945 to foreign minister Hasan Saka in which U.S.

views regarding revisions to the Montreux Convention were spelled out. The U.S. wanted to see freedom of navigation for all merchant vessels even in time of war, freedom of navigation for the warships of Black Sea littoral states even in time of war, and no access to the Black Sea of nonlittoral states in time of peace unless authorized by the United Nations. Ankara was much relieved to see that these views did not constrain Turkey's sovereignty.

As the Soviet demands on Turkey became more insistent in 1946 and after the establishment, at Soviet instigation, of the Autonomous Republic of Azerbaijan and the Kurdish Republic of Mahabad in Iran, the U.S. resolve to give full backing to Turkey on the question of the Straits grew perceptibly. After Potsdam, the divergence of interests between the U.S. and the USSR became more obvious. Washington began to perceive the Soviet moves against Turkey and Iran as part of an overall Soviet strategy of gradually taking over Western Europe. With its intervention in Iran's internal affairs and its threats against Turkey, the USSR was, from Washington's point of view, carrying out its plans to trample on U.S. interests all over the world.

Soviet postwar policies had brought Turkey's relations with the USSR to the breaking point. This led the U.S. to perceive Turkey as a country that was ripe for being drawn into the Western Bloc that was being formed at the time. The method for carrying this out was by fomenting anti-Soviet sentiments in Turkey. As part of this policy, the American and British press dealt frequently with Soviet territorial demands to make sure that Ankara did not overcome the initial shock caused by these demands. By keeping the issue alive, tension in Turkey was maintained at a high pitch. Anti-Soviet feelings in Turkey reached their climat when the premises of the leftist newspaper Tan were sacked.

It was in these circumstances that the U.S. took a step of great symbolic significance to draw Turkey into the Western fold.

The Visit of the Missouri and Turkish-American Rapprochement

The opportunity to demonstrate to Ankara the importance that the U.S. was attributing to Turkey after World War II came in March 1946. The body of the Turkish ambassador in Washington, who had died sixteen months earlier, was sent to Turkey on board the famous battleship Missouri. The Missouri sailed up the Dardanelles and anchored off the Palace of Dolmabahçe in İstanbul on 5 April 1946. With this grand gesture, the U.S. conveyed the message to the USSR that the status of the Turkish Straits could not be revised without its consent.

In his speech on the occasion of Army Day, which coincided with the day when the Missouri cast anchor in İstanbul, President Truman stressed the great economic and strategic importance of the Middle East and the Straits for the U.S. He also went on to declare that none of the countries of the region had the means to resist an armed attack. Truman's speech underlined America's readiness to come to the assistance of these countries in case of need.

Following the visit of the Missouri, the U.S. concluded an agreement with Turkey on 7 May 1946 by which all of Turkey's debts arising from the Lend and Lease Law were canceled. This debt relief helped Turkey to cope with its postwar economic difficulties and made a major contribution to Turkish-American relations. During this period the U.S. was providing similar relief to its other European allies.

The U.S.-Soviet Rivalry over the Straits

Despite the direct and indirect support provided by the U.S. to Turkey, the USSR continued to press for changes in the regime of the Straits. As noted earlier, the USSR delivered notes to Turkey, the U.S., and Britain on 7 August 1946 containing the following demands: (1) the Straits shall remain open to all merchant vessels at all times; (2) the Straits shall remain open to the warships of littoral states at all times; (3) with the exception of special circumstances, the Straits shall remain closed to the warships of nonlittoral states; (4) the regime of the Straits shall be determined exclusively by Turkey and the other littoral states; (5) the defense of the Straits shall be the joint responsibility of Turkey and the USSR (Ulman 1961, pp. 77–78).

The Soviet note was delivered on the last date provided by the Montreux Convention for giving notice to review the convention. In this way Moscow was signaling its intention to revise the convention through an international conference rather than through bilateral negotiations with Turkey.

The Soviet note caused concern in Washington. The State Department was of the view that the note's main intent was to bring Turkey under Soviet influence rather than to revise the regime of the Straits. The first three Soviet points might be acceptable, but the last two points were clearly non-negotiable. Although Truman had been indifferent to the Soviet territorial demands on Turkey at Potsdam, he now shared the State Department's views. The wartime alliance with the USSR was at an end. If Greece and Turkey came under Soviet control, this would upset the balance in the Mediterranean and the Middle East and endanger transport routes and the delivery of oil.

In this context, Washington delivered a note to Moscow on 19 August 1946. In reference to point 4 of the Soviet note, it declared that the proposal that the regime of the Straits be established exclusively by the littoral states was unacceptable. Washington also opposed point 5, dealing with the joint defense of the Straits by Turkey and the USSR. Finally, the U.S. note stated, "the Soviet note makes no reference to the United Nations. However, the United States Government wants to see the regime of the Straits linked to the UN in one form or another and made to conform with the principles and purposes of the UN Charter" (Armaoğlu, pp. 148–49).

Ankara was reassured by the U.S. response to the Soviet note. As we have seen, the note delivered to Moscow on 22 August 1946 declared that the first three points could be negotiated but that the fourth and fifth points would not be considered under any circumstances.

On 24 September 1946 the USSR delivered a further note to Ankara in which it reiterated its demands that the Straits regime be formulated by the littoral states and their defense be undertaken jointly by Turkey and the USSR. Turkey rejected the Soviet demands in its note of 18 November 1946 and kept the U.S. and Britain informed about the correspondence.

When the USSR reiterated its demands, the U.S. delivered a note to Moscow on 9 October 1946 in which it recalled: "At Potsdam, a Protocol had been signed by the U.S., the USSR, and Britain intending to revise the Montreux Convention to make the regime of the Straits conform to the changed circumstances and that agreement in principle had been reached for each of the three countries to engage in direct negotiations with Turkey." In its note, the U.S. criticized the Soviet notes of 7 August and 24 September, which deliberately ignored the terms of the Potsdam Protocol by confining the determination of the regime of the Straits to Turkey and the other littoral states and thereby excluding the U.S. and Britain. The U.S. note went on to stress that the revision of the Montreux Convention could only take place through consultations with Turkey by all of the interested parties, including the U.S. The note also warned the USSR that the Security Council would take immediate action in the event of an attack on the Straits (Armaoğlu, pp. 150-51). It was not realistic to try to scare the USSR with the Security Council, however, given the possession of the veto power by the permanent members under the terms of the charter. Moscow just ignored the threat.

The U.S. position vis-à-vis the USSR with regard to the Straits was not designed to protect Turkey. In these early years of the Cold War, the U.S. was intent on protecting its national interests against the USSR all over the globe. Until the proclamation of the Truman Doctrine, Ankara always felt that it was on its own when confronting Moscow (Box 4-3).

Box 4-3. The Doctrines of U.S. Presidents

In this context "doctrine" denotes the principles that guide foreign policy in a specific field. In the area of foreign policy, a doctrine not only binds the country that adopts it but also affects the countries to which the doctrine applies. Throughout its history, the U.S. has adopted a number of doctrines named after presidents to guide its foreign policy. Some of these doctrines were regional, while others were global so they had profound effects on the foreign policies of other countries. The most important among them are listed below in chronological order.

George Washington's Farewell Speech (1796): during the War of Independence and immediately thereafter, Americans were able to observe the negative impact on their country of the disputes among European states. In his farewell speech in 1796, the first president, George Washington, drew attention to this: "The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible" (http://www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/washing.htm). He specifically warned of the dangers to the U.S. of alliances with European states.

The Monroe Doctrine (1823): U.S. policy-makers complied with Washington's testament; but Spain, France, and Britain, with colonies in the new world, were eager to establish relations with the U.S. As the countries of South and Central America started gaining their independence in the early part of the nineteenth century, European intervention in the affairs of South American countries intensified. President James Monroe sent a message to the U.S. Congress on 2 December 1823 in which he stressed that the U.S. would not allow the European powers to colonize states of the Western Hemisphere. He declared that, while the U.S. had no Intention to Interfere in European affairs, the Europeans had no right to interfere in the affairs of the Americas, These principles, known as the Monroe Doctrine, usually kept the activities of the U.S. within the Western Hemisphere for about 100 years. Furthermore, the doctrine allowed the U.S. to carry out its imperialist expansion unhindered within the hemisphere from which Europe had been excluded.

The Truman Doctrine (1947): this anti-Soviet doctrine, spelled out by president Harry Truman on 12 March 1947, can be considered the precursor of the Cold War.

The Eisenhower Doctrine (1957): proclaimed by president Dwight Eisenhower on 5 January 1957, this doctrine symbolized the confrontation of the U.S. and the USSR in Cold War conditions in the Middle East.

The Guam Doctrine (1969); president Richard Nixon proclaimed this doctrine, which applied to Asia but was later developed and extended to cover the whole globe. The U.S. would continue to assume responsibility for deterring a nuclear war. But it was the responsibility of the regional countries to deter regional wars that threatened their security. The U.S. would be prepared to provide limited assistance to the regional countries, but they themselves were responsible for their defense.

The Carter Doctrine (1980): this was a response to the 1979 invasion of Afghanistan by the USSR. In his State of the Union message in 1980, president Jimmy Carter declared that an attack in the Persian Gulf region would be considered to be an attack directed at U.S. vital interests. This was the first time since the Vietnam War that a U.S. president had indicated that Washington was prepared to use force to defend its vital interests. The U.S. military umbrella was being extended to cover the Gulf region.

The Reagan Doctrine (1985): president Ronald Reagan declared in an address in 1985 that the U.S. would support anti-Communist counterrevolutions and uprisings. He gave the following reasons for providing such support: (1) the revolutions would be fighting tyranny; (2) if not helped, the country in question could come under Soviet control; (3) coming to the defense of freedom was a well-established American tradition. The Reagan Doctrine was implemented in Afghanistan, Angola, Cambodía, and Nicaragua.

B. The Truman Doctrine

The U.S. opposition to the USSR's demands in connection with the Straits occurred at a time when the two powers were in close cooperation with one another. Consequently, Ankara stood alone in its resistance to Moscow's demands. The cordial relations established during the war between the U.S. and the USSR began to fray early in 1947, and this is when the U.S. started to make its presence felt. The spreading fear of the "red menace" in America led to a reversal of the perceptions of the U.S. public and of its leadership in regard to the Soviet Union. The main indication of this important change in perception was in President Truman's speech to the U.S. Congress on 12 March 1947, when he declared for the first time that the world was on the threshold of becoming divided into two opposing ideological camps.

Truman asserted that the gravity of the situation made it necessary for him to address a joint session of the Congress. In this historic address, he enunciated the principle that came to be known as the "Truman Doctrine." He stated that he had received an urgent appeal from the Greek government for financial and economic assistance and added that the American Economic Mission and American Embassy in Greece had reported that such assistance was essential for Greece to remain a free country. Most of Truman's speech dealt with the devastation suffered by Greece during World War II and the damage done to Greece and to the Western world by the Greek civil war. He went on to declare that a few thousand armed men led by the Communists threatened Greece's existence, that the Greek government was unable to cope with this situation, that the Greek army was small and weak, and that Greece needed help for it to remain a selfsufficient and self-respecting democracy.

After dealing with Greece, Truman turned to Turkey:

Greece's neighbor, Turkey, also deserves our attention.

The future of Turkey as an independent and economically sound state is clearly no less important to the freedom-loving peoples of the world than the future of Greece. The circumstances in which Turkey finds itself today are considerably different from those of Greece. Turkey has been spared the disasters that have beset Greece. And during the war, the United States and Great Britain furnished Turkey with material aid.

Nevertheless, Turkey now needs our support.

Since the war Turkey has sought financial assistance from Great Britain and the United States for the purpose of effecting that modernization necessary for the maintenance of its national integrity.

That integrity is essential to the preservation of order in the Middle East.

The British government has informed us that, owing to its own difficulties, it can no longer extend financial or economic aid to Turkey.

As in the case of Greece, if Turkey is to have the assistance it needs, the United States must supply it. We are the only country able to provide that help.

With these arguments, Truman sought to persuade the U.S. Congress that Turkey must be supported (Armaoğlu, pp. 152–57).

After stressing the importance of Greece and Turkey to the Western world, Truman submitted three requests to Congress:

- 1. To appropriate a sum of $400 million for the period ending on 30 June 1948, to assist Greece and Turkey. Of this sum, Greece's share would not exceed $350 million.
- 2. To authorize the use of American civilian and military personnel stationed in Greece and Turkey upon the request of these countries to assist in reconstruction, to supervise the utilization of the financial and material aid to be furnished, and to train local personnel.
- To authorize the arrangements necessary to deliver the required materials in the quickest and most effective manner.

After making these requests, Truman reminded Congress that the U.S. had spent $341 billion to win World War II, that this had been an investment for the world's freedom and for peace, and that the amount now being requested was slightly more than one-thousandth of this sum.

The free peoples of the world look to us for support in maintaining their freedoms.

If we falter in our leadership, we may endanger the peace of the world—and we shall surely endanger the welfare of our own nation.

Great responsibilities have been placed upon us by the swift movement of events.

I am confident that the Congress will face these responsibilities squarely.

President Truman's speech placed aid to Greece and Turkey firmly on the agenda of the U.S. Congress. It also marked the end of the honeymoon between the U.S. and the Soviet Union.

The Background and the Objectives of the Doctrine

As one of the victors in World War II, the U.S. was pursuing the objective of restoring Europe's former political and economic influence. According to Harry Truman, his country had three basic goals in the postwar period: to ensure Europe's military, economic, and political stability; to bring the continent under the protection of America's nuclear shield; and to restore European power to ensure a worldwide defense capability under U.S. leadership. To achieve these goals, the U.S. started the preparations for launching the Marshall Plan.

As efforts were being made to restructure Western Europe, a civil war was raging in Greece and Turkey was confronted with threatening Soviet demands. Developments in these two countries would have serious implications for the attainment of U.S. objectives in Western Europe. Owing to its economic difficulties, Britain announced that it would have to end (as of March 1947) its substantial military and economic assistance program to Greece. At this juncture Britain delivered notes to the U.S. State Department, stressing the importance of Greece and Turkey for the defense of the West and requesting that the U.S. replace Britain in providing aid to these countries.

Truman felt that Greece had to be rescued from its difficult situation as a matter of urgency, because communism was becoming a growing menace to Western Europe. Yugoslavia was tilting to communism. After 1946 the Communists became an important factor in Italian politics. In fact, after the election of 1946, they were in a position to share power with the Christian Democrats. In France, the first cabinet of the Fourth Republic had five Communist members.

The growing strength of the Communists led to fears in the U.S. that a large part of Europe would come under Soviet influence. Unless communism was checked in Greece, this menace could well engulf the rest of Europe, where circumstances were favorable for its spread.

Turkey was included in the Truman Doctrine for different reasons. Turkey was located in a region that controlled the land, sea, and air routes linking Europe, Asia, and Africa. If the USSR managed to gain control of Turkey and the Straits, it would gain access to the oil-rich Middle East through Iraq and Iran and gain mastery of the trade routes linking three continents. By supporting Turkey, the U.S. would be fending off this danger.

The architects of U.S. foreign policy were trying to achieve two objectives through the Truman Doctrine. The short-term objective was to strengthen Greece and Turkey militarily and economically against communism, while the long-term objective was to check Soviet expansion wherever necessary and thereby help spread the American political and economic tenets of liberalism and capitalism (Spanier, pp. 40–44).

The Enactment of the Doctrine, the Nature of the Aid, and Its Conditions

President Truman wanted to see the doctrine enacted quickly in the Congress in order to allow aid to Greece and Turkey to flow to these countries without any delay. The debate in Congress did not proceed very smoothly, however.

A number of legislators felt that the Truman Doctrine was a deviation from traditional U.S. foreign policy and were adamantly opposed to its enactment. In their view, the U.S. was inheriting Britain's role in the Middle East and was being saddled with the defense of Greece and Turkey with no tangible benefit to American interests.

Other legislators claimed that Greece and Turkey had autocratic regimes and that the proposed aid would only serve to strengthen these regimes. They were also against American funds flowing to foreigners so soon after the war.

Some members of Congress considered aid to Greece justified but tried to prevent Turkey from benefiting. They argued that Turkey had not fought in the war and did not suffer the devastation brought on by combat on its territory. Furthermore, Turkey's gold and foreign exchange reserves amounted to $245 million, so there was no justification for providing it with aid. Some legislators recalled the sad experiences of the Armenians and called for withholding aid from Turkey.

Congress added a provision calling for freedom of the press in order to provide the necessary transparency to determine whether the aid was being used properly.

After the congressional debate, it was foreseen that Greece would receive $300 million in aid, while Turkey would get $100 million. Congress also decided that American military and civilian personnel would be stationed in both countries to supervise the use of the aid, while Greek and Turkish personnel would be trained in the U.S.

Congress also decided that the equipment provided under the aid program could not be sold, donated, leased, or transferred to another country without obtaining the consent of the U.S. government. Senator Arthur Vandenberg added a provision stipulating that the aid would end in the event of a request to this effect by the UN Security Council or General Assembly, if Greece or Turkey decided that it wanted to forgo the aid, or if the U.S. president made such a request.

The Truman Doctrine became effective on 22 May 1947 when President Truman signed the Act to Provide Aid to Greece and Turkey.

The Reception of the Truman Doctrine in Turkey

The Turkish public welcomed the Truman Doctrine. Many expressed their satisfaction at seeing that the U.S. was now abandoning isolationism and getting ready to support the free world not just with words but also with deeds.

The Turkish press was full of news and commentary on the benefits that the doctrine would provide. Those who considered that an attack on Turkey would amount to an attack on the U.S. were writing about the end of the Soviet threat. According to some, Turkey would now become the forward bastion of the civilized world. With the implementation of the doctrine, the survival of the multiparty system established in 1946 in Turkey was no longer in doubt.

Some wrote that the U.S. could not be seen as having imperialistic ambitions, because it was not seeking bases from Turkey in return for its aid. Others noted uncomfortable similarities to the system established to manage Ottoman Public Debt, because the U.S. would supervise the use of the aid. These voices were easily drowned out, however, in the euphoria of that day (Ülman 1961, p. 101).

On 23 May 1947, just one day after the enactment of the Truman Doctrine, an American delegation of experts headed by Gen. Lunsford Oliver arrived in Ankara. The delegation was composed of representatives of the State Department as well as the War Department and Navy Department. The members of the Oliver Delegation remained in Ankara for six weeks and, in contacts with Turkish officials, indicated in which fields the aid should be utilized. According to the Americans, Turkey should demobilize some of the men in its defense establishment, modernize its weaponry, and employ the $100 million available for this purpose. If this advice was heeded, the members of the delegation believed that Turkey would be in a good position to defend itself in the coming years.

Turkey had a good number of reasons for accepting the Truman Doctrine and American aid. The chief reason was that, confronted with insistent Soviet demands, Turkey felt anxious and was overcome by a feeling of being utterly isolated. The Turkish leadership was convinced that Stalin's encroachment on Turkey could only be blocked through cordial relations with the Western world and in particular the U.S.

A second reason had to do with Turkey's economic circumstances. Although Turkey had been spared the ravages of war, its economy was going through a difficult period. It was true that Turkey's gold and foreign exchange reserves stood at $245 million, but Ankara wanted to keep the reserve as a hedge against the Soviet threat rather than spending it. The bourgeoisie had enriched itself through the black market during the war, while those on a fixed income had seen their earnings shrink through inflation. The military mobilization had deprived industry and agriculture of skilled manpower. The pent-up demand for imported products unavailable during the war years caused havoc in the balance of payments after the war. There was an acute need for funds to carry out the development plans. At the end of 1945 a request for a $300 million loan was submitted to the U.S., but the U.S. Export-Import Bank made only $50 million available in October 1946.

A third reason was that, while the armies engaged in World War II had employed all the latest military technology, the Turkish army consisted mostly of infantry and cavalry units equipped with obsolete weapons. The U.S. had provided $95 million worth of military equipment during the war, but this supply was cut off when the war came to an end. It was therefore essential not to miss this opportunity to restructure and reequip the armed forces through American aid.

The Agreement of 12 July 1947

After the consultations held by the Oliver Delegation in Ankara, Turkey signed the Agreement on Aid to Turkey on 12 July 1947. This would allow Turkey to benefit from the Truman Doctrine (Armaoğlu, pp. 162–64).

Article 2 of the agreement specified:

[T]he [U.S.] Chief of Diplomatic Mission will determine, in consultation with representatives of the Government of Turkey, the terms and conditions upon which specified assistance shall from time to time be furnished under this agreement, except that the financial terms upon which specified assistance shall be furnished shall be determined from time to time in advance by agreement of the two governments. The Chief of Mission will furnish the Government of Turkey such information and technical assistance as may be appropriate to help in achieving the objectives of the assistance furnished under this agreement.

The second paragraph of article 2 stated that this assistance could not be used for purposes not indicated in the agreement and that the use of the assistance would be under the control of U.S. personnel: "The Government of Turkey will make use of the assistance furnished for the purposes for which it has been accorded. In order to permit the Chief of Mission to fulfill freely his function in the exercise of his responsibilities, it will furnish him as well as his representatives every facility and every assistance which he may request in the way of reports, information, and observation concerning the utilization and progress of assistance furnished."

The purpose of the assistance as described in the preamble was to "enable Turkey to strengthen the security forces which Turkey requires for the protection of her freedom and independence... and to maintain the stability of her economy."

The agreement made provisions for transparency of the assistance program, which had been insisted upon in the congressional debate on aid to Greece and Turkey. Article 3 stipulated:

[T]the [parties] will cooperate in assuring the peoples of the United States and Turkey full information concerning the assistance furnished... To this end, insofar as may be consistent with the security of the two countries: (1) representatives of the press and radio of the United States will be permitted to observe freely and to report fully regarding the utilization of such assistance; and (2) the Government of Turkey will give full and continuous publicity within Turkey as to the purpose, source, character, scope, amounts, and progress of such assistance.

Turkey undertook to provide full information to the members of the U.S. media, but the same provision had not been made for the Turkish media.

Article 4 of the 12 July 1947 Agreement was important because it was at the root of the problems that led to the cooling of relations between the two countries, especially after 1960. The problems arose from differences in the interpretation of this provision of the article: "the Government of Turkey will not transfer, without the consent of the government of the United States, title to or possession of any such article or information, nor permit...the use of any such article or the use or disclosure of any such information by or to anyone not an officer, employee, or agent of the Government of Turkey or for any purpose other than that for which the article or information is furnished."

As stipulated in the introduction, the articles and information were furnished to protect Turkey's freedom and independence and to maintain its economic stability, so U.S. assistance could only be utilized within those limitations. Consequently, Turkey could not use the arms received from the U.S. for any purpose other than to repel an attack on its territory. This was not considered controversial at the time when the agreement was signed. The U.S. referred to this article when the question of Turkey's military intervention in Cyprus came up, however, and prevented the use of American arms during the intended intervention in June 1964 (see "The Question of Cyprus and the Johnson Letter" in Section 5).

The arrangement stipulated by article 4 was not confined to the military equipment in the amount of $100 million provided within the terms of the Truman Doctrine. All military assistance furnished after 1947 would also come within the terms of this provision; as a result, Turkey was dependent on the U.S. not just in the area of defense but in the area of foreign policy as well.

The Utilization of the Aid

At first, the assistance was furnished under a separate program. In 1948 Congress brought aid to Greece and Turkey within the general Foreign Aid Act. This gave the aid provided under the Truman Doctrine a permanent character. With the passing of the Mutual Defense Act on 6 October 1949, the aid began to be furnished within this framework. Economic assistance came under the management of the Economic Cooperation Administration.

There are differing views about whether the $100 million worth of assistance foreseen in the Truman Doctrine was provided in full. According to some sources, the Americans made cuts in the assistance actually provided to Greece and Turkey, with Turkey getting only $69 million worth of materials and equipment (Sander 1979, p. 23).

From 1947 to 1949 Turkey received American assistance amounting to $152.5 million, including the military equipment delivered within the framework of the Truman Doctrine. Of this sum, $147.5 million was used for modernizing the army, air force, and navy, while $5 million was used for highway construction. The U.S. felt that in the event of a Soviet attack the invaders would be contained at a line along the Taurus mountain range, so it was important to have a proper route from Iskenderun to the mountain range.

The level of U.S. military aid to Turkey during the period from 1947 to 1951 reached $400 million.

Although much of the equipment supplied to Turkey consisted of surplus World War II supplies, this equipment had been produced in the latter years of the war and was more modern than anything in Turkey's arsenal. To cite one example, an operation known as Project 500 was implemented in April 1948. Under this project, Turkey was furnished from the inventory of the U.S. Air Force 241 P-47 fighter aircraft, 32 A-26 light attack bombers, 100 AT-6 and 67 AT-11 advanced trainers, and 50 C-47 cargo planes (USAF Operations, p. 16). As some of these aircraft are still in use, it can be said that the Truman Doctrine made a major contribution to the development of Turkey's armed forces. But (as explained below) the cost of maintaining and repairing this equipment restricted Turkey's economic and therefore its political independence.

The Consequences of the Truman Doctrine

From the perspective of U.S. foreign policy: the Truman Doctrine signaled the end of the cooperation established in World War II between Uncle Sam and Uncle Joe, as Stalin was popularly known in the U.S. It also accelerated the propaganda campaign claiming that it was the spread of communism under the leadership of the USSR that prevented Western-style political and economic liberalism (capitalism) from prevailing throughout the globe.

The main actors of the Cold War (Box 4-4) got involved in an escalating confrontation, using ideological principles as weapons. The two universal systems of capitalism and communism were transformed into mutually exclusive antagonists. Both sides started to perceive the

Box 4-4. The Concept of the Cold War and Its Chronology

The term "Cold War" denotes the hostile relations and the ideological conflict between the U.S. and the USSR in the aftermath of World War II. This period was characterized not by overt military action but by economic pressure, propaganda, and a continuous arms race. The beginning of the Cold War is usually considered to be, along with the Truman Doctrine, Churchill's speech in 1946 warning about the establishment of an "iron curtain" in Europe, while the end came with the destruction of the Berlin Wall in 1989 or the disintegration of the USSR in 1991. Nuclear weapons played a crucial role in the Cold War.

- 12 May 1945: Churchill's telegram to U.S. president Harry Truman ("I am profoundly concerned about the European situation... An Iron curtain is drawn down upon their front. We do not know what is going on behind").
- July 1945: the Potsdam Conference, marking the end of the wartime alliance and Europe's division into two camps.
- 12 March 1947: enactment of the Truman Doctrine.
- July 1947: publication of George F. Kennan's article in the jury journal Foreign Affairs advocating the policy of containing the USSR.
  - 1947: Integration of the British, French, and U.S. sectors of Berlin and introduction of a common currency.
  - 122 June 1948–12 May 1949: the Berlin blockade
  - 4 April 1949: signing of the North Atlantic Treaty, establishing the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).
  - 29 August 1949: nuclear bomb tested by the USSR.
  - October 1949: accession to power of the Communists in China
  - 25 June 1950: start of the war in Korea.
  - 1954: establishment of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO).
  - February 1955: establishment of the Baghdad Pact
  - May 1955: admittance of West Germany to NATO,
  - May 1955: establishment of the Warsaw Pact.
  - 1956: 20th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and adoption of the principle of "peaceful coexistence".
  - 1956: beginning of de-Stalinization in the USSR.
  - 1956: the Hungarian revolt and its repression by the USSR.
- 5 January 1957: proclamation of the Eisenhower Doctrine.
- 1957: launching of Sputnik by the USSR.
- May 1960: shooting down of a U-2 spy plane over the USSR:

- 1961: construction of the Berlin Wall between the eastern and western sectors.
- October 1962: the Cuban missile crisis.
- 7 February 1965: direct involvement of the U.S. in the Vietnam War.
- 1968: suppression of the Czechoslovak uprising in line with the Brezhnev Doctrine.
- 1969 to 1979: SALT I and SALT II negotiations between the U.S. and the USSR.
- 1972: signing of the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) agreement.
- 1973: U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam
- 1973: beginning of Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions (MBFR) negotiations in Vienna.
- 1975: the Helsinki Final Act.
- 1979: the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.
- 1980; the Carter Doctrine.
- 1980 to 1981: the Soviet intervention in Poland.
- 1981: acceleration of U.S. rearmament and deployment of U.S.-made Pershing II and Cruise missiles by NATO members.
- 1982 to 1983: Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START) negotiations between the U.S. and the USSR.
- 23 March 1983: launching of Reagan's Strategic Defense Initiative (Star Wars).
- 1985: Mikhail Gorbachev elected secretary-general of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.
- 1987: Intermediate Nuclear Forces (INF) Agreement
- 1988: MBFR talks replaced by Conventional Forces In Europe (CFF) negotiations.
- June 1989: free elections in Poland.
- November 1989: the fall of the Berlin Wall.
- October 1990: East and West Germany formally united.
- November 1990: the Treaty on CFE.
- 21 November 1990: the Charter of Paris
- July 1991: the end of the Warsaw Pact.
- 17 September 1991: recognition of the independence of the Baltic States by the USSR.
- 16 December 1991: Gorbachev's announcement of the dissolution of the USSR and its replacement by the Commonwealth of Independent States.

globe as an arena for conducting their ideological struggle by whatever means were available. A country was either in the Soviet camp or in the U.S. camp.

The successful implementation of the Truman Doctrine allowed the notion to take root in the U.S. that Communist aggression could only be checked by a resolute and solid economic and military buildup. Thus the Truman Doctrine became the precursor of the Marshall Plan as well as the military pacts like NATO, the Baghdad Pact, and SEATO as well as the Marshall Plan.

From the perspective of Turkish foreign policy: the doctrine led to fundamental changes in foreign policy.

The Turkish leadership saw the doctrine as a factor contributing to cordial relations between Turkey and the U.S. and helping Turkey in defying Soviet demands. In the face of Soviet policies in the Middle East, and under the influence of Britain, Turkey started pursuing policies that were totally pro-West and above all pro-U.S.

The equipment received by the Turkish army within the U.S. aid program required maintenance and spare parts, which could only be procured from the U.S. This quickly gave rise to serious problems. To maintain and procure spare parts for $100 million (TL 280 million) worth of war surplus equipment provided as a grant required an annual outlay of $143 million (TL 400 million) from the budget (OTDP, p. 220). These expenses rapidly exhausted Turkey's postwar foreign exchange reserves. As Turkey's imports from the U.S. increased, the foreign exchange shortage kept getting worse and Turkey's balance of payments got hopelessly out of line. The Truman Doctrine had made Turkey militarily and economically dependent on foreign sources.

The military and economic dependency led Ankara to shift from some of its traditional foreign policy positions toward American objectives. The most striking example of this was the stance taken in connection with the question of Palestine. For years Turkey had been supporting the Arab countries in the search for a solution to this question. Now Turkey recognized Israel ten months after its creation, becoming the first Muslim country to do so. When Turkey allowed Turkish Jews to migrate to Israel, it contributed to the increase of Israel's population. This led to the deterioration of Turkey's relations with the Arab states.

Turkey turned its face completely to the West. It refused to participate in the Congress of Asian States held in 1949 on the grounds that it was not Asian but European. Turkey harmonized its foreign policy with Western policies. This became more pronounced after the nonaligned movement emerged at the Bandung Conference in 1955.

From the perspective of Turkish domestic policy: the rapprochement between Turkey and the U.S. resulting from the Truman Doctrine also affected Turkey's internal politics. The Turkish public got acquainted with American-style democracy. The Turkish leaders knew only the single-party system practiced in Turkey and were, in general, familiar with European-style administrations. It was too much to expect them to be influenced by the radically different American practices. Nevertheless, it was possible to detect American influences here and there.

In July 1947 İsmet İnönü declared that the president of the Republic must be impartial and gave up the leadership of the CHP.

Radical changes were made in the military establishment, and the army was brought fully under government control. In June 1949 the TGNA put all national defense agencies, including the General Staff, under the control of the Ministry of Defense. This was in large measure due to the American aid agreement, which stipulated that the responsibility for military matters would be concentrated in one government agency.

In the interest of good relations with the U.S., increasing extralegal pressure was brought to bear on those who dissented from the official ideology or who displayed leftist leanings. University professors, including Behice Boran, Pertev Naili Boratav, Muzaffer Şerif Başoğlu (later known as Muzafer Sherif in the U.S.), and Niyazi Berkes, were fired or forced to resign. Many journalists and students found themselves under arrest. Those newspapers and magazines considered to be propagating the "red threat" were closed down.

Turkish society was going through a major transformation during the period that started with the implementation of the Truman Doctrine. As entrepreneurs like Vehbi Koç undertook the marketing of American products, including refrigerators and automobiles, these items flooded the market. People considered it a privilege to possess American products, with refrigerators placed in living rooms and even guestrooms. Crowds flocked to see American films, and children became familiar with American cartoon characters. The American way of life, which spread all over the world, also came to Turkey, then barely at the threshold of the industrial revolution. The Marshall Plan, following the Truman Doctrine, accelerated this process of rapid change. Turkey witnessed the ascendancy of the American style in politics, in the economy, and throughout society in general.

C. The Marshall Plan The Background of the Plan

According to many American decision-makers, the ravages brought on by World War II and the resulting chaos in Europe led to the rise of communism and Soviet influence. Europe had to be strengthened physically and morally to contain Soviet expansion. If Europe could stand on its own feet economically, European nations would be able to preserve their political independence. At this point the U.S. wanted to bring Britain, West Germany, and France, as well as the rest of Europe, into a system of political and economic cooperation and thereby create an integrated Europe that would arrest the Soviet advance. A Europe deprived of its ability to consume had a depressing effect on America's production and its economy. To create a market for U.S. goods, Europe's economy had to be made to function again.

At the end of the war, the American leadership believed that Europe's rehabilitation could be achieved through bilateral loans, IMF-led stabilization programs, and reconstruction plans financed by the UN and the World Bank. But the persistent economic instability made it necessary to devise a more comprehensive program. The well-known American pundit Walter Lippmann wrote that if Europe's difficulties could not be overcome, this could quickly lead to worldwide chaos. What Europe needed was a plan leading to greater economic integration, a plan no less bold than the Lend and Lease Law. According to Lippmann, European countries should be helped not individually but collectively. This would accelerate economic integration and facilitate reconstruction. All of the nations had to become involved in a single overall restoration plan.

The U.S. would be the main beneficiary of Europe's reconstruction. Deputy secretary of state Dean Acheson expressed this idea in the following terms:

There is a strong link between production in the United States and production abroad. It is in America's interest to help countries facing economic difficulties. The U.S. cannot enjoy long-term peace and prosperity without a stable world with economically self-sufficient countries. The problem that requires an urgent solution is to close the gap between U.S. exports amounting to $16 billion and imports amounting to only $8 billion. America must urgently increase its imports and help Europe to raise its production so as to raise the income level of Europeans. (Council on Foreign Relations, p. 57)

In his speech at Harvard University on 5 June 1947, U.S. secretary of state George Marshall outlined a plan that would be known as the Marshall Plan. After briefly describing Europe's condition, he explained that America was ready to engage itself in a common reconstruction effort with European nations. Marshall invited all European countries, including the USSR, to get involved in this plan. He said: "It is logical that the United States should do whatever it is able to do to assist in the return of normal economic health in the world, without which there can be no political stability and no assured peace. Our policy is directed not against any country or doctrine but against hunger, poverty, desperation, and chaos" (http://www.usaid.gov/multimedia/video/marshall/marshallspeech.html).

Marshall's proposal had three salient features. Unlike the Truman Doctrine, the emphasis was on economic rehabilitation. The new policy would be directed against hunger, poverty, and chaos. There was no reference to military aid. Another feature was that the plan was not at a national level but at a regional level, embracing all of Europe. Instead of dealing with countries on an individual basis, as in the case of Greece and Turkey, the U.S. was now shifting its policy. The third feature was that governments, political parties, or groups that attempted to hinder this initiative would have to contend with the U.S. This was a clear warning addressed to the USSR and the Communist parties of Western Europe.

Britain and France were quick to welcome the plan. They were followed by the other Western European countries. The USSR's reaction was quite different. The newspaper Pravda argued that the plan was a follow-up to the Truman Doctrine and that "dollar aid would be employed to ensnare Europe." Nevertheless, the Soviet foreign minister, V. M. Molotov, met with his British and French colleagues, Ernest Bevin and Georges Bidault, in Paris on 27 June 1948 to discuss the feasibility of the plan. Molotov felt that the plan would bring Europe under U.S. control. Although he did not directly oppose the plan, he advanced conditions that Britain and France were not prepared to accept. With the failure of the tripartite talks, Britain and France convened a meeting in Paris to which all European countries, including those with pro-Soviet regimes but excluding Spain, were invited. The meeting was to discuss the details of the plan and prepare a European Recovery Plan that the U.S. wanted. The USSR and the most of the Eastern European states did not participate in this preparatory meeting.

On 12 July 1947 a meeting was held at the Quai d'Orsay in Paris with the participation of the representatives of Austria, Denmark, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Sweden Switzerland, Turkey, Britain, and France. In conformity with U.S. wishes, the participants established the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC) in order to help determine and meet Europe's urgent requirements (Mee, p. 142).

Turkey and the Marshall Plan

At the Paris meeting, Turkey's representative declared that in order to implement the development plan that had been interrupted by the war Ankara would need $615 million in aid. This was duly reflected in the meeting's final report.

The report was examined by U.S. experts, who concluded that, since the Marshall Plan was designed to restore the economies of countries devastated by the war, Turkey need not be a beneficiary of the contemplated aid. Turkey's foreign exchange and gold reserves, as well as its balance of trade, were in a much healthier condition than those of the other fifteen European nations. Furthermore, Turkey had indicated that it wanted the aid to implement its own development plan rather than participating in a common European effort. Finally, a country report prepared by experts and subsequently submitted to Congress by the State Department had assigned Turkey the role of provider of raw materials to European countries. Consequently, in the short term, Turkey could be supplied only with manufactured products to help maintain its present economic level. The result was that, for the first fifteen months of the program, Turkey would be provided with $58.9 million in aid to procure equipment, electrical implements, trucks, petroleum products, and timber for the benefit of its agricultural and mining sectors (Üstün, p. 35).

The approach of U.S. consultants led to great disappointment among the Turkish public: if the U.S. could abandon Turkey economically in this way, it might also do so politically. Under the pressure of public opinion, the government of Turkey appealed directly to the U.S. government and requested that Turkey be fully included in the Marshall Plan. In doing so, Turkey drew attention to the link between economic conditions and political and military stability. The U.S. Embassy in Ankara also reported to Washington that, because of its economic condition, Turkey was eligible to be among the aid recipients (Ülman 1961, p. 118).

For Turkey to be included among the aid recipients, the U.S. wanted to see changes made in the Turkish development plan that would bring it into line with the spirit of the Marshall Plan. The aid to be provided had to be used to raise farm production, modernize agricultural equipment, and refurbish the national transportation infrastructure. By revising its development plan in this direction, Turkey would become a supplier and storehouse of food and raw materials for the countries taking part in the European Recovery Program. In the field of industry, priority would be given to the extraction of minerals, notably chromium, needed for U.S. defense purposes. When Turkey stated that it would comply with these requests, the U.S. agreed to include Turkey as a beneficiary of the Marshall Plan.

The Europeans had requested $22 billion in aid, but U.S. consultants pared this down to $17 billion. The Economic Cooperation Act was passed by Congress and signed by President Truman on 3 April 1948.

To supervise the disbursement and utilization of the aid, the U.S. set up the Economic Cooperation Administration (ECA). No aid could be provided or utilized without the approval of this agency. The ECA was not a government agency but an independent entity that carried out its responsibilities as a private-sector organization. It maintained close links with private-sector groups through its consultative committees. The ECA was structured in this fashion to allow American companies to penetrate European markets and to eliminate obstacles preventing the formation of a single European market.

Across the Atlantic, the Europeans signed a cooperation agreement and established the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC). In 1960 this organization would be transformed into the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), in which the public and private sectors would work together to regulate national monetary and fiscal policies and strive to promote European stability and integration.

Unlike the Truman Doctrine, Turkey's share in the Marshall Plan was minimal. Turkey was expected to provide the agricultural and mineral products necessary for Europe's reconstruction, and the aid funds were to be utilized to this end.

In the summer of 1947 the American economist Max Weston Thornburg came to Turkey and prepared a report on behalf of the American Twentieth Century Fund. In this report, he indicated what was being requested from Turkey in return for what would be provided under the Marshall Plan. Thornburg wanted Turkey to go for full-scale privatization (this would be on the agenda again in the 1990s), even including the sale of the Karabük Iron and Steelworks (Athanassopoulou, p. 70).

Turkey's modest share in the Marshall Plan and the demands imposed upon it gave rise to disappointment in Turkey. The government was seeking long-term loans and grants. Economic development was high on the agenda at a time when the country was going through the transition from a single-party system to a multiparty system of governance. There was a pressing need for foreign aid for this to happen smoothly.

With the signing of the Economic Cooperation Agreement by Turkey and the U.S. on 4 July 1948, Turkey started receiving aid under the Marshall Plan (Armaoğlu, pp. 168–80). The preamble of the agreement read as follows: "The preservation of the principle of individual freedom, free institutions, and genuine independence in Europe depends in large measure on creating sound economic conditions and establishing stable international economic relations." It was also stated that the agreement was based on the European Economic Cooperation Convention signed by Turkey on 16 April 1948.

Article 1 of the agreement described the manner in which the funds would be disbursed. "The U.S. Government agrees to help the Turkish Republic by providing aid, upon the request of the government of the Republic of Turkey and the approval of the U.S. Government, to the Government of the Republic of Turkey or to a person, institution, or organization designated by that government." With the agreement, the U.S. wanted Turkey to ensure that the aid was used in a manner consistent with the objectives of the plan, to facilitate the OEEC's monitoring of the manner in which the aid was being utilized, to control competition between public and private commercial enterprises, and to take measures to prevent restrictions on access to markets or actions designed to encourage monopolies.

As in the case of the 12 July 1947 agreement, this agreement also contained provisions in article 7 declaring that Turkey and the U.S. agreed that it was in their mutual interest to give wide publicity to the objectives of the aid and to its accomplishments and that Turkey would take all practical measures to ensure such publicity.

Article 8 provided that Turkey would accept a U.S. Economic Cooperation Mission to supervise the implementation of the agreement. It would be treated as a part of the U.S. Embassy and would enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities. By the terms of the agreements, the manner in which the funds and the aid in kind coming from the U.S. would be utilized would conform to the advice of American consultants.

The agreement of 4 July 1948 was not well received by the Turkish public. Many intellectuals, representing all shades of political opinion, complained that the agreement was reminiscent of the capitulations of the Ottoman era and constituted an abject submission to the U.S.

Mehmet Ali Aybar, a socialist leader who was to become the leader of the Turkish Labor Party in the 1960s, wrote that the U.S. was bent on turning Turkey into a colony. The right-wing newspaper Yeni Sabah voiced similar misgivings.

The Utilization of the Aid and Its Consequences

From 1948 to 1952 Turkey received aid amounting to $352 million under the Marshall Plan. Of this sum, $175 million was tied aid, meaning procurement had to be from the U.S. The direct aid consisted of $84 million in loans, $73 million in grants, and $17 million in conditional aid. The remainder, amounting to $177 million, was indirect aid, which meant it could be used for procurement from OEEC countries. Turkey was allocated 3.6% of the funds available under the Marshall Plan. During the same period, Turkey received $687 million in military aid (Üstün, pp. 48–52).

In line with the advice of American consultants, 60% of the aid funds were spent to develop the agricultural sector. By 1953 Turkey had become a major producer, and for the first time an exporter, of wheat. As agricultural implements and equipment were being imported, there was increasing dependency on imported spare parts. A similar situation already existed in connection with military equipment obtained as aid. This meant that, in the long term, many of the aid funds ended up in the U.S.

Nevertheless, Marshall Plan aid did contribute to the development of Turkish agriculture. With the help of favorable weather conditions, much progress was registered between 1950 and 1954. This allowed the ruling Democratic Party to undertake much development work, even though it was done without proper planning. The American pleas to draw up development plans went unheeded. The Democratic Party enjoyed the support of the rural masses but gradually lost the support of the urban intelligentsia, which wanted to return to the planned statism of the Atatürk and İnönü periods, when policies of industrialization were being pursued.

The U.S. wanted to see the aid funds used also for developing the road network. This resulted in the abandonment of the railway construction effort undertaken in the early years of the Republic. Thousands of kilometers of highways linking all parts of the country were built, and broad avenues were constructed in major cities. On the initiative of American consultants, the Highway Department was established in 1949. As road transport grew, automobiles and other road vehicles began to be imported in growing numbers, leading to a rise in petroleum consumption.

It must not be assumed that all of the investments were carried out with Marshall Plan funds. Turkey's resources were also employed for investments in areas that were selected by American officials. In the 1949 budget, a total of TL 525 million was allocated for investments. Of this sum, TL 225 million was set aside for highway construction, TL 125 million for the construction of ports, and a mere TL 28 million for the manufacturing industry (OTDP, pp. 447–52).

To sum up, Turkey received less aid under the Marshall Plan than expected. Americans determined the areas where the aid money would be spent and decided what the objectives of Turkish economic policies would be. As a result, like the aid provided under Truman Doctrine, the Marshall Plan was instrumental in early 1950s in paving the way to render Turkey generally dependent on the outside world.

II. THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY PERIOD—I (1950–1955)

A. The Road Leading to NATO Membership Reasons for Turkey's Interest in NATO

Turkey was closely interested in NATO, the alliance set up in 1949 at the initiative of the U.S. (Box 4-5), for a number of reasons. First, the country was still reeling from the shock of the Soviet demands made in 1945. Turkey had established close cooperation with the U.S. thanks to the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan, but this did not mitigate the concern over the demands coming from its large northern neighbor. There was a fear of being left isolated in the world because of the excessively realistic policies that the Turkish governments had to follow during World War II. Turkey was anxious to remedy this situation by joining the security arrangement set up by the countries of Western Europe and North America. This would allow for the effective defense of Turkish territory and help in modernizing the army.

Second, Turkish leaders were also convinced that by joining NATO Turkey would maintain the pro-Western foreign policy that had been pursued since the establishment of the Republic. As a founding member of the Council of Europe in 1949, Turkey felt that it had the right to be admitted to NATO membership.

Third, Ankara felt that the economic aid it was receiving might be cut if Turkey did not join the alliance. As a member of NATO, Turkey wanted to preserve its aid levels and participate in future aid programs.

Finally, the Turkish public also felt that it was in the nation's interest to join NATO. Some Turkish intellectuals argued that in order to succeed in completing the process of building up the multiparty system launched in 1946 Turkey should join the other democratic nations of Europe in NATO. (Similar arguments were advanced in the 1990s in connection with joining the European Union.) Many worried that, if left outside of NATO, Turkey might veer away from democracy. As the main objectives of the Kemalist revolution were being achieved, the younger generation was no longer content with just nationalism. The liberal Western tradition and the associated prosperity had a special attraction for this generation. For economic and political liberalism to be properly assimilated, Turkey had to be represented in all of the institutions of the West. The "American way of life" was having its effect on Turkish society.

Efforts to Secure Membership during the CHP Period

Turkey welcomed the signing of the Treaty of Brussels in 1948. The government was convinced that such a treaty was essential for Europe's defense and expected an early invitation for Turkey to join the new arrangement. The invitation never came, however, and the government's hopes were dashed.

When news started circulating that this alliance would be strengthened by the participation of the U.S. and Canada, Ankara used every opportunity to declare its eagerness to join the group. Prime minister Hasan Saka

Box 4-5. The Establishment of NATO and Its Expansion

At the time when the U.S. and the USSR were contending for supremacy after World War II, Britain, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg signed the Treaty of Brussels on 17 March 1948. The signing of the Western Union Defense Organization followed in September 1948. This was a military organization to ensure the defense of Western Europe against the Soviet Union. But Europe had not yet healed the scars left by war, and without U.S. participation its defense organization lacked credibility.

In line with the Monroe Doctrine, the U.S. had stayed clear of entangling alliances for a whole century. But the circumstances of the Cold War forced the U.S. to abandon its traditional foreign policy. In consultation with the State Department, senator Arthur Vandenberg presented a bill that provided for the U.S., in case of an armed attack, to exercise (in conformity with article 51 of the UN Charter) its inherent right of individual or collective self-defense and thereby contribute to peace. The U.S. Senate approved this bill on 11 June 1948. Any obstacle to American participation in a defense pact involving European countries was thus removed. After this, the signatories of the Treaty of Brussels met in Washington with the representatives of the U.S., Canada, Italy, Denmark, Norway, Portugal, and Iceland and signed the North Atlantic Treaty on 4 April 1949. It went into effect on 24 August 1949.

Turkey and Greece joined on 18 February 1952, the Federal Republic of Germany on 23 October 1954, and Spain on 30 May 1982 (Spain only joined the civilian structure of the organization). This raised the number of members to sixteen.

When France left the military structure on 1 July 1966, NATO headquarters was moved from Paris to Brussels. On 14 August 1974 Greece left the military structure, only to return on 20 October 1980.

At the end of the Cold War, the Czech Republic, Hungary, and Poland joined the alliance on 12 March 1999. This raised the NATO membership to nineteen. In 2004 Bulgaria, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Romania, Slovakia, and Slovenia joined NATO.

(C. ERHAN)

wanted to turn the cooperation between Turkey and the U.S. into a tangible military alliance. On June 1948 he declared: "Turkey is not just any ally, but a very special ally of the United States" (Ayın Tarihi [June 1948]).

As the preparatory meetings of the North Atlantic Treaty took place, Turkey kept repeating its wish to be included in the proceedings. At the meeting of the OEEC in February 1949, foreign minister Necmettin Sadak proposed that, if Turkey did not join the Atlantic Pact, a Mediterranean Pact that would include Turkey, Greece, Italy, France, and Britain should be established.

Despite all these efforts, Turkey was not allowed to join NATO, leading to much dissatisfaction in the country. On 11 May 1950, when the rule of the CHP was draw-

Box 4-6. The Korean War

During World War II, the Korean Peninsula remained under Japanese occupation. After the war, the U.S. and the USSR drew an arbitrary line along the 38th parallel and agreed that those Japanese forces in the peninsula north of the line would surrender to the USSR and those located in the south to the U.S. The negotiations between the U.S. and the USSR over the political future of the Korean Peninsula remained deadlocked. Eventually a socialist state was established in the Soviet-occupied zone, while a capitalist state took over in the U.S. occupied zone.

There were now two antagonistic states in the peninsula: the Korean Democratic Republic (North Korea) and the Republic of Korea (South Korea). On 25 June 1950 war broke out between these two states.

As soon as the war broke out, the U.S. called for an emergency meeting of the UN Security Council. In its resolution, the Security Council appealed to member states to support the measures being taken by the UN to halt the North Koreans. At this point the Soviet Union, which had the right of veto, was boycotting the meetings in protest against the representation of China by Talpeh instead of Peking. Consequently, it was possible for the Security Council to adopt this resolution.

On 27 June U.S. forces became engaged in South Korea. Fifteen countries heeded the UN's appeal and also sent troops to Korea. After the U.S., Turkey sent an infantry brigade, which arrived in Korea on 17 October.

At this time, the UN forces under the command of Gen.

Douglas MacArthur had inflicted a heavy defeat on the North Korean army. After taking 125,000 prisoners, U.S. forces were advancing to the north of the 38th parallel. At this point the People's Republic of China declared that it considered the presence of UN forces in North Korea to be unacceptable. On 25 November 1950 a Chinese army of 180,000 men Joined the war on the side of the North Koreans. The battles that were fought in the region of Kunuri on 26–30 November 1950 were among the bloodiest of the war. The Turkish brigade had been given the task of ensuring the orderly withdrawal of the U.S. forces and suffered heavy losses at Kunuri.

After this confrontation between Chinese and UN forces, the possibility that the USSR might also get involved in the war became real. This led to the signing of a cease-fire on 27 July 1953, which ended the fighting. The cease-fire line (roughly corresponding to the 38th parallel) became the border between the two states, and the prisoners of war were exchanged.

The Korean War was the first armed conflict of the Cold War. The Turkish brigade remained in Korea after the signing of the truce, and the Turkish government continued to cover the salaries and allowances of its military personnel, amounting to $100,000 a year. After 27 May 1960 the unit was reduced to a symbolic squad. This squad stayed in Korea until 1971, when it was finally repatriated.

ing to a close, Turkey once again applied to join NATO but failed to gain admission. The Democratic Party government would make the subsequent applications.

The Korean War and Turkey's Decision to Send Troops

In June 1950 Turkey was closely following the events taking place in Korea (Box 4-6). When the UN Security Council adopted a resolution calling on members to help South Korea to defend itself, the Cabinet held a meeting in Yalova, where prime minister Adnan Menderes was vacationing. The meeting was attended by president Celal Bayar; the Speaker of the TGNA, Refik Koraltan; and the chief of the General Staff, Nuri Yamut. After that meeting, it was announced on 25 July 1950 that Turkey would send 4,500 troops to Korea. The decision was made without reference to the opposition and without the approval of the TGNA. On 26 July the opposition CHP issued a statement claiming that the decision was a clear violation of the Constitution. This claim was well founded, because article 26 of the 1924 Constitution declared that "the Grand National Assembly shall be responsible for concluding treaties, making peace, declaring war." The government denied that its decision violated the Constitution, declaring that the Constitution did indeed give the responsibility for declaring war to the TGNA but did not indicate what constituted a declaration of war. The government's decision involved sending troops but was not a declaration of war. Hence the Constitution had not been breached.

Despite the stand taken by the opposition, the government did not rescind its decision. Menderes and his colleagues felt that "sending troops to Korea along with the other countries of the free world" constituted an opportunity to gain NATO membership, which must not be missed. On 1 August 1950, within a week of the decision to send troops, the government made its second application to join NATO. This application was turned down at the NATO Ministerial Council held in September. The U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff had prepared a report stating that the membership of Greece and Turkey in NATO would have an adverse impact on the development of the organization, which decisively influenced the NATO Council's decision. The report recommended that, instead of seeking NATO membership, Greece and Turkey should pursue their joint efforts to establish a Mediterranean Pact. Turkey was cool to the idea, because it wanted a treaty with binding clauses (Sever, pp. 66-69).

In the meantime the war in Korea raged on, with the participation of Turkish units. The opposition decided to drop its arguments about the unconstitutionality of sending troops and aligned itself with the government in supporting the war effort. A resolution was adopted in the TGNA on 27 December 1950 in which the ruling DP and the opposition CHP jointly expressed the solidarity of the Turkish parliament with the troops on combat duty in Korea.

In his statement of 25 October 1951, the leader of the CHP, Ismet Inönü, affirmed that "in the area of foreign policy, there are no differences of opinion or principle in our country. We remain attached to our alliance, to the ideals of the UN, and to our friendship with the United States" (Cumhuriyet, 26 October 1951, p. 4). His previous objection to the sending of troops had been fully retracted.

The decision to send troops was well received by the public. Immediately after the decision, the Student Union of İstanbul University organized a meeting with the representatives of the DP, the CHP, and the Party of the Nation at which they backed the government's decision and denounced communism. This backing continued throughout the war. Barraged with government propaganda, the Turks began to view the war in the Far East as if it was in the defense of Turkey itself. This atmosphere was used by the DP as an opportunity to legitimize the decision to send troops.

The attitude of leftist groups to the decision was totally negative. The Peace Association established on 14 July 1950 distributed tracts condemning the decision and was closed down for this on 28 July. Seventeen magazines located in Istanbul, Ankara, and Izmir were closed down for supporting communism when they published articles and caricatures critical of the decision.

In the first phase, Turkey sent 4,500 men to Korea. Among the fifteen countries with troops in Korea, Turkey had the largest contingent after the U.S. The brigade was commanded by Col. Tahsin Yazıcı and was incorporated within the American 25th Division. The size of the Turkish contingent subsequently rose to 6,000 men. At the Kunuri battle of 26–30 November, the Turkish brigade stood its ground against the Chinese forces despite heavy losses and allowed the American 8th Brigade to retreat in an orderly manner without getting mauled. By the time of the cease-fire (signed on 27 July 1953), 721 Turkish soldiers had been killed in action; 672 had been wounded and repatriated; 1,475 wounded men were receiving treatment in Korea; 175 men were missing; and 234 had been taken prisoner (see Sezgin).

Aside from the constitutionality of dispatching troops to Korea, an exceptional aspect of this action is also important. Throughout the history of the Turkish Republic, Ankara had never gotten involved in a military operation beyond the borders fixed in the National Pact. This was an intervention in a region thousands of kilometers away. With the Korean War, the TGNA started questioning the government's foreign policy, something that had never happened before. The war also had a profound effect on Turkish society.

The Proposed Mediterranean Pact

After Turkey's second application for membership in NATO, the U.S. proposed that Turkey and Greece take part in a Mediterranean Pact. This proposal bore some resemblance to the idea of a Middle East Command, which Britain had been advocating for a number of years. It was expected that the pact would include Britain, Italy, Greece, Egypt, and Turkey. This would bring members of NATO and nonmembers with similar orientations together in a pact that would ensure the security of the eastern Mediterranean.

Turkey did not consider the idea of the Mediterranean Pact to be very feasible. First, it would be impossible to accommodate Egypt and Britain in the same pact. Second, the Arab states were far from being agreed among themselves on such issues, and it was obvious that Egypt would not join such a pact all by itself. Third, as long as a state of war existed between Israel and the Arab states, it was not possible to set up a defensive pact in the eastern Mediterranean.

Despite its doubts and misgivings, Turkey had not rejected the idea of a Mediterranean Pact altogether. The Turkish government regarded this as a stepping stone to NATO membership. When the U.S. Department of State sent a note to the Turkish Embassy on 19 September proposing that Turkey join in the defense planning of the Mediterranean region, Turkey agreed to the proposal on 21 October. The chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, Omar Bradley, wrote an article in the Reader's Digest entitled "U.S. Military Policy in the 1950s," however, in which he claimed that from the perspective of American interests Turkey had no significance for the U.S. As a result, the Turkish leaders realized that Turkey had no alternative to NATO membership (Athanassopoulou, pp. 156–60).

Turkey in NATO

On 15 May 1951 the U.S. proposed to its allies that Turkey and Greece be admitted to NATO. The shift in U.S. position had nothing to do with Turkey's insistent pursuit of NATO membership. The real cause was the apprehension felt by the U.S. over the changing conditions of the world.

The USSR had announced in 1949 that it possessed atomic weapons. The National Security Council's report No. 68, prepared in April 1950 at the behest of President Truman, warned that "by 1954 the USSR's stocks of atomic bombs and delivery systems would reach levels that could inflict fatal damage to the United States." This meant that the U.S. nuclear monopoly and its ability to deter had come to an end. To respond instantaneously to a Soviet nuclear attack, it was necessary to have air bases in countries located close to the USSR. The U.S. had already sought bases for this purpose from Turkey but had been told that the request could not be granted before NATO membership.

The Korean War was perceived as part of a Communist campaign for world domination. There was the danger that an expansionist move might be made in Europe similar to the one undertaken in the Far East. It was clear that Turkey would be the most likely next victim. A Soviet occupation of Turkey would pose a threat to NATO's future as well as Europe's security.

The developments taking place in Yugoslavia were another reason why the U.S. sought NATO membership for Turkey and Greece. After Yugoslavia's expulsion from the Cominform, it had become a prime Soviet target. The best way to protect Yugoslavia and southern Europe was to reinforce NATO's southern flank through Turkish and Greek membership. NATO's supreme commander, General Eisenhower, held the view that the alliance could wield more influence in the Balkans if these two countries became members. Turkey's proximity to the increasingly important Middle Eastern oil fields also made it desirable for Turkey to be admitted to NATO.

Finally, the outstanding performance of the Turkish troops in the Korean War and the sacrifices they made to save American units from annihilation at the Battle of Kunuri made a great impression on Americans. Increasing numbers of Americans now felt that Turkey could not be left alone in the face of the Soviet threat.

The other members of NATO had differing views on the question of Turkish and Greek membership. France, Italy, Luxembourg, and the Netherlands shared the American view, while Britain held onto the view that Turkey should concentrate on the defense of the Middle East and act in conjunction with the British military establishment in the region. In Britain's view, Turkey and its powerful army could be used as a vehicle for preserving British interests in the Middle East. To this end, the commander of British forces in the Middle East, Gen. Bryan Robertson, paid an official visit to Turkey on 22–24 February 1951. He proposed that, instead of placing the Turkish army under the Mediterranean command within NATO, Britain and Turkey should form an alliance in the Middle East. The reaction of General Yamut, the Turkish chief of the General Staff, to the British proposal was positive. The government felt that before reaching an agreement with Britain, however, it would be advisable to consult the U.S. This undermined the British proposal, because the U.S. had already made up its mind that Turkey's place was not in a Middle East pact in partnership with Britain but in NATO as a full member. In effect, at a meeting of U.S. ambassadors in the Middle East held in Istanbul on 22 February 1951, the ambassadors recommended that the U.S. should urgently make mutual defense arrangements with Greece and Turkey (Athanassopoulou, pp. 204–5).

The Scandinavian members of the alliance, Norway and Denmark, were uneasy over the extension of NATO's area of responsibility in a way that might force them to go to war for the defense of the Mediterranean region where they had no particular interest. These countries also opposed Greek and Turkish membership on the grounds that NATO was more than a defense alliance and also had political, cultural, and social dimensions, bringing together countries holding similar values. Consequently, it would be wrong to include countries that did not share the traditions of Western Europe and the Atlantic region.

In the face of a common position adopted by the U.S., France, Italy, Luxembourg, and the Netherlands, Britain proposed that the new members be given a different status in the alliance. The founding members and the new members would have a status similar to the status of permanent and nonpermanent members of the UN Security Council. With strong Turkish opposition supported by the U.S., this proposal was rejected. Finally, Britain adopted a more flexible position on the issue of the new members.

At the NATO Ministerial Council meeting held on 16–20 September 1951, it was decided to invite Greece and Turkey to join the alliance. This brought up the issue of which command the new members would come under. Still hankering for the Mediterranean Pact, Britain proposed that Turkey come under a new Middle East Command, to be led by a British general. This command was to be responsible for the defense of the region, including Egypt. The idea of attaching Turkey and Greece to an Aegean or a Balkan Command was also floating around. At the suggestion of France, it was finally decided that the Turkish and Greek armies would fall under the jurisdiction of NATO's Allied Land Forces Southern Europe Command, while their navies would come under a new Middle East Command.

Despite this decision, Britain's Middle East Command initiative never got implemented. Egypt refused to cooperate, claiming that it would infringe on its sovereignty, while Turkey remained cool to an idea with an uncertain future that included areas outside of the Atlantic alliance.

Turkey and Greece were formally admitted to NATO on 18 February 1952.

B. American Military and Economic Aid America's Reasons for Providing Aid

In the bipolar world that came into being after World War II, the two superpowers, the U.S. and the USSR, started providing aid to countries in their respective camps or to countries they were actively courting. They did this to enhance their influence and effectiveness in world politics. The aid provided could be military, technical, financial, commercial, or social and was furnished through multilateral or bilateral channels.

Especially in the U.S., economists and social scientists were frequently drawing attention to the growing gap between the rich and the poor nations in the postwar period. American politicians were also concerned about the negative consequences of the unequal distribution of wealth in the world. If economic and social conditions were not rapidly improved in certain countries, the Marxist propaganda being disseminated by the USSR might have its intended effect: the lower strata of society might revolt and destroy the nascent bourgeoisie, as had happened in various parts of Europe in 1945. Such a movement could spread in waves throughout the world and bring about the dictatorship of the proletariat and the rejection of the values defended by the West and by the U.S.

To attain its political objectives and to stem the spread of Soviet ideology, the U.S. leadership decided to provide urgent economic aid to Turkey, Pakistan, Jordan, South Vietnam, South Korea, and Taiwan. The outbreak of the Korean War, however, caused the nature of the aid furnished to these countries to change from economic to military and political.

When the Korean War came to an end, military aid continued; but there was also growing economic aid. The U.S. was providing foreign aid amounting to 1% of its gross national product. People in the U.S. started questioning the aims of this aid. Would foreign aid actually help turn poor countries into friends of the West? Some American writers claimed that as poor countries raised their living standards with foreign aid they would strengthen their independence. This, in turn, would lead these countries to distance themselves from the pernicious effects of the Cold War. In the struggle between communism and the West, it was likely that these countries would turn their backs on the West. The policies pursued by Gamal Abdel Nasser in Egypt in the mid-1950s tended to reinforce American anxieties.

Another worry for the Americans was the extent to which the recipients of their aid were deserving. U.S. political, social, and business circles were not very knowledgeable about class struggle and social policy issues. The U.S. was established directly as a bourgeois democracy, and its inhabitants had no inkling of the struggles of their European cousins over basic ideological and economic issues. Although the founding of the U.S. has been described as a revolution, America had always been governed according to counterrevolutionary and conservative principles. In the circumstances of the time, the U.S. started providing aid to any country that described itself as anti-Communist, because the important thing was to prevent a Communist revolution. The U.S. was not much concerned about whether the aid recipient country's leaders were flouting democracy and Western values. The political and social upheavals that took place in the countries receiving aid during the 1960s were proof of the failure of America's poorly planned and misdirected aid policies.

The reasons for furnishing aid to Turkey: with the implementation of the Truman Doctrine, Turkey started receiving considerable amounts of American military and economic aid. This aid increased further with Turkey's membership in NATO. There were four basic reasons for giving aid to Turkey. The first consideration of the U.S. was to minimize the damage to NATO from a possible Soviet attack through Turkey. In the event of such an attack on a weak member of the alliance such as Turkey, the Soviet Union would achieve its objectives before outside help could be brought in. During the 1952 Lisbon meeting, NATO foreign ministers focused their attention on an ambitious plan designed to build up national conventional forces within a decade. A weak Turkey could not succeed in doing this. The U.S. wanted to strengthen and modernize the Turkish army so that it could carry out the task assigned by NATO. The military assistance would accelerate the army's modernization, while economic aid would help alleviate the bottlenecks appearing in the economy due to heavy defense outlays.

The second reason was the increasing number of U.S. bases being established in Turkey. The aid would be utilized for the defense of these bases. Turkey continued to have strategic value for NATO in the 1950s and 1960s. But the U.S. also wanted to use its military presence in Turkey for purposes not related to NATO, such as intervening in the Middle East to control political developments in the region. Military and economic aid was provided to assuage the possible negative Turkish reactions to such interventions.

The third reason for continued U.S. military and economic aid was to keep Turkey in NATO and prepare it for getting involved in American-inspired organizations such as the Baghdad Pact. The nonaligned movement, which got started in the mid-1950s, might also tempt Turkey. A nonaligned or neutral Turkey was highly undesirable from the point of view of pursuing U.S. interests in the region.

The fourth reason for the aid was that U.S. leaders felt that it was in their interest, as well as in NATO's interest, to have a politically and economically stable Turkey. The continued aid would create favorable economic conditions, which would ensure political stability.

Turkey's Reaction to the Aid

Turkish governments were frequently stressing the country's democratic and secular nature and its attachment to Western values, especially after World War II. After the coming to power of the Democratic Party, policies continued to be pursued to Westernize Turkey and to allow it to take its rightful place among Western nations. The Democratic Party's model of the West was the U.S. Prime Minister Menderes believed that to turn Turkey into "a little America" would mean achieving a contemporary standard of development. In these circumstances, the cultural, religious, and social differences between Turkish and American societies and their differing perceptions of democracy were being totally ignored.

The DP government welcomed American military and economic aid. It also expected this aid to grow as Turkey's foreign policy was increasingly harmonized with America's. While the U.S. failed to achieve its policy objective of creating an environment of intensive economic cooperation in the Middle East due to the nationalist backlash started by Mosaddeq in Iran and Nasser in Egypt, no such backlash occurred in Turkey.

After 1954 the Turkish economy started to falter as a consequence of haphazard economic policies brought about by overreliance on American aid. The balance of trade went into deficit, inflation rose, and the Turkish currency became unstable, forcing the government to seek urgent remedies. But instead of taking corrective measures to nurse the economy back to health, the government resorted to seeking more foreign aid to overcome the crisis. In March 1954 president Celal Bayar and in June prime minister Adnan Menderes went to the U.S. and pleaded for increased aid. The U.S. not only turned down Menderes's request for $300 million in supplementary aid but also called for the reduction of agricultural subsidies. By doing so, the U.S. was interfering directly in the conduct of Turkey's economic policy. (The IMF was to make a similar request for cuts in agricultural support prices in the 1990s.) At Turkey's insistence, the level of aid was increased for a while; but when that level started coming down in 1958, Turkey was plunged into a serious economic crisis.

The Volume of Aid and Its Utilization

From 1949 to 1953 Turkey received $225.1 million worth of American economic aid. Military aid amounted to $305.7 million during the same period. From 1954 to 1962 the volume of economic aid reached $867.5 million, while military aid rose to $1.55 billion.

The aid received under the Marshall Plan consisted mostly of loans, whereas the bulk of the aid after 1952 was furnished in the form of grants, because of Turkey's economic difficulties. At first, these grants were directed into investments in areas chosen by American consultants; but after 1954 they were used to pay for imports. After 1954 grants were no longer in the form of cash. From that year on, Washington started providing aid in kind, consisting mostly of surplus U.S. agricultural products.

Between 1952 and 1958 the loans provided carried interest ranging from 2.5 to 4% and repayment terms from thirty-five to forty years. By 1958 aid in the form of loans had practically disappeared, but it was resumed in 1963.

The annual volume of American aid, consisting of grants, loans, and other forms of aid, from U.S. calendar years 1948 to 1965 is shown in Table 4-4 (Oran, p. 79).

The American economic aid was directed into areas determined by the U.S., rather than to meeting Turkey's requirements. A large portion of the aid was used to import agricultural machinery and road-building equipment from the U.S. The number of tractors rose from 1,000 to 40,000 from 1940 to 1955. Land under the plow increased from 14,542,000 hectares in 1950 to 22,453,000 hectares in 1956. Turkey had to purchase the spare parts for the American equipment for cash from its manufacturers, so the U.S. was able to recover its aid money by this indirect method. This mechanism, employed during the Marshall Plan, continued to be used later. The funds thus recovered from the sale of machinery were used to provide military aid to Turkey. In this way, it became possible for the U.S. to provide both economic and military aid with a single appropriation.

The remainder of the money was used, on a limited scale, for investments. These investments included the development of the Meat and Fish Enterprise and the coke ovens at Karabük.

Privileges Granted to American Investors

The leaders of the Democratic Party were convinced that Turkey's economic recovery could only come about through new American economic aid. To secure this extra aid, it would be necessary to grant American businesses the opportunity to invest in Turkey.

Before the Democratic Party came to power, the CHP government had removed some of the obstacles to foreign investment and taken measures to facilitate the repatriation of profits. When the Democratic Party came to power, it passed a Law on Foreign Investments on 1 August 1951, further liberalizing the conditions for foreign investors. But the incentives provided by this law did not lead to the expected rise in foreign investments.

After this, the government enacted Law No. 6224 on 18 January 1954, entitled the Law for the Promotion of Foreign Investments. This law had been prepared to conform to the recommendations of American business leaders and economists. This law removed all restrictions on the repatriation of profits by foreign investors. Foreign investors also acquired all of the rights enjoyed by Turkish businesses. The terms of this law were so generous to foreign investors that the chairman of the U.S. Commission of Foreign Economic Policy, Clarence B. Randall, described it as the "most liberal law in the world" (Behramoğlu, p. 23).

The Law for the Promotion of Foreign Investments was followed by the Petroleum Law of 7 March 1954. As in the case of the previous law, this law too was prepared in cooperation with American experts, notably Max Ball, who had prepared Israel's petroleum law. Under the terms of this law, the profits from the extraction of oil in Turkey would be split 50-50 between the state and the foreign oil company.

These laws were not intended to benefit only American investors, but in practice many of those who took advantage of the legislation were Americans. Of the foreign investments made in Turkey from 1954 to 1965, 30.5% came from the U.S., 17.5% from Switzerland, and 17% from the Netherlands (Kongar, p. 349).

The main opposition party, the CHP, described these two laws as the "resurrection of the capitulations" and used that expression as the main theme of its 1954 election campaign. Confident that it had the support of the masses that brought it to power, the DP dismissed the criticism of the opposition and waited for the influx of foreign investments that never came. Despite these extraliberal laws, the economic instability after 1954 and political turmoil kept the level of foreign investments far below the set targets.

C. Turkish-American Bilateral Agreements Principal Bilateral Agreements

When the question of Turkey's admission to NATO was under discussion, Turkey and the U.S. concluded some important agreements (Box 4-7). Here we consider five of the principal bilateral agreements concluded during the first half of the DP's tenure of power, while those concluded after 1955 are dealt with below.

Mutual Security Agreement: this agreement was based on an exchange of letters dated 17 October 1951, at a time when Turkey had been invited to accede to NATO, and ratified by the TGNA on 10 March 1954. Although the English title of the agreement was Agreement between the USA and Turkey Regarding Mutual Security, the Turkish text submitted to the TGNA had the following title: Law for the Ratification of the Agreement dated 7 January 1952 Amending the Revised Economic Cooperation Agreement Concluded between the Government of the Republic of Turkey and the Government of the United States of America. This was done to facilitate the ratification procedure by not referring to the political and military aspects of the agreement (Armaoğlu, p. 184).

The agreement consisted of seven articles. In article 2, Turkey undertook to take appropriate measures to strengthen peace by promoting international understanding and goodwill; take action, in agreement with the U.S., for the purpose of eliminating the causes of international tension; carry out the military responsibilities emanating from agreements and treaties to which the U.S. was also a party, to the extent that its personnel resources, facilities, and general economic conditions allowed; take part as much as possible, consistent with its political and economic stability, in the development and preservation of its defense capability and the free world's defense capability; and take all reasonable measures to secure the effec-

Box 4-7. The Bilateral Agreements between Turkey and the United States

As Turkish-American relations developed, particularly in the military field, numerous military, economic, and technical cooperation agreements were concluded between the two countries. These agreements started becoming controversial among the Turkish public and their representatives in parliament in the mid-1950s and continued to be unpopular as anti-NATO and anti-American sentiments grew, until the beginning of the 1970s.

Even today neither the exact number of these agreements nor their contents are fully known in Turkey. Also, government officials have provided different information at different times. In April 1966 prime minister Süleyman Demirel declared that fifty-four bilateral agreements were concluded between 1952 and 1960. In 1970 the Turkish government officials stated that there were ninety-one such agreements. The disparity arose because most of the agreements were classified and were never submitted to the TGNA.

Based on the figures provided by Demirel in 1966, three agreements were concluded prior to 1950, thirty-one in the 1950s, and twenty from 1960 to 1965. Of these agreements, sixteen had been approved with a law, twelve were technical cartographic agreements, four were scientific cooperation agreements, and thirteen were related to the implementation of the 1954 Military Installations Agreement. The remainder had to do with U.S. ald and the status of installations. In making his statement Demirel insisted that there were no U.S. military bases in Turkey as claimed, only installations.

In their objection to the bilateral agreements, the opposition parties as well as the general public complained mainly that the constitutional formalities regarding the ratification of agreements with foreign countries had not been observed in most of these agreements. Article 26 of the 1924 Constitution, which was in force until 1960, declared that "it is the prerogative of the Turkish Grand National Assembly to carry out actions like concluding conventions and treaties or making peace with foreign states." According to this provision, the executive could negotiate and formulate the texts of agreements with the representatives of foreign states; but for these texts to have validity, they had to be approved by the TGNA. After 1925, however, governments were able to secure parliamentary approval for this authority to be delegated to the Council of Ministers in particular circumstances. One of these laws that delegated power was the Law on the Implementation and Revision of Article VII, Paragraph 3A (ii), and Article VIII of the Convention on the Status of Forces among the Parties to the North Atlantic Treaty. The government relied on this law to implement many of the Turkish-American bilateral agreements and also used it to respond to the opposition's objections.

In the 1961 Constitution, responsibility for the ratification of agreements was divided between the executive and the legislature. Article 65 provided that, for the president of the Republic to sign an agreement and bring it into force, the agreement had to obtain the approval of the TGNA.

Despite this provision, in line with past practice, laws were passed that allowed the Council of Ministers to conclude, approve, and promulgate certain agreements. Of these, the most important was the law dated 31 May 1963 entitled the "Law Conferring Responsibility for Concluding, Making Effective, and Promulgating International Treatles to the Council of Ministers." After 1963 this law was used to steer many bilateral agreements away from parliamentary approval. An application to declare this law unconstitutional was rejected by the Constitutional Court.

Whatever the constitutional provisions, governments were able to ratify certain agreements without going to the parliament. Some of these agreements drastically changed the traditional orientation of Turkey's domestic and foreign policy. The ratification of such agreements without the benefit of a parliamentary debate may have been in accordance with the letter of the law but was in conflict with political and democratic principles.

tive utilization of the economic and military aid furnished by the U.S.

Thus, even before it became a NATO member, Turkey had committed itself to support and if necessary assist U.S. military operations.

The agreement of 4 July 1948 contained provisions about the distribution of aid furnished to Turkey under the Marshall Plan. Article 4, 5, and 6 of the Mutual Security Agreement made references to this agreement and thereby secured the same facilities for military aid as had been foreseen for American products entering Turkey under the previous agreement regulating American economic aid (Armaoğlu, pp. 184–87).

NATO Status of Forces Agreement: the Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA) was signed by the NATO member states on 19 June 1951. When Turkey joined NATO, it too signed this agreement, on 25 August 1952, and the agreement was ratified by the TGNA on 20 March 1954.

With this agreement, Turkey accepted the establishment of U.S. military installations and bases and the stationing of U.S. troops on its territory. Some of the provisions of the agreement were ambiguous and open to interpretation, which would lead to many problems in connection with offenses committed by American military personnel in Turkey. These problems would create much resentment against the U.S. military presence in Turkey.

The most important article of the agreement was article 7, dealing with criminal jurisdiction (Armaoğlu, pp. 197–98). The article states:

[T]he military authorities of the sending State [the U.S.] shall have the right to exercise within the receiving State [Turkey] all criminal and disciplinary jurisdiction conferred on them by the law of the sending State over all persons subject to the military law of that State... The authorities of the receiving State shall have jurisdiction over the members of a force or civilian component and their dependents with respect to offenses committed within the territory of the receiving State and punishable by the law of that State... The military authorities of the sending State shall have the right to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over persons subject to the military law of that State with respect to offenses, including offenses relating to its security, punishable by the law of the sending State, but not by the law of the receiving State.

These provisions clearly delineated the scope of the jurisdictions of both Turkey and the U.S. In other words, if an offense was punishable by U.S. laws, the person would be tried by the U.S.; and if it was an offense under Turkish laws, the person would be tried by Turkey.

But there was much room for argument over provisions concerning the procedure to be followed in cases involving a conflict of jurisdictions, when the offense broke the laws of both states:

In cases where the right to exercise jurisdiction is concurrent, the following rules shall apply: The military authorities of the sending State shall have the primary right to exercise jurisdiction over a member of a force or of a civilian component in relation to offenses solely against the property or security of that State, or offenses solely against the person or property of another member of the force or civilian component of that State or of a dependent, or offenses arising out of any act or omission done in the performance of official duty. In the case of any other offense, the authorities of the receiving State shall have the primary right to exercise jurisdiction.

It was clear that Turkish courts could not claim jurisdiction in the case of an American who had committed an offense while carrying out official duties. Since the nature of the offense was not specified, this provision covered all offenses. Furthermore, there was no provision in the agreement specifying which party would decide on whether the accused person was carrying out official duties. The Turkish public had justified misgivings that these gaps might be misused.

A bilateral agreement was concluded on 28 July 1956 to eliminate this uncertainty: henceforth the U.S. commander in Turkey would be competent to decide whether the accused person was carrying out official duties. This rendered the problem more intractable. In conformity with this agreement, the Ministry of Justice sent a circular to local public prosecutors informing them that it would be the head of the Joint U.S. Military Mission of Aid to Turkey (JUSMMAT) who would decide whether the accused person was performing official duties. In this way, a foreign judiciary authority was being allowed to get involved with the trial of a person who had committed an offense on Turkish territory.

Agreement on Military Installations: after its accession to the NATO Status of Forces Agreement, Turkey concluded an agreement with the U.S. on U.S. military installations on its territory. The agreement was signed on 23 June 1954, based on the authorization given to the Council of Ministers by the TGNA on 27 August 1953. Because this newly signed agreement was considered to be in the category of agreements related to the implementation of an agreement already ratified by the TGNA, it was never submitted to the parliament for approval. The text of the agreement was kept classified until it was partially disclosed in 1970 by a member of the National Unity Committee (the junta that carried out the 27 May 1960 coup), Haydar Tunçkanat, in his book İkili Anlaşmaların İçyüzü (The Inside Story of the Bilateral Agreements) (Tunckanat, pp. 221-32).

Many technical agreements were concluded between Turkey and the U.S. based on this agreement, with the full title of Agreement between the United States of America and the Republic of Turkey Relative to the Implementation of the "Agreement between the Parties to the North Atlantic Treaty Regarding the Status of Their Forces." Among these were agreements relating to flight control, communications and electronics, warheads, and nuclear installations.

With the Military Installations Agreement, the U.S. army, air force, and navy obtained permission to use Turkish territory. Exactly where the military installation (described as a defense installation, base, or position) would be located was not specified. It was agreed that U.S. military aircraft could use Turkish military airfields, that (after obtaining Turkish government authorization) materials, equipment, fuel, and supplies could be stored in the bases to be established, and that the two countries would share the expenses of bases and installations to be used jointly.

A short time after the U.S. signed the Installations Agreement with Turkey, it also signed a similar agreement with Greece. By examining the provisions of the agreement with Greece, which were not classified, it is possible to get an idea of the content of the secret provisions of the agreement with Turkey. The U.S.-Greek Installations Agreement of 12 October 1953 provided that, for the purpose of carrying out NATO's objectives, the U.S. was authorized to use the roads and maritime nayigation routes in Greece, to establish and develop military installations, and to introduce its armed forces and its equipment into Greek territory. The military installations established by the U.S. would become the property of the U.S. government, and, when necessary, the movable equipment could be removed from the country. Permission was granted for the operation of the Army Post Office for the use of American military personnel.

Over the years more than ninety U.S. installations, both military and civilian, were established in Turkey under the Installations Agreement.

Tax Exemption Agreement: an agreement for exempting American personnel from taxes was signed on 24 June 1954 in conjunction with the Installations Agreement. The expenses incurred by Americans for mutual defense would be tax-free under the agreement. It was not clearly specified, however, which expenses and materials would not be included in the classification coming under mutual defense. Provision had been made in the agreement for both sides to take the necessary measures to prevent abuses in the duty-free import of personal belongings of military personnel. In the implementation of the agreement, the Turkish side showed great flexibility. No customs duties, transportation taxes, or other charges were levied on the personal belongings of U.S. military personnel. The electricity, city gas, fuels, postal and telephone services, alcoholic beverages, and cigarettes consumed in American installations were all obtained tax-free.

Like the Installations Agreement, the Tax Exemption Agreement was also considered an implementation agreement and therefore not submitted to the TGNA for ratification.

Atomic Energy Agreement: the Agreement for Cooperation in the Peaceful Use of Atomic Energy was signed on 10 June 1955 and ratified by the TGNA on 14 December 1956. This agreement stated that the U.S. would provide scientific aid for the establishment in Turkey of nuclear research centers for peaceful and humanitarian purposes. Article 2 stipulated that the enriched uranium to be provided by the U.S. would be on a loan basis. Article 9 declared that "the parties hoped and expected that the agreement would lead to further cooperation in the planning, construction, and operation of energy-producing reactors." This indicated that the research reactor to be established would be the first step toward the construction of energy-producing reactors in the future.

The Problems Arising from the Bilateral Agreements The preceding section contains the principal Turkish-American bilateral agreements concluded between the end of World War II and 1955. Other agreements were concluded later (discussed in other chapters below).

The Turkish-American bilateral agreements brought undeniable benefits to Turkey in the military and economic fields. But they also had contrary effects. One of these originated from the provisions of the 20 March 1954 NATO Agreement Regarding the Status of Forces (dealing with jurisdiction over foreign military personnel) and caused much popular discontent. One striking example will suffice to demonstrate why this was so.

In November 1959 Lt. Col. Allen L. Morrison, stationed in Adana, was driving his private car while drunk and plowed into a group of pedestrians on the sidewalk, killing one and injuring eleven. In conformity with the agreement and the circular of the Ministry of Justice, the Turkish authorities consulted the American commander of the Incirlik base. Upon being told that the officer was on official duty, they handed him over to the American personnel on the base. Morrison was tried by an American court-martial, found to be in breach of discipline, fined a mere $1,200, and transferred back to the U.S.

This incident had the effect of justifying the opposition to the U.S. military presence in Turkey. The case of Lieutenant Colonel Morrison was cited for years as an illustration of how American military personnel enjoyed judicial privileges and immunities reminiscent of the former capitulations. The shortcomings of the status agreement were partially remedied with a new bilateral agreement signed in 1968.

Along with the bilateral military agreements, the structure of the Turkish army was also changed. Prior to World War II, the Turkish armed forces were modeled on the German, French, and British armies. After Turkey's accession to NATO, every aspect of the army was restructured according to the American model (including cadres, organization, training methods, drill-books, uniforms, doctrines, rules, etc.). This was considered necessary to achieve common standards in NATO armies.

III. THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY PERIOD—II (1955–1960)

A. Emerging Disagreements in Bilateral Relations

Until 1954 the economy had been developing rapidly, boosted by massive foreign aid. Bottlenecks began to appear later, as a result of shrinking aid, incompetent economic management, and a drought that hit agriculture, the mainstay of the economy. When the Korean War came to an end, the U.S. and Canada released their stocks of grain on the world market, depressing the price of wheat, which happened to be one of Turkey's primary export items. This was a further blow to the Turkish economy.

Between 1948 and 1954 most of the costs of development projects were being covered by foreign aid and in particular U.S. aid. By 1955, however, foreign aid covered a mere 10% of the cost of projects. As investments fell and the agricultural sector remained depressed, the volume of exports decreased rapidly. This in turn widened the trade gap and depleted foreign exchange reserves. As a consequence, the government was forced to curtail the import of certain goods. Sectors highly dependent on imports suffered, and inflation soared.

The government felt that the only way out of this bottleneck, which was damaging its political standing, was to secure more aid. Starting in 1955, prime minister Adnan Menderes made insistent appeals to the U.S. At the same time, Turkey applied to the IMF, which it had joined in 1947, to secure loans. As a first step, Turkey was requesting $300 million in aid from Washington. At the technical-level meeting held in İstanbul in June 1955, the American side set certain conditions for providing this aid: inflationary policies had to be reversed, agricultural credits and price support had to be curbed, urgent tax reforms had to be carried out, and the Turkish currency had to be devalued. The IMF was making similar demands and refusing to provide loans before measures were taken to stabilize the Turkish economy. When Turkey refused to meet these conditions, the negotiations were suspended. After this, the U.S. stopped making requests on economic measures to Turkey directly to avoid straining bilateral relations further. These economic requests would now be conveyed to Ankara indirectly through the IMF.

When the long-awaited American aid failed to materialize, the economy deteriorated further. This led to the resignation of the government on 29 November 1955. The new government invited American experts to Turkey to work on the economic stabilization program. But the Americans once again came up with an extremely radical program. The DP government was against curbing agricultural subsidies; nor would it agree to devaluation. As a result, it had to make do with a $25 million aid package.

The $25 million in aid failed to redress the economic problems. When the government finally realized that the aid it was seeking would not be forthcoming, the Turkish lira was devalued on 3 August 1958 from 2.8 to the U.S. dollar to 9. Rigid credit ceilings were imposed on banks. Sectoral import quotas were introduced, but the three-year development plan recommended by the U.S. was ignored.

After the devaluation, the U.S., the World Bank, the IMF, and the European Payments Union provided an aid package of $359 million. In addition, the U.S. and the members of the European Payments Union agreed to reschedule those Turkish debts that were in arrears. Despite the massive aid, the 1960 budget would still show a deficit of $387 million (OTDP, pp. 452–59).

After 1955 political differences with the U.S. also cropped up, caused mostly by the activities of American NGOs and media. In 1955 the New York Times published an article criticizing Turkey for applying censorship to the press. The Associated Press sent a telegram to president Celal Bayar demanding that detained newspaper reporters be released. In the same year, the American Mineworkers Union applied to the U.S. Department of the Interior and requested that all military and economic aid to Turkey be suspended until improvements were made in the working conditions of Turkish workers. These moves got a frosty reception in Turkey.

Opposition parties were highly critical of the economic privileges granted to U.S. firms investing in Turkey. The argument that the DP was using U.S. aid for partisan politics was dragging relations with the U.S. into Turkey's domestic politics. The Agreement on Expropriation and Confiscation signed with the U.S. in 1957 came to the TGNA for ratification in January 1959. The agreement provided that the U.S. government could be a party to disputes between American firms investing in Turkey and Turkish firms. The U.S. government could also intervene in cases where an American company was expropriated in Turkey. In the parliamentary debate, the opposition expressed its outrage at these provisions, which reminded everyone of the capitulations. The Turkish public would argue about this for a long time.

Compared to the tensions experienced in the 1960s, these problems were of minor importance and did not affect the general course of bilateral relations. These minor problems contained the seeds of future problems, however, and it would be a mistake to minimize their effect.

B. Turkish-American Cooperation in the Middle East

Eisenhower and the New Look Strategy

The Cold War between the U.S. and the USSR started during Harry Truman's term as president. But it was during the presidency of Dwight David Eisenhower, elected in 1952, and his secretary of state, John Foster Dulles, that the Cold War spread and intensified. Eisenhower, the first commander-in-chief of NATO forces, and Dulles, who conducted the peace negotiations with Japan under Truman, were convinced that communism under Soviet and Chinese leadership was a threat on a global scale. In this context, in October 1953 Eisenhower started implementing a National Security Council decision known as the New Look Strategy.

The New Look Strategy had four main components.

(1) To deter a Soviet military move, the strategy of massive retaliation, including the use of nuclear weapons, would be developed.

(2) Psychological warfare using intensive propaganda would be waged, particularly to impair the USSR's relations with the countries of Eastern Europe.

(3) In conjunction with psychological warfare, the CIA would carry out covert operations in countries threatened by communism.

(4) The policy of containment launched during the Truman administration would be maintained and extended to the Middle East and the Asia-Pacific region (Gaddis, pp. 164–98).

During the Eisenhower administration, much effort was concentrated on the development of tactical and strategic nuclear weapons to ensure a credible deterrence. The establishment of military bases in close proximity to the USSR was also accelerated. The construction of American bases in Turkey was part of this effort.

Dulles coined the concept of captive nations as part of the psychological war that was being waged. According to Dulles, 800 million people worldwide were living as captive nations under the physical and ideological yoke of communism. The U.S. would do whatever it took to free these nations. The concept of captive Turks in vogue in Turkey was inspired by Dulles's model. The Turanian parties and circles were bandying the term "captive Turks" in those days, and the issue would remain on their agenda until the collapse of the Soviet Union.

The CIA was managing the operational part of psychological warfare. In 1947 the journal Foreign Affairs published the article "The Sources of Soviet Conduct" by George F. Kennan, who signed the article as "Mr. X" to maintain his anonymity. It was this article that brought him fame and contributed to the evolution of the concept of the Cold War. Kennan was also one of the architects of the Marshall Plan. Upon his proposal, the CIA undertook covert operations overseas, starting in 1948. During the Eisenhower-Dulles years, these operations were stepped up. In 1953 the government of Iran and in 1954 the government of Guatemala were overthrown by coups backed by the CIA. The CIA was also involved in unsuccessful coup attempts first in Indonesia in 1958 and then in Cuba in 1960. The CIA was organizing protest activities in Eastern Europe and instigating armed attacks on the People's Republic of China from Burma and Laos.

One of the priority objectives of the New Look Strategy was the pursuit of the policy of containment. In a long-haul ideological struggle like the Cold War, Dulles wanted all countries to commit themselves unequivocally. For Dulles, there could be no room for either non-alignment or neutrality. Eisenhower showed greater understanding toward the nonaligned, however, perhaps recalling that the U.S. had been neutral during most of World War I. After reaching a compromise between Dulles's all-or-nothing approach and Eisenhower's more flexible approach, the U.S. went to work to establish anti-Communist alliances among the countries outside the nonaligned camp. In 1954 Britain, France, Australia, New Zealand, Thailand, the Philippines, and the U.S. set up the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO). Bilateral security agreements were concluded with South Korea and Taiwan (Box 4-8).

With the establishment of SEATO, the containment through encirclement of the USSR and the People's Republic of China in the Asia-Pacific region was completed. Now it was the turn of the Middle East, a region at least as important strategically for the U.S. and its Western allies as the Asia-Pacific region. A defensive alliance on the SEATO model was to be established there. For this purpose, the U.S. would set up the Baghdad Pact, with the help of its Turkish ally.

The Baghdad Pact and the U.S.

The idea of bringing America's friends in the Middle East together in a defensive pact to ward off communism came from Washington. The U.S. was wary about becoming a full member, however, and decided to participate with the status of an observer.

This was because the Baghdad Pact Treaty stipulated that only those countries recognized by the member states could be admitted as members. This precluded the membership of Israel, not recognized by Iran, Iraq, and Pakistan. This in turn led Israel to claim that the pact was anti-Israel and that it would embolden the Arab states. In these circumstances, the U.S. could not afford to alienate its best friend in the Middle East by joining the Baghdad Pact as a full member.

Another reason for the U.S. not to become a full member had to do with Saudi Arabia and Egypt. Saudi oil was being extracted by American companies, and Washington could not afford to place U.S. interests in that country under jeopardy. Furthermore, attracted by the slogan of peaceful coexistence, Egypt was moving ever closer to the USSR. Keenly aware of Nasser's high standing among the Arabs, the U.S. did not want to lose Egypt completely.

Finally, there was also the danger that full U.S. membership might prompt the USSR to follow a similar course

Box 4-8. Geopolitical Theories

When the conflict of interests involving Britain, Germany, France, and Russia intensified in the last quarter of the nineteenth century, military and political analysts were trying to determine who the winners and losers in this struggle would be. Theories were developed to locate the strategic center of gravity of the globe in order to determine who would end up by dominating the world.

At first such theories did not have many followers, but things changed when the British geographer Halford John Mackinder delivered a lecture at the Royal Geographical Institute in 1904. The title of his lecture was "The Geographical Axis of History." According to Mackinder, the landmass of Asia, Africa, and Europe constituted an island on a global scale, and this region constituted the world's vital strategic center. He claimed that the most important center of the global island was the region between Eastern Siberia and the Volga basin, which was a huge plain with only the Ural Mountains dividing it. Mackinder called this region the heartland. He summarized his views as follows: whoever dominates Eastern Europe dominates the heartland; whoever dominates the heartland dominates the global island; and whoever dominates the global island dominates the world:

In Mackinder's theory, countries in the immediate vicinity of the heartland—Germany, Austria, the Ottoman State, India, and China—were the inner crescent of inner belt. Those farther afield—including Britain, South Africa, Australia, the U.S., Canada, and Japan—were the outer crescent.

When this theory was formulated, the heartland was under the control of Germany and Russia. According to Mackinder's theory, an alliance between Germany and Russia could end up with them dominating the world. To eliminate such a threat, it would be necessary to establish a belt of independent states between Germany and Russia to act as an effective barrier.

Although Mackinder's theory did not command a large following in Britain, his own country, it made a huge impact in Germany, where Gen. Karl Haushofer developed the theory into the concept of Lebensraum (living space), which would inspire Hitler's policies in the next century. The American Nicholas J. Spykman developed another geopolitical theory. It was based on Mackinder's theory but was more effective than its precursor in terms of producing results. Spykman argued that to dominate the world it was necessary to get hold of the inner circle. His argument was that possession of the inner circle allowed control of Eurasia and the possession of Eurasia allowed control of the globe.

Starting with John Foster Dulles, the secretary of state in the Eisenhower administration, many Western leaders based their strategies during the Cold War on Spykman's theory. In the 1950s, when the USSR began to challenge the U.S., the inner crescent region consisted of Turkey, Iran, Iraq, Pakistan, India, China, Korea, and Eastern Siberia. Inspired by these theories, Dulles took the lead in establishing SEATO and the Baghdad Pact on the NATO model.

Another follower of Mackinder, Col. Harry Sachaklian, advanced the idea of deploying strategic air power in the periphery of the USSR. According to Sachaklian, Mackinder's theory was valid, but with the proviso that air supremacy was essential.

During the Eisenhower administration, air bases were established in the pro-American countries located in the inner circle. The Northern Tier, designed to encircle the USSR, was being created by these means. This belt was labeled the Northern Tier because it included Turkey, Iraq, Iran, and Pakistan but not the Arab countries located to the south, which refused to Join.

With the onset of détente toward the end of the 1960s and the Introduction of weapons systems like intercontinental and sea-launched ballistic missiles, all kinds of thermonuclear weapons, and military satellites into the arsenals of the super powers, geopolitical theories based on the nineteenth-century balance of power became irrelevant. Concepts like geostrategy and geoeconomics would replace these outdated theories (see Box 7-8 in Section 7).

and establish its own pact in a region where it was eager to gain a firm foothold.

The Eisenhower Doctrine

The background: when Egypt nationalized the Suez Canal on 26 July 1956, France and Britain, in cooperation with Israel, prepared a secret plan and attacked the canal at the end of October. Peaceful since 1949, the Middle East was suddenly plunged into war. After taking an active part in the UN to end the Suez crisis and assuming the role of protector of the Arabs in their struggle against imperialism, the USSR's influence and prestige in the region were rising fast, much to the alarm of U.S. leaders. The Suez crisis had also dealt a blow to the British position in the Middle East, forcing the U.S. to deepen its involvement in the region. Within the framework of the New Look Strategy, Eisenhower and Dulles established the Northern Tier (see Box 4-8 above) in the form of the Baghdad Pact with a view to containing the USSR in the region. Despite this, Moscow succeeded in establishing warm relations with the Arab states, particularly with Syria and Egypt, causing apprehension in Washington.

At the summit meeting of the Baghdad Pact held on 29 November 1956, the U.S. declared that it would consider any attack on the territorial integrity and political independence of any member state to be a hostile act directed at America. The U.S. was seeking to prevent the USSR from upsetting the regional balance through indirect means, by using Syria and Egypt as proxies.

On 5 January 1957 Eisenhower submitted to Congress the policy paper that would come to be known as the Eisenhower Doctrine. This was a turning point in the U.S. Middle East policy. Until that time, the U.S. had been conducting policy in the Middle East through Britain and friendly regional countries. Now it would be asserting its vital interests in the region directly, without intermediaries (Armaoğlu, pp. 240–48).

In his message to Congress, Eisenhower declared: "Russia's rulers have long sought to dominate the Middle East. That was true of the Czars and it is true of the Bolsheviks... The reason for Russia's interest in the Middle East is solely that of power politics. Considering her announced purpose of Communizing the world, it is easy to understand her hope of dominating the Middle East." Eisenhower was criticizing the USSR's increasing involvement in a region that was of utmost importance to the U.S.

Eisenhower stressed two points. The first point: "It [the Middle East] contains about two thirds of the presently known oil deposits of the world and it normally supplies the petroleum needs of many nations of Europe, Asia and Africa... If the nations of that area should lose their independence, if they were dominated by alien forces hostile to freedom, that would be both a tragedy for the area and for many other free nations whose economic life would be subject to near strangulation." Eisenhower's second point: "the Middle East is the birthplace of three great religions... Mecca and Jerusalem are more than places on the map... It would be intolerable if the holy places of the Middle East should be subjected to a rule that glorifies atheistic materialism." Eisenhower was openly appealing to religious sentiments with these views.

Based on this, Eisenhower sought congressional authorization in three areas:

- 1. Authorization for the U.S. government to undertake cooperation programs, also including military assistance, in the Middle East with any nation or group of nations that desires such aid.
- 2. Authorization to provide assistance and cooperation, including the use of U.S. armed forces, to ensure and protect the territorial integrity and political independence of those nations that request aid against overt armed aggression from any nation controlled by international communism.
- 3. Authorization for the president to use, at his discretion, sums to be made available under the Mutual Security Act for economic and defensive military purposes during the years 1958 and 1959.

Congress approved these requests on 9 January 1957. The president got the green light not only to cooperate with Middle Eastern countries and strengthen their economies to assist them in preserving their independence but also to intervene militarily in the region.

The reactions to the doctrine: the Eisenhower Doctrine was an important milestone in America's Middle Eastern policy. It also marked one of the times when the Cold War reached a peak of intensity. After congressional approval of the doctrine, Eisenhower delivered a speech on 10 January in which he stated that the U.S. was determined to confront the Soviet threat anywhere in the world. He went on to declare that "America's interests are on a global scale. They extend to the two hemispheres and all the continents. America's interests coincide with the interests of all the nations of the free world. Only by respecting peace and the rights of all nations can these interests be furthered."

The sharpest reaction came from the USSR. Moscow called on the U.S., Britain, and France to make a formal commitment not to interfere in the internal affairs of Middle Eastern countries. There was no positive response from these countries to the Soviet proposal.

As of the end of January 1957 it started to become apparent which Middle Eastern countries were for and against the doctrine. On 19–20 January the prime ministers of Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, and Iraq met in Ankara and released a joint communiqué welcoming the doctrine. The nonregional member of the Baghdad Pact, Britain, did not share the view of the regional members: it realized that with the proclamation of the doctrine it had lost its regional leadership to the U.S.

Lebanon, Libya, Turkey, Iran, and Iraq formally announced that they were acceding to the doctrine. Other Arab countries, notably Egypt, remained distinctly cool toward it. Even America's principal ally in the Middle East, Israel, stayed away from the doctrine, out of fear that joining might sharpen Arab hostility to its existence.

The consequences of the doctrine for Turkey: ambassador James P. Richards, Eisenhower's special advisor, paid an official visit to Ankara. A joint communiqué was issued on that occasion on 22 March 1957, by which Turkey acceded to the doctrine. The communiqué reaffirmed that it was America's firm and unchanging goal to establish a just peace in a world where moral values would prevail. It also stated that it was in the common interest of America and the nations of the Middle East that the region would be secure against communism.

The main elements of the Eisenhower Doctrine were included in the text of the communiqué, and Turkey's approval of the doctrine was confirmed. In the communiqué, the two countries declared their intention, in line with their traditional policy, to oppose interference by one state in the internal affairs of another. Both saw international communism as a threat to the national independence of states and to the peace and security of the world. They also committed themselves to working together, in

Box 4-9. The "Out-of-Area" Question in NATO

The "out-of-area" concept is used in NATO jargon to describe regions lying outside the alliance's area of responsibility (this is not just a geographical concept but also includes NATO's objectives and principles).

Articles 5 and 6 of the treaty clearly state that NATO's area of responsibility consists of the territory of the member states, including their islands, aircraft, and ships located north of the Tropic of Cancer and the Mediterranean. At the same time, the area of responsibility is limited by the right of self-defense as described in article 51 of the UN Charter. Article 5 states that the parties shall interpret an armed attack on one or several of them in Europe or North America as an attack against all of them and shall exercise their right of individual or collective self-defense under article 51 of the UN Charter to repel such an attack. In other words, NATO will undertake military operations only in self-defense and will allow its facilities or installations to be used only for such military operations.

Although this was the legal situation, the out-of-area question came up because some members, and in particular the U.S., wanted to use NATO facilities for purposes beyond the alliance's area and objectives.

The question first came up when the U.S. used the incirlik alrbase in Turkey to intervene in Lebanon in 1958. Although the U.S. approached Turkey several other times, Turkey refused to allow its territory to be used for out-of-area purposes. These occasions were the 1967 Arab-Israeli War, the disorders in Lebanon in 1969 and in Jordan in 1970, the 1973 Arab-Israeli War, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, and the intervention in Iran in 1980.

The question came up once again after the disintegration of the USSR, when NATO was seeking a new role. The alliance sought different solutions to overcome this problem.

When the Gulf Crisis following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait on 2 August 1990 came to an end, a legal basis was sought for creating a Rapid Deployment Force, part of which would be stationed in Turkey. In November 1991 the decision was made that military forces could be employed out-of-area if vital interests were at stake due to the interruption of the flow of essential resources (meaning petroleum).

The claim that NATO's intervention in Bosnia was a violation of the out-of-area principle could not be sustained, because NATO was acting on behalf of the UN and in compliance with Security Council resolutions, NATO's intervention in Kosovo in 1998-99, however, was a typical case of out-of-area action in terms of its objectives, principles, and geographical location. There was no Security Council resolution; nor was there an attack against a member country calling for self-defense, NATO justified its intervention on the grounds of "eliminating the violation of human rights in the region and forestalling the possibility of a greater crisis that could affect the member states" ("Statement of U.S. President Bill Clinton, Air Strikes on Serb Military Targets," Federal News Service, March 24, 1999; press statement of Javier Solana, NATO Press Release, 1999 [040], 24 March 1999). To provide a legal basis for its action, the alliance adopted a document in April 1999 entitled the New Strategic Concept. According to this document, the elimination of ethnic and religious strife and terrorist activities likely to threaten members was incorporated within the alliance's field of responsibility. The essence of the North Atlantic Treaty, however, was legitimate defense to repel an attack. This meant that the elimination of a possible threat contradicted the basic principle of the treaty. In short, this was an out-of-area situation in terms of geography as well as the principles and objectives of the alliance.

Since the collapse of the USSR, NATO has been seeking to find a new role for itself. As long as things remain as they are, the out-of-area question is likely to continue to be a problem (see "The Out-of-Area Issue and Turkey" in "Relations with the USA and NATO" in Section 6).

(Ç. ERHAN)

conformity with the charter of the UN, to counter this threat.

The Eisenhower Doctrine had the following consequences for Turkey. (1) The U.S. became more dependent on Turkey to carry out its operations in the region. This was reflected in the importance attributed to the U.S. military bases in Turkey. The İncirlik base, constructed in 1954, was developed further. (2) U.S. military aid to Turkey was increased. (3) U.S. economic assistance to Turkey had been declining ever since 1954, and new conditions were being attached to it. Now U.S. economic aid started increasing. (4) Turkey's relations with the USSR and Arab countries opposed to the doctrine became more strained. This brought Turkey and Syria to the brink of war in the summer of 1957. These developments suited Menderes perfectly, because they would lead to more aid. (5) For the first time, Turkey allowed the bases on its soil to be employed for non-NATO purposes to intervene in Middle Eastern events (Box 4-9). In the first instance, the İncirlik base was used in 1958 to intervene in Lebanon and Jordan. This question would come up again in later years.

Difficulties in the U.S. Plans for the Middle East

The Iraqi coup and the end of the Baghdad Pact: the Iraqi coup of 14 July 1958 demonstrated that an organization like the Baghdad Pact could not be lasting without America's direct participation and full support. That is why the joint communiqué released following the meeting held in Turkey after the coup made an appeal for help from countries interested in peace, security, and stability in the Middle East. This appeal was obviously addressed primarily to the U.S.

This appeal for help got a prompt positive reply from Dulles. The members of the pact held an extraordinary meeting in London on 28 July, with the participation of the prime ministers of Britain, Iran, Pakistan, and Turkey and the U.S. secretary of state. They reaffirmed their determination to work together against not just direct attacks but also indirect attacks coming from within a member country, to cooperate with other members of the free world for their collective security, and to work toward strengthening collective security.

The most important result of the London meeting was the U.S. decision to enter into cooperation agreements in the fields of security and defense with the participants of the meeting. Thus the U.S. became a de facto member of the pact that it had not joined at the time of its establishment in 1955.

When Iraq gave formal notice that it was leaving the pact on 24 March 1959, the organization's name was changed on 21 August 1959 to the Central Treaty Organization (CENTO). Even before Iraq announced that it was leaving the pact, the U.S., acting in conformity with the London decision, signed almost identical security agreements with Turkey, Iran, and Pakistan.

The Turkish-American Security Cooperation Agreement: according to this agreement (signed on 5 March 1959), in the event of an attack on Turkey and upon the request of the Turkish government, the U.S. undertook to furnish all kinds of assistance and cooperation, including the use of armed force. Furthermore, the U.S. would continue to furnish military and economic aid to preserve Turkey's national independence and integrity and effectively support its economic development (Armaoğlu, pp. 259–60).

According to the agreement, U.S. assistance in the event of an attack on Turkey was contingent on the following conditions: (1) the Turkish government must request assistance; (2) the assistance must be based on mutual agreement; (3) the assistance must be compatible with the aims of the Eisenhower Doctrine; (4) there must be no provision in the U.S. Constitution preventing the assistance.

The preamble of the agreement stated that the assistance would be provided in the event of either a direct or an indirect attack.

The concept of indirect attack was interpreted in different ways by the Turkish government and the opposition. When the agreement came before the TGNA for ratification in February 1959, these different interpretations gave rise to a lively public debate in Turkey. The CHP deputies in the Foreign Affairs Committee of the TGNA wanted to know exactly what was meant by indirect attack. The officials of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs at the committee meeting informed them that indirect attack included covert and subversive activities but refused to provide additional clarifications on the grounds of security. This caused much anger among CHP deputies. The opposition had misgivings that the agreement would be interpreted loosely so that a popular movement in the country against the DP government might be seen as an indirect attack and result in the U.S. being asked to intervene. In the course of the debates, CHP deputies referred to the events in Lebanon and claimed that the agreement was preparing the ground for a possible U.S. intervention in Turkey.

Another aspect of the public debate was whether this agreement was bringing a new dimension to Turkish-American relations. Hüseyin Müftügil and Coşkun Kırca, writing in the opposition newspaper Ulus, argued that as a member of NATO Turkey would be protected from an attack by this organization and thus the agreement added nothing to Turkey's security. Other writers—among them Bülent Ecevit and Esat Mahmut Karakurt—reminded their readers that the NATO treaty made no reference to an indirect attack coming from international communism. Therefore, they claimed, the agreement must have been concluded to achieve goals beyond those of NATO. The agreement would enhance Turkey's security.

In response to these reactions, the minister of foreign affairs, F. R. Zorlu, declared that the agreement had been concluded for the purpose of underpinning the organization that had been set up to defend the Middle East. There was no reason to seek any hidden motives in the agreement.

The agreement of 5 March 1959 should be examined from the vantage point of its detractors as well as its defenders.

The opposition had four arguments that carried some validity.

- 1. With a broad interpretation of the vague term "indirect aggression," the government could present even minor student unrest as a rebellion with foreign Communist backing. The next step could be to call for the assistance of American forces. The indirect aggression issue might be misused to gain political advantage within the country.
- 2. As a member of NATO, Turkey did not need a new defense agreement.
- 3. On the basis of the decisions of the London meeting, the U.S. had concluded bilateral agreements with Turkey, Iran, and Pakistan but not with Britain. By signing such an agreement, a European country like Turkey had lost international standing.

Box 4-10. NATO Strategies and Turkey

NATO's defense strategies have been classified under the following headings.

The first strategy: in the early years after NATO's formation, the nuclear capabilities of the U.S. Air Force were limited, so the major effort was directed at achieving numerical parity with the USSR. This was the strategy adopted at Lisbon in 1952 and aimed at achieving a rapid increase in NATO's military manpower. This approach was known as the strategy of limited warfare.

This strategy was adopted at the time when Turkey and Greece were admitted into the alliance. Since Turkey had a large army of twenty-two divisions, it was expected to absorb a Soviet attack "like a sponge" and wear the Soviet forces down. A Soviet thrust would be forced to lose its momentum by giving up all the territory beyond the southern Taurus Mountains. This would allow the American army to gain time; with the support of air power, it would deal a deathblow to a weakened enemy.

This strategy clearly would have the most serious consequences for Turkey. But as a newcomer trying to get familiar with the proceedings, Turkey raised no objections to it.

Massive retaliation: keeping a large number of personnel under arms was very costly. Furthermore, the USSR had been developing its nuclear weapons, and it would be difficult to contain a Soviet push with conventional forces. The massive retaliation strategy was adopted on 22 November 1954: As its name implied, retaliation against the USSR in case of attack would be with nuclear weapons. The new strategy did not result in diminishing Turkey's importance to NATO, because the U.S. needed bases on which it could deploy the weapon systems that would hit the USSR.

Flexible response: as the USSR developed effective nuclear weapons and missiles to launch them, the concept of nuclear deterrence had to be abandoned in favor of nuclear balance. In the event of an attack, NATO would resort to controlled escalation in the use of weapons and only use nuclear weapons as a last resort. In such a case Turkey, located on the front line, would suffer massive damage.

These considerations led to modifications in the flexible response strategy. Without abandoning this strategy, the forward defense doctrine was adopted, which called for establishing the defense perimeter as far forward and away from inhabited areas as possible. This meant that the burden on flank countries like Turkey and Norway would increase. But it was soon realized that this strategy would be to the advantage of the Soviet Union, which enjoyed strategic depth and had an army organized to make full use of the elements of surprise and speed. That is why, in the early 1980s, the attack concept known by its acronym FOFA (Follow on Forces Attack) and the Air-Land Battle Doctrine (ALB) were conceived to supplement the flexible response strategy. Both of these concepts made it necessary to shift the core of the battle to enemy territory. This implied that, in a war, the Turkish army would be engaged as far away from its frontier as possible, which required a strengthening of the Turkish air force. Within this framework, the manufacture of F-16 aircraft was undertaken in Turkey in 1988 (see "Relations with the USA and NATO" in Section 6).

Post—Cold War NATO strategies: with the disintegration of the Warsaw Pact, the need for NATO began to be debated more frequently. It was at this time, in October 1991, that NATO adopted its new strategic concept. This concept emphasized that NATO was not conceived merely to deal with collective self-defense but had a role to play in managing all kinds of crises threatening the security of its members. In April 1999 NATO adopted still more new principles under the rubric "New Strategic Concept." Ethnic and religious strife, terrorism, human rights abuses, and regional conflicts threatening member states were incorporated in the questions that would be under NATO's close scrutiny, and, when necessary, measures would be taken to deal with them. New areas of responsibility were being created for NATO.

The new concept also indicated that NATO supported the development of Europe's security and defense identity.

From being a flank country bordering on the enemy, Turkey became a frontline state within the new strategies, located right next door to the unsettled regions of the Balkans, the Caucasus, and the Middle East. In this role, Turkey participated actively in NATO's Kosovo operation in 1999.

(Ç. ERHAN)

4. The agreement only provided for U.S. help in the event of an attack on Turkey. In defense agreements, however, it was customary to observe the principle of reciprocity in conformity with the conventional principle in international law that all states are equal. This implied that Turkey's sovereignty and independence were under the guarantee of the U.S., which was not a desirable state of affairs.

The agreement also had some positive aspects.

- 1. After the coup in Iraq, the pact members were deeply shaken and in need of reassurance. With open U.S. support, the members were able to renew their commitment to continue their cooperation in the Middle East.
- 2. The agreement provided continued support for Turkey in the pursuit of its economic development.

Despite the objections of the opposition and the public's misgivings, the agreement of 5 March 1959 was ratified by the TGNA on 9 May 1960.

C. The Question of the Jupiter Missiles

On 4 October 1957 the USSR succeeded in launching the Sputnik I satellite into space. About a month later, Sputnik II was placed into orbit around the earth. These developments indicated that the USSR was in possession of medium- and long-range ballistic missiles and were the first signs pointing to the possibility of the Cold War turning into a global nuclear conflict.

American defense experts were of the opinion that with the USSR possessing intercontinental ballistic missiles the U.S. might become a target in a future war. After having gone through World War II without a single bomb being dropped on the continental U.S., the fear of being directly threatened was acute among Americans. According to NATO's strategy of massive retaliation adopted in 1954, a conventional or nuclear attack coming from the Eastern Bloc would trigger a massive response with nuclear weapons (Box 4-10). In this situation, the ability to deliver a first strike became crucial. To deter the USSR from attacking and increase NATO's first-strike capability, Eisenhower proposed the deployment in allied countries of medium-range Jupiter missiles with nuclear warheads.

At the NATO summit of 1957, Eisenhower's proposal was adopted. Most members understood that the deployment of nuclear missiles on their soil would turn them into direct targets of a Soviet attack. This made them reluctant to accept the placing of these missiles on their soil. The USSR was also warning NATO members, from 1957 on, not to play host to missiles.

The shrill Soviet propaganda was effective: only Britain, Italy, and Turkey agreed to the deployment of missiles on their soil.

Turkey became one of the direct targets of the USSR by agreeing to the deployment of missiles on its territory. As the range of the missiles was insufficient, the probability of hitting the USSR's important military centers was low. Also, when compared with the missiles in Turkey, the Soviets had an advantage with their nuclear missiles. Rather than acting as a deterrent, the Jupiter missiles only served to anger and provoke the USSR.

After Menderes agreed to the deployment of the Jupiter missiles in Turkey, the Americans started seeing Turkey as an unsinkable aircraft carrier. As one of the flank countries bordering the USSR, Turkey's strategic importance began getting much more attention. NATO's subsequent strategy of flexible response was conceived at this time. The U.S. preferred a limited war to an all-out war. But since a limited war would be waged around the periphery of the USSR, this increased the Soviet threat to Turkey.

The secret agreement for the placement of Jupiters in Turkey was signed on 25 October 1959 in Paris. Along with many of the other bilateral agreements, this one too was dressed up as a technical cooperation agreement and was not submitted to the TGNA for ratification. The agreement would allow the deployment in Turkey of fifteen Jupiters. Britain would get sixty Thor missiles, while thirty Jupiters would be deployed in Italy (Uslu, p. 137).

By the end of 1960 the deployment of the missiles in Turkey had been completed. There were delays in the construction of the advanced-technology launching pads and the training of Turkish military personnel to operate the launchers, so the missiles only became operational in July 1962. These missiles were one of the factors that led to

Box 4-11. The U-2 Incident

When the USSR launched Sputnik into space, the U.S. reaction was not confined to deploying medium-range Jupiter missiles in NATO countries. It was essential for the U.S. to have full knowledge of the quality and size of the forces at the disposal of the USSR in order to be able to take effective measures against a sudden Soviet attack. To this end, starting in 1956, the U.S. began to prepare detailed maps of Soviet territory. In plotting the location of targets in the Soviet Union, in addition to long-range radars, the newly developed U-2 aircraft played an important part, The U-2 had a very long range (maximum 6,090 km) and flew at extremely high altitude (maximum 21,212 km). With its sensitive cameras it was able to take high-definition photographs.

On 1 May 1960 a U-2 took off from the Incirlik base in Turkey and, after a refueling stop in Peshawar, Pakistan, went on to fly over the USSR, gathering intelligence until it was shot down. The U.S. announced that one of its meteorological aircraft was missing after taking off from incirlik airbase on 1 May and that it had presumably crashed. When it became known that the U-2's pilot, Francis Gary Powers, was alive and in Soviet hands, the U.S. was forced to admit that the aircraft was an intelligence-gathering U-2 aircraft.

Although President Elsenhower declared on 25 May that U-2 flights had been suspended, these flights continued in December 1965 an American spy plane based at incirilk was shot down over the Black Sea, As on the previous occasion, the USSR heaped criticism on Turkey On 28 December 1965 Turkey asked the U.S. to put a stop to all reconnaissance flights from Turkey. Upon this request, these flights were ended.

the Cuban missile crisis that broke out in the fall of 1962. This was one of the most serious crises of the Cold War period.

D. The U-2 Incident and Turkey

When an American U-2 spy plane was shot down over the USSR in May 1960 (Box 4-11), this led to a short-lived crisis between Turkey and the USSR. Turkey was involved in the question because the U-2 had taken off from the base at İncirlik, near Adana. In the Soviet official statements, the countries that allowed the plane to use their bases received as much blame as the U.S.

In his statement of 5 May, Khrushchev declared that his government would give a stern warning to those countries that allowed the flights of U.S. aircraft. He also declared that an attack would elicit a retaliatory attack with guided missiles and that the primary targets would be the bases from which the attack had been launched.

The Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs responded with a statement on 8 May. The statement made it clear that the government of Turkey had granted no American aircraft permission to fly over Soviet territory for reconnaissance or any other purposes and that no such aircraft had crossed the Turkish frontier to enter into Soviet airspace. It also reminded the Soviet authorities that they had not claimed otherwise. Turkey would only be accountable for its own aircraft outside its airspace. It would be wrong to blame Turkey for this incident, even if the U-2 did fly over Turkey earlier (Armaoğlu, pp. 261–62).

After the U.S. admitted that the aircraft was on an intelligence-gathering mission and following the statement of the Turkish government, the Soviets refrained from issuing new statements criticizing Turkey. The crisis smoldered on for a while between the U.S. and the USSR. A similar row between Turkey and the USSR would occur in 1962 because of U.S. activities originating in Turkey and directed against the USSR, which were not under Turkish government control.

Relations with Greece

Turkey's relations with Greece throughout history have consisted of a succession of disputes and problems. The 1930s and the 1950s constitute the exceptions to this generalization. In effect, the rapprochement that began in the 1930s was interrupted by World War II but was resumed and pursued during the 1950s. Historians have noted that in the course of these decades both countries were striving to carry out their economic development and shared the same threat perceptions. The threat came from Italy in the 1930s and from the USSR in the 1950s. This made it easy for Turkey and Greece to pursue common policies and strengthen their friendship. Despite the similarities, there were important differences between the relationship of the 1930s and the relationship of the 1950s.

The threat perception of the two countries during the 1930s and their desire to develop their economies drove them to settle their problems and establish their relationship on a new basis. Once the problems between the two countries had been set aside, new avenues of cooperation were opened up in all fields (especially in the areas of foreign policy and military security), and solid progress was made. The friendship of the 1950s bore the traces of World War II, however, and did not prevent the emergence of new problems. In the 1930s both countries had decided to let bygones be bygones, whereas in the 1950s the two countries did not appear to be averse to creating new problems. That is why the friendship of the 1950s cannot be understood or the clashes of the 1960s explained without reference to the differing experiences of the two countries during World War II. Furthermore, the circumstances of the Cold War were totally different from the multipolar world of the interwar years.

I. TURKISH-GREEK RELATIONS AFTER WORLD WAR II (1945–1950)

In 1939, when war broke out, Turkey and Greece were engaged in military cooperation within bilateral and multilateral treaties of alliance. But the rapid changes in the fortunes of war in favor of the Axis powers rendered these treaties inoperative.

Greece was the victim of first Italian and then German and Bulgarian invasion and occupation. For four years the Greek people, and especially the Socialists and the Communists, put up a fierce resistance against the Fascist occupation. But at the end of the war the country was economically shattered and politically fragmented. This situation was to lead to a bloody civil war.

Turkey's experience was quite different. It did not experience occupation and by skillfully taking advantage of the balance of power among the belligerents managed to stay out of the war. Its economy had been affected by the war but was not in the ruinous condition of the economies that had gone through war and occupation. In the political field, Turkey had to cope with the drawbacks brought on by its wartime policy of neutrality. The USSR was highly critical of Turkey's nonbelligerence during the war and put forward insistent demands against Ankara.

In 1945 both Turkey and Greece were suffering from the consequences of the war, but they were not yet ready to adopt a common stand to deal with postwar conditions. It was necessary to wait for the emergence of differences between the U.S. and the USSR and for Washington to feel the need to bring Ankara and Athens closer together in pursuit of its Balkan and Middle Eastern policies for the two neighbors to formulate a common policy. The rapprochement started in 1947 with the proclamation of the Truman Doctrine and gained strength with the ending of the Greek civil war and the coming to power of the Democratic Party in Turkey. Nevertheless, even though the two countries followed similar courses as members of the same alliance after 1952, Greece continued to criticize Turkey for Ankara's wartime policies, which it considered detrimental to its interests.

A. Greek Criticism of Turkey's Wartime Policies and Turkey's Response

Athens held the view that the friendship established by Atatürk and Venizelos started fraying after 1938 when, during İnönü's presidency, foreign policy was no longer under the stewardship of Tevfik Rüştü Aras. This fraying accelerated as a result of Ankara's policies during World War II. Greece objected to a number of Turkish policies, which it regarded as being incompatible with friendship.

1. Turkey failed to carry out its contractual obligations arising from its military alliance treaties. Turkey's position facilitated the occupation of Greece by the Axis states and Bulgaria, which inflicted heavy tangible and intangible losses on Greece.

When World War II broke out, the two countries were allies by virtue of the Balkan Entente Pact, the bilateral military treaties of 1933 and 1938, and the Tripartite Alliance Treaty of 19 October 1939 signed by Turkey, Britain, and France. When Italy invaded Greece on 28 October 1940, the Allies, along with Greece, asked Turkey to honor its commitments under articles 2 and 3 of the Tripartite Alliance Treaty and declare war on Italy. Turkey claimed that it lacked the necessary military hardware and stayed out of the fighting.

When the German armies entered Macedonia and Thrace from Bulgaria on 6 April 1941 and started occupying Greece, the Allies, as well as Athens, turned once more to Turkey with the request that it carry out its commitments, under not just the Tripartite Alliance of 1939 but also the Balkan Entente Pact. When Bulgarian troops marched into Western Thrace and Eastern Macedonia on 17 April, Allied pressure on Turkey increased. At this time, the German ambassador in Ankara, von Papen, was giving assurances to Turkey that the German army would not violate the Turkish frontier. When Germany occupied the Aegean islands in May 1941, von Papen not only guaranteed Turkey's territorial integrity but went further and offered the islands located in the immediate vicinity of the Anatolian coast to Turkey. When Turkey was sure that Germany would not attack it, it signed a nonaggression pact with Germany and pulled back its forces to the Midye-Enez line in Thrace. After this, Turkey kept on defying Allied pressure and stayed out of the war.

To sum up, Turkey disregarded its commitments under the Tripartite Alliance of 1939, the Balkan Entente Treaty of 1934, and the Cordial Treaty of 1933 when first Italy and then Germany and Bulgaria invaded Greece. Greece suffered as a consequence, and for the Allies the war took a turn for the worse.

2. In addition to disregarding its commitments by staying out of the war, Turkey also suspended its relations with the legitimate Greek government under the influence of German victories in the battlefield. After Athens fell to the Germans, the Greek government installed itself in Crete in April 1941. Turkey failed to accredit an ambassador to this government. When the Greek government was struggling to continue its existence under very difficult circumstances following the German occupation, Turkey refrained from providing political, let alone military, support to this government.

3. In its negotiations during the war, Turkey used the Aegean islands as a bargaining chip, especially in its dealings with Germany. Turkey's territorial ambitions were arousing suspicion. In July 1939 von Papen told Count Ciano that after victory the future of the Dodecanese Islands would be reviewed. In April 1941 Ankara informed Berlin that the islands of Lesbos, Chios, and Samos were of strategic importance for Turkey and proposed that Turkey be allowed to occupy these islands until the end of the war. A year later, Numan Menemencioğlu told the Yugoslav ambassador that Turkey might move into the Dodecanese Islands if Germany took them.

This topic also remained on the agenda after 1943. In its contacts with Britain and the USSR, Ankara made clear that the Greek islands in close proximity to the Anatolian coast, the Dodecanese Islands, and, in particular, the island of Megisti (Meis, Kastellorizo) should come under Turkey's control for security reasons. Turkey did not consider its friendship with Greece when, during the war, some of the islands were offered to Ankara by both Germany and the Allies, as a prize for joining the conflict on their side. Although Turkey had no say in the disposition of the Aegean islands in the postwar settlements, the first signs of territorial disputes in the Aegean emerged during the war years.

4. In addition to its unfriendliness to Greece during the war, Turkey also repressed the Greek minority in Istanbul. In May 1941, shortly before the signing of the Nonaggression Pact with Germany, all non-Muslim men aged eighteen to forty-five in Istanbul were called up for military service as reservists. They were not given arms, however, but forced to work in labor battalions. Those aged thirty-eight to forty-five were demobilized on 8 December 1941, and the remainder were returned to civilian life on 27 July 1942 (Bali, pp. 408–23).

The most glaring measure against non-Muslims and one that had lasting effects was the Wealth Tax (Varlık Vergisi) imposed on 11 November 1942 (see Box 3-2 above). It was claimed that this tax was designed to alleviate the economic difficulties caused by the war and tax the income of war profiteers. It covered all the assets of the taxpayers, consisting mostly of minorities. The Greek minority made up 0.55% of the population but paid 20% of the Wealth Tax. Those unable to pay this tax were compelled to work as laborers at the Aşkale stone quarry in Erzurum province. In the Peace Treaty of Lausanne, a balance had been struck between the Turkish minority in Greece and the Greek minority in Turkey. Ankara upset this balance during World War II and applied repressive, discriminatory policies toward its citizens of the Greek Orthodox faith.

In summary, these were the four main Greek complaints against Turkey. Turkey's response to these complaints was grounded on "extraordinary wartime conditions." In World War II, Ankara did not take advantage of Greece's difficulties by pursuing anti-Greek policies. Its Greek policies were shaped by its overall policy, which responded to its national interests in a situation of war. In appraising Turkish-Greek relations during the war from Turkey's point of view, the following points can be made:

1. Turkey chose to remain neutral from 1939 to 1945, which did not violate any treaty obligation. Neither Turkey's bilateral treaties nor the Balkan Entente Pact committed Turkey to go to war because of Italy's aggression against Greece.

The Cordial Treaty of 1933, signed by Greece and Turkey, guaranteed only the inviolability of their common border (article 1). The Supplementary Treaty of 1938 provided in article 1 that, in the event of an attack on one of the parties, the other party would undertake to prevent, if necessary by force, the use of its territory by the aggressor and to remain neutral. Since no such situation occurred during World War II, it cannot be claimed that Turkey did not honor its bilateral treaty obligations.

From the perspective of the Balkan Pact, the common borders of signatories were not violated; nor did the attack originate from a Balkan country (article 2). In fact, it was Greece that demanded that the pact should not be applicable to cases of aggression from outside the Balkans.

Turkey did have obligations under the 1939 Tripartite Alliance. The war had spread to the Mediterranean (article 2/1), and Turkey was committed to assist Britain and France, which had given guarantees to Greece (article 3). In the annexes to the text of this treaty, however, these commitments were made conditional. The precondition for Turkey entering the war to help Britain was that it should have the necessary military hardware (Special Agreement, article 6, and Military Agreement, article 8). Turkey had not received the necessary economic and military assistance in 1940, however. At the time of Italy's aggression, Turkey did not provide direct military aid to Greece. But it warned Bulgaria in its official statements and diplomatic contacts that if Bulgaria took advantage of this situation and attacked Greece, Turkey would go to war. This prevented a Bulgarian move that could have forced Greece to fight on two fronts. Thus Turkey provided Greece with considerable indirect help.

After the German and Bulgarian occupation of Greece, Ankara was able to persuade London that it would be against the interests of the Allies for Turkey to enter the war without adequate military hardware. Britain agreed that it would be better for the Allies if Turkey remained neutral.

- 2. At a time when the German army was at Turkey's border, Ankara had to follow an extremely cautious policy. It was out of the question to accredit an ambassador to the Greek government in Crete. Such a move would only draw Germany's ire and confront Turkey with the danger of being dragged into the war. Once the Allies started winning victories in 1943, Turkey appointed an ambassador to the Greek government in exile in Cairo.
- 3. During the war, a lot of bargaining over different territories took place among all states, but Turkey never accepted any of the offers made by Germany. This is proof of Turkey's sensitivity to the territorial integrity of Greece. Although Athens was critical of Turkey, it had itself asked Britain during the war to allow Greece to acquire Northern Epirus, Cyprus, and the Dodecanese Islands. This elicited reactions from Turkey.
- 4. Regarding minorities, Turkey always claimed that it did not pursue racist policies and observed the provisions of the Lausanne Treaty. According to Ankara, the Wealth Tax covered all citizens. Being engaged mostly in business, the non-Muslims were the ones who made the greatest profits during the war and were consequently taxed more heavily.

No matter how strongly Turkey defended its Wealth Tax policies as not being racist, it did not enjoy the same credibility when refuting this last Greek allegation.

Be that as it may, Turkey also made friendly gestures toward Greece during the war. After the Italian attack, Turkey allowed volunteers from the Greek minority in Istanbul to join the ranks of those who were fighting Italy. It also allowed the aid materials collected by the minorities in Istanbul to be delivered to Greece by the Red Cross. Furthermore, the food aid delivered by the Turkish-flag vessels Kurtuluş and Dumlupınar was of great value to those suffering from famine under German occupation in 1941 and 1942. During this period, Greeks wanting to go to Cairo via Turkey, including military personnel, were allowed to do so. The Greek warship Adrias was allowed to take refuge in Turkish territorial waters when fleeing German units and was subsequently permitted to proceed to North Africa. Just as the bargaining over territory and other unfriendly policies were emphasized when relations between the two countries became strained, the friendly policies and gestures helped in returning Turkish-Greek relations after the war to their former friendly course.

Rapprochement in Turkish-Greek Relations Even before the war ended, differences had emerged between the USSR and the Western powers over the postwar settlements. The USSR, having borne the brunt of the war, wanted a security belt between itself and the capitalist world. This would allow it to gain further strategic depth to defend itself, while allowing it to spread Soviet and Communist influence into the countries located in the belt. In 1944 Stalin and Churchill agreed on certain percentages in their partition of the Balkans into spheres of influence. In this agreement, Greece was left in the British sphere. Turkey had incurred the wrath of the USSR for staying neutral during the war. This led to Soviet demands upon Turkey, which the Western powers at first appeared ready to countenance. But this did not last long. After 1946 the Western powers started getting concerned over the USSR's growing influence in Europe, the Balkans, and the Middle East. As they took measures to deal with the threat, the Cold War was unleashed. The differences among the wartime Allies had major repercussions in Turkey and Greece.

In the new postwar situation, both Turkey and Greece moved toward the West, but for different reasons. Turkey was anxious to develop economically and needed foreign aid to carry this out. The war conditions had created a new bourgeoisie, which was pressuring the government to strengthen Turkey's economic ties with the West. The new bourgeoisie also wanted to have a voice in governing the country, so it was pressing for a multiparty political system to replace the single-party state. Moving closer to the West would hasten this process. These internal factors were reinforced by the USSR's demands on Turkey and accelerated the process of Turkey's integration with the West.

The same process was operating in Greece, but its progress was very troubled. The political forces that had come together to fight fascism during the war became engaged in a bitter struggle for power, dragging the country into civil war. The civil war lasted from 1946 to 1949 and came to an end through Western and, in particular, American intervention. The Communists were defeated and purged, allowing Greece to take its place in the Western Bloc.

By 1950 Turkey and Greece had begun to identify their national interests with the interests of the West and started assuming the role of the representative of the West in the Balkans and the Middle East. Until that time, Turkish-Greek relations had not been fully stabilized. The events of 1947 were to prove decisive for the two countries' relations. First came the Paris Peace Treaty, which decided the fate of the Dodecanese Islands. This was followed by the Truman Doctrine, which introduced an American factor into their bilateral relations.

The Paris Peace Treaty of 1947

Soon after World War II ended, the arguments over the postwar settlements intensified. Greece and Turkey were also involved in these arguments in connection with the fate of the Dodecanese Islands. When Italy emerged defeated from the war, it became clear that its rule over the Dodecanese Islands, which it had grabbed from the Ottoman Empire in 1911, would come to an end. The Greek Orthodox population of these islands was following the same course as the Greek Cypriots and sending telegrams to the heads of state and ministers of foreign affairs of the Allied countries, voicing the desire to be united with Greece, the motherland. Britain, as the spokesperson for the Allies, favored giving the Dodecanese Islands to Greece. This would help neutralize the pressure being exerted on it in connection with Cyprus, reward Greece for its sacrifices during the war, and strengthen the Greek king and government in the face of the leftist opposition.

When it was announced on 12 May 1945 that the Greek king would be visiting the Dodecanese Islands, the Turkish government took action. The next day, the secretary general of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Ali Fuat Türkgeldi, told the British chargé d'affaires in Ankara that some of these islands were very close to the Turkish mainland and had strategic importance for the security of Turkey. Furthermore, there were Turkish minorities living in Rhodes and Cos. Consequently, Turkey wanted the question to be dealt with through negotiations involving Britain, Greece, and Turkey. The Turkish public learned about the issue when Tevfik Rüştü Aras wrote an article in the newspaper Tan on 25 July 1945. In his article, Aras recalled that in the past he had been an ardent advocate of Turkish-Greek friendship and had worked strenuously to attain this objective. He accepted that the vast majority of the inhabitants of these islands were Greek Orthodox but maintained that the best solution would be to demilitarize the islands and grant them self-rule. Britain, Greece, and Turkey would jointly guarantee the status of the islands, as well as their security. This article was followed by editorials in the newspapers Son Telegraf and Yeni Asır, which argued that the islands should revert to Turkey.

Before the Turkish public had a chance to focus its attention fully on the Dodecanese Islands, the Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs became conscious of the growing Soviet threat and, under British prodding, announced its definitive position on the issue on 1 July 1946: Turkey did not object to the awarding of the Dodecanese Islands to its friend Greece but rather welcomed it. The islands of Cos, Simi, and Megisti were so close to the Anatolian coast, however, that it would be unthinkable to separate them from the mainland. Justice and fairness demanded that two or three of these islands be awarded to Turkey.

In its reply delivered on 8 July 1946, the British Foreign Office declared that Britain agreed that it would be appropriate to award some of the islands to Turkey. It went on to add, however, that such an award might provide the USSR with the pretext to create the dispute over the Straits that it had been seeking. The British reply also noted that the U.S. insisted that all the islands be awarded to Greece. The reply concluded that, provided the islands were demilitarized, their award to Greece would not jeopardize Turkey's security.

The series of conferences on peace treaties that ended World War II took place from 29 July to 15 October 1946, with the participation of twenty-one states. In the discussions on the Dodecanese Islands, the Greek proposal that a phrase be inserted in the treaty stating that the limits of the islands would be those set in the Turkish-Italian treaties of 4 January and 28 December 1932 was not accepted. Article 14 of the Paris Peace Treaty of 10 February 1947 merely determined the legal status of the Dodecanese Islands. The article said that Italy transferred its sovereignty over the Dodecanese Islands to Greece and provided that the islands would be demilitarized and would remain so in the future.

On 7 March 1947 the Dodecanese Islands came under Greek sovereignty. President İnönü preferred to remain silent over this event, which took place just prior to the proclamation of the Truman Doctrine. In later years, his opponents would harshly criticize him for adopting this stand. His silence can be attributed to the need to establish Turkish-Greek friendship under the U.S. umbrella to ward off the danger coming from the "common enemy," which was the USSR. A new era was beginning in which disputes would be pushed into the background as much as possible.

The U.S. Factor in Relations and the Election of Athenagoras as Patriarch

The advent of the Cold War between the USSR and the Western allies had a direct effect on developments in Greece and Turkey. After civil war broke out in Greece in 1946, both the government and the guerrillas in the mountains were able to strengthen their forces for a whole year. Despite British support for the regular army, it became clear after a year of warfare that it could not deal with the guerrillas. When Britain announced in February 1947 that it could no longer support Greece and that it would withdraw its forces, the Greek government was left in a very difficult position. The Communists already controlled the countryside and, after Britain's decision to withdraw, might take over the rest of the country.

At this point the U.S. stepped in and on 12 March 1947 announced through the Truman Doctrine that it would help Greece and Turkey in facing up to the Communist threat. The U.S. economic and military aid allowed the civil war in Greece to be extinguished, with the Communists fleeing to Albania. From then on, Athens and Ankara would be pursuing policies consistent with Washington's expectations. Neither country could afford to ignore the U.S. in framing its foreign policy. Henceforth the U.S. factor would become the basis of Turkish-Greek friendship.

In May 1947, two months after the proclamation of the Truman Doctrine, the Turkish-Greek Cooperation Committee was set up in Athens. Negotiations dealing with military, cultural, and trade issues followed. In September 1948 an agreement to expand bilateral trade was concluded.

The rapprochement between Ankara and Athens and Washington's role in this process began to bear fruit in the political sphere with the election of the new patriarch.

During World War II and afterward, the USSR sharply revised its relationship with the Patriarchate of Moscow. This led Turkey to revise its position vis-à-vis the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Phanar, which, since the Treaty of Lausanne, had been based on the premise that the patriarchate was a national institution. This meant that the patriarchate's claim to be ecumenical went unrecognized by Ankara. Stalin described World War II as a patriotic war and had no qualms about using religion for his purposes. The Patriarchate of Moscow had remained vacant since 1924. In 1943 Sergius was appointed patriarch, succeeded by Alexios in 1945. When the USSR increased its interest in the Balkans after the war, it used the religious link to the Orthodox peoples of the region to achieve its objectives there. Moscow started claiming that the Patriarchate at Phanar was under Turkish pressure and therefore could not carry out its functions adequately. Hence Moscow contended that the patriarch should be elected by all the Orthodox churches. Moscow's policies led Ankara to soften its attitude toward the patriarchate, and the matter was taken up in the framework of the Turkish-Greek dialogue. The U.S. also got involved to counter Moscow's policies and in 1948 secured the appointment of Athenagoras, a person it trusted, as patriarch of Phanar.

When Patriarch Veniamin died on 17 February 1946, Maximos Vaporcis was elected as his replacement. Both Turkey and Greece welcomed his election, because it was expected that his dynamic personality would check Moscow's activities in this area. These expectations were dashed, however, when Patriarch Maximos started making statements supporting the Communists in the Greek civil war. Furthermore, in early 1947 the bishop of Kition, Mihail Mouskos, who would later become archbishop of Cyprus as Makarios III, paid a visit to Patriarch Maximos. The patriarch told Bishop Mouskos that the Turkish government had no intention of getting involved in the question of Cyprus and that he did not think the Turkish government would be interested in events taking place outside its borders at this critical juncture. He added that most of the Greeks of Istanbul were attached to him. The patriarch had gone too far, and the reaction was swift. The U.S. also had been closely following the patriarch's activities and wanted action. Greece started exerting pressure on Patriarch Maximos, who resigned on 18 October 1948, citing "psychological reasons."

The U.S. played an active role both in the resignation of the outgoing patriarch and in the election of his successor. When Turkey rejected three of the candidates selected by Greece, the candidacy of Aristocles Spiru Athenagoras, Greek Orthodox archbishop of North America since 1931, was advanced. This cleric had been engaged in the effort to bring together all the Christian churches. He was anti-Communist and anti-Soviet and thus was considered suitable to play a role in the U.S. containment of Soviet expansion. The Turkish press described him as a friend of Turkey.

While Greece and Turkey accepted the candidacy of Athenagoras, the biggest reaction came from the Patriarchate of Phanar, because the candidate was not from within Phanar. It took the intervention of Greece to persuade the patriarchate. Then came a legal difficulty: Athenagoras did not have Turkish citizenship. This problem was quickly surmounted, and on 1 November 1948 Athenagoras I was elected patriarch. He would be the longestserving patriarch of the Republican era, carrying out his functions until 1972. Athenagoras arrived in Istanbul on President Truman's personal airplane on 26 January 1949 and was greeted at the airport by members of the Greek community and the press. The new patriarch demonstrated his loyalty to the state by first laying a wreath at the Monument of the Republic at Taksim Square before proceeding to the patriarchate. In February he went to Ankara in a special railroad car, where he paid a formal visit to President İnönü to convey President Truman's personal message. He also visited prime minister Şemsettin Günaltay and the minister of the interior, Emin Erişirgil. On his departure from Ankara, high government officials saw him off. All the signs indicated that there would be cordial relations between the patriarchate and Ankara.

When it came to thwarting the USSR, the U.S. demonstrated that it was prepared to play a decisive role even in a purely religious affair like the election of a patriarch. This also indicated that Washington's interest in Greece and Turkey was not confined to military and economic affairs. The U.S. would become an important factor in the domestic and foreign policies of both countries.

II. THE SECOND PERIOD OF FRIENDSHIP (1950–1955)

Throughout the 1950s Turkey and Greece experienced similar political, economic, and social developments. In both countries right-of-center parties with U.S. backing were in power for roughly ten years. Their objective was to secure the economic and military integration of their countries with the capitalist West.

After World War II, the West insisted on a transition to a multiparty democratic system as a precondition for establishing close relations with Turkey. The Democratic Party came to power after the election of 14 May 1950 and ran the country until it was removed from power through a military coup on 27 May 1960. The transition to democracy was not that smooth in Greece. The country had been split in two by the civil war. In the period following the civil war, the system of proportional representation led to center-right coalition governments up to 1952. The Communist Party (KKE) had been driven underground, but the United Democratic Left (EDE) was gaining in strength. Alarmed by this development, the U.S. persuaded the Greeks to change their electoral system. The Right rallied around Marshal Alexandros Papagos, and in the 1952 election the Greek Resurrection Party came to power under his leadership. Upon his death in 1955, Papagos was succeeded by Konstantinos Karamanlis, who changed the party's name to Radical National Union but maintained the Papagos policies and managed to stay in power until 1963.

The Menderes government in Turkey and the Papagos-Karamanlis governments in Greece were pursuing similar economic goals: to become full-fledged capitalist countries with the support of U.S.-furnished aid. Most of the aid was being spent for military purposes and part of the borrowed funds had to be set aside to service debts, so industrialization was neglected, but the building of infrastructure was accelerated. Roads were built connecting cities to rural areas, the use of tractors in farming increased, and the migration of surplus rural workers to the cities gained pace. The construction and service sectors developed in cities but could not absorb all the newcomers. Unemployment was rising steadily. Although industrialization could not be achieved in Greece and Turkey during the 1950s, the old feudal order based on agriculture was breaking down. The new urban social strata would be the catalysts for the political developments that would occur in both countries during the 1960s.

The dependence on the U.S. in the economic and political fields was great, but it was even more glaring in the area of foreign policy. In this period, national interest in Turkey and Greece was identified with first U.S. and then NATO interests, and all foreign policy decisions were made accordingly. The main goal of both countries after 1949 was to gain admission to NATO and thereby rely on the organization for military security. To achieve this goal, both countries sent troops to the Korean War in 1950, unfurled the anti-Soviet banner on all occasions, and provided military bases to the U.S. on their soil. When they achieved their common goal of joining NATO in 1952, they took on the role of defender of NATO interests in the region and guardian of the southeastern flank of the alliance.

A. Reciprocal Visits and Strengthened Friendship

The rapprochement between Turkey and Greece following their accession to NATO in 1952 became visible with the increasing frequency of high-level visits. The first such visit was that of Greek prime minister Sophocles Venizelos (the son of Elefterios Venizelos) to Turkey on 29 January-5 February 1952. The Permanent Turkish-Greek Joint Committee was established during this visit to achieve greater political and economic cooperation and to promote trade. The committee was to work on the joint marketing of Turkish and Greek tobacco in third countries, the development of joint fishing activities in the territorial waters lying between the Aegean islands and the Anatolian coast, the lifting of visas for travelers, and the establishment of a customs union. In addition, the committee would explore the possibilities for cooperation in the field of defense and establish contacts with Yugoslavia on the subject of regional security. The idea of a Balkan alliance began to emerge during this visit. The atmosphere was so cordial that Sophocles Venizelos declared that "the friendly relations between Turkey and Greece are so close that soon we shall be claiming that the two countries are one and the same" (Ayın Tarihi 219 [February 1952]: 276).

On 26 April 1952 prime minister Adnan Menderes, accompanied by foreign minister Fuad Köprülü and the chief of the General Staff, Şükrü Kanatlı, went to Athens on a return visit. The rapprochement reached a peak during the visit to Turkey of Greece's King Paul and Queen Frederika in June 1952. This was the first visit of a Greek monarch to Turkey. While King Paul was holding official talks, the Permanent Turkish-Greek Joint Committee reached agreement on reciprocal and joint fishing rights in Turkish and Greek territorial waters in certain parts of the Aegean Sea. The king's visit to the patriarchate was well received by the Turkish press and public opinion in general. Although the people of both countries were displaying an interest in the question of Cyprus, their governments were avoiding the subject in order not to damage the atmosphere of friendship.

When the visa requirement was lifted in August 1952, a considerable number of Greek tourists started coming to Turkey. This warm atmosphere continued during president Celal Bayar's visit to Greece from 27 November to 2 December 1952. After Athens, Bayar visited Western Thrace, where he had contacts with the Turkish minority and participated in the opening ceremony of the high school named after him in the town of Komotini. This high school was to cater to the Turkish minority in Western Thrace. The Turkish press drew attention to the need to develop relations between the two countries and to avoid issues likely to mar this friendship. In Turkey, there were concerns about the gradually emerging question of Cyprus and the coming to power of Prime Minister Papagos, who had previously made speeches declaring that Cyprus was a national issue for Greece.

The friendship that had been strengthened by the high-level visits continued in 1953. The celebration of the 500th anniversary of the conquest of İstanbul went smoothly, without creating complications. Cyprus was becoming more topical, but it still did not affect bilateral relations. In fact, as in the 1930s, these good relations displayed a tendency to spread into the rest of the region.

B. The Balkan Pact and Alliance

The rapprochement between Turkey and Greece during both the 1930s and the 1950s led to a search for cooperation on a regional Balkan scale, and the security concerns of the two countries resulted in the signing of the Balkan Pacts.

Despite the superficial similarity, the conditions giving rise to the Balkan Entente of 1934 and the Balkan Alliance of 1954 were quite different. The Balkan Entente of 1934 took place in a multipolar world and was the result of the threat perceived by the signatories regarding the intentions of the revisionist states as well as their desire to cooperate to increase their strength in order to face up to this threat. The Balkan Alliance of 1954 came during the Cold War within a bipolar world. It was established with U.S. support and in conformity with NATO's strategies and was a vehicle serving the differing interests of the members rather than their common interest.

The Background of the Balkan Pact and Alliance

The gap in NATO's strategy and U.S. support: the Cold War that broke out soon after World War II also affected the Balkan Peninsula, which was divided into the socialist states, backed by Moscow, and Turkey and Greece, which had American backing.

The expulsion of Yugoslavia from the Cominform because of Tito's revisionism brought a new dimension to the division of the Balkans. When Yugoslavia fell out with Moscow, Belgrade had to contend with reconstructing a war-torn economy and confronting a serious threat to its security. The U.S. took advantage of this opportunity and started providing first economic and then military aid to Yugoslavia.

With the accession of Greece and Turkey to NATO in 1952, the U.S. started implementing its containment policy. With new alliances to be set up in the Balkans and the Middle East, NATO's gaps would be plugged and the USSR contained with a military defense perimeter running from the Atlantic all the way to Iran. The only gap in this perimeter was Yugoslavia. Since it was unfeasible for Yugoslavia under the leadership of the socialist Tito to be admitted into NATO, the practical solution was to secure the cooperation of this country with NATO members Greece and Turkey and thereby draw Belgrade into the Western defense structure. This would eliminate the gap in NATO's defense strategy. The visit of Frank Pace, the deputy undersecretary of the U.S. Department of the Army, to Athens, Ankara, and Belgrade in August 1952 at a time when negotiations were going on among the three countries was tangible evidence of U.S. support for Balkan cooperation.

The perception of a threat from the USSR and the Eastern Bloc: the three countries that signed the Balkan Pact perceived a threat from the Eastern Bloc, and particularly the USSR. The Soviet notes sent to Turkey after World War II, the civil war in Greece, and Tito's version of national socialism had turned these countries against Moscow. Furthermore, Bulgaria had bilateral disputes with Turkey, Greece, and Yugoslavia, while Albania had disputes with Greece and Yugoslavia. From time to time, these disputes flared up into full crises. These tensions with countries of the Eastern Bloc were an important factor in bringing Turkey, Greece, and Yugoslavia closer together, especially because they had no quarrels among themselves.

The need for economic aid: all three signatories of the Balkan Pact were anxious to overcome the negative effects of the war on their economies. They also wanted to press on with economic development and needed American economic aid for this. By establishing a Balkan Pact that would strengthen NATO's defense strategy, the parties expected to increase the military and economic aid they were obtaining and also enhance their bargaining power.

Yugoslavia's desire to strengthen its position vis-à-vis Italy on the question of Trieste: in the treaty signed with Italy at the Paris Peace Conference after World War II, Trieste was declared a free city. Yugoslavia was apprehensive about Italy's close relations with the Allies. It wanted to prevent Italy from recovering Trieste and returning to the Balkans, so it chose to cooperate with Turkey and Greece to strengthen its position in its dealings with the West.

The Balkan Pact

When the negotiations leading to the Balkan Pact were proceeding, it became necessary to help Italy overcome its apprehension over Trieste. Once this was done, the negotiations went forward rapidly, and the Balkan Pact was initialed on 25 February 1953 in Athens. The pact, officially known as the Treaty of Friendship and Collaboration between the Turkish Republic, the Kingdom of Greece, and the Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia, was signed in Ankara on 28 February 1953. The Balkan Pact consisted of a preamble and ten articles. It was not in the nature of an alliance.

In the preamble, the parties declare that the treaty is signed pursuant to article 51 of the United Nations Charter and reaffirm their faith in the organization. Article 1 states: "In order to ensure their permanent collaboration, the Contracting Parties will consult on all problems of common interest." It goes on to say that the ministers of foreign affairs shall meet at least once a year to consider questions of common interest. On the subject of cooperation in the field of security, article 2 declares: "The Contracting Parties are determined to continue their common efforts for the safeguarding of peace and security in their area and to pursue in common the study of the problems of their security, including common measures of defense, the need for which might arise in the event of unprovoked aggression against them." Article 3 adds: "The General Staffs of the Contracting Parties shall continue their collaboration in order to submit to their Governments recommendations concerning questions of defense that are formulated by mutual agreement, with a view to the making of coordinated decisions." This article diverges from the Balkan Pact of 1934 and provides a basis of common defense. In the event of aggression, it will not require each country to intervene with its army. In that event, the treaty provides for common measures to be taken. This will not be done within an alliance, however. Only the collaboration of the General Staffs is foreseen. The reason for this shortcoming was that no way could be devised to overcome the legal hurdle of reconciling the positions of NATO members Turkey and Greece with the position of socialist Yugoslavia, not a member of NATO. Article 4 provides for collaboration in the economic, cultural, and technical fields. Under article 5, the parties undertake to settle their disputes by peaceful means; under article 6, they commit themselves not to conclude any alliance directed against one of them; and under article 7, they agree not to sign any commitment that might be in conflict with the treaty. Article 8 states that the treaty does not affect the rights and obligations of Greece and Turkey under NATO, while article 9 makes provision for other states to adhere to the treaty if this will contribute to the accomplishment of its purposes. Finally, article 10 states that after five years any member may cease to be a party to the treaty by giving notice one year in advance to the other parties.

After signing the treaty, Yugoslavia gave special emphasis to article 4 and displayed its interest in cooperation in fields other than security and military matters. This required an organization, including a permanent secretariat, which was set up with a supplementary treaty signed in Belgrade on 7 November 1953.

The Balkan Alliance

The Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation was followed by an alliance among the three countries formed through the signing of the Treaty of Alliance, Political Cooperation, and Mutual Assistance between the Turkish Republic, the Kingdom of Greece, and the Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia on 9 August 1954 at Bled.

Article 1 of the treaty states that the "Parties undertake... to settle by peaceful means any international dispute in which they may be involved, and to refrain... from the threat of or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations." Article 2 refers to action to be taken in the event of aggression: "The... Parties agree that any armed aggression against one or more of them... shall be considered an aggression against all the Contracting Parties who... shall jointly and severally go to the assistance of the Party or Parties attacked by taking immediately and by common accord any measures, including the use of armed force, which they deem necessary for effective defense." Article 6 provides that the parties will inform the UN Security Council about the measures of self-defense taken in the case of an armed attack and will discontinue their measures. In this respect the treaty carried the same provisions as NATO and was much broader than the 1934 Balkan Pact.

This treaty also established a Permanent Council that would meet at least twice a year, with the participation of the ministers of foreign affairs of the parties. When the Permanent Council was not in session, the Permanent Secretariat of the Treaty of Ankara was to carry out its functions (article 4). Article 11 made clear that the Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation signed in Ankara on 28 February 1953 would remain in force. Consequently, it is possible to conclude that the Bled Treaty made the Ankara Treaty more effective and turned it into a full alliance.

The Permanent Council of the Balkan Alliance held its first meeting in Ankara on 2 March 1955. At the end of the meeting, an agreement was signed to establish a Permanent Assembly. It was to consist of twenty members of parliament from each of the parties, and its mandate was to explore possibilities for expanding cooperation in all fields. On 19 March 1955 the Permanent Council met to sign an agreement on postal services. This was to be its last meeting.

The Balkan Alliance was a defensive arrangement among three countries with no disputes among themselves who felt threatened by the USSR and who enjoyed the backing of the West. When the circumstances that gave rise to this alliance disappeared, the structure was bound to lose its function. In fact, even as the Balkan Alliance was being signed, circumstances were changing. The death of Stalin in March 1953 heralded a softening in Soviet foreign policy, which was reflected in the USSR's relations with the Balkan countries. This change was most evident in the case of Yugoslavia. The first sign of this was Moscow's lifting of the economic blockade on Yugoslavia, the improvement in diplomatic relations, and the ending of incidents on Yugoslavia's borders by the Cominform member Balkan states. With the establishment of the Balkan Alliance, the USSR felt encircled in its southern region, so it went into action to remove Belgrade from this arrangement and prevent it from getting too close to the West. In June 1955 Prime Minister Bulganin went to Belgrade accompanied by the first secretary of the CPSU, Nikita Khrushchev. The visit was a fence-mending mission in which the Soviet leaders indicated that they were not opposed to a national form of socialism. This Soviet approach allowed Yugoslavia to set its course toward the nonaligned movement, for which it already had a predisposition. The final solution of the Trieste question also removed one of the reasons for Belgrade's involvement in the Balkan Alliance. After this, Belgrade would stress the economic and cultural aspects of the Balkan treaties, rather than their military cooperation dimension.

At a time when Yugoslavia's interest in the Balkan Alliance was waning, Turkish-Greek relations were souring because of the question of Cyprus (examined in greater detail below). The question became internationalized in 1954, and Turkey became fully involved in 1955. This would lead to growing differences between Ankara and Athens and render not just military cooperation but all cooperation within the Balkan framework impossible. Indeed, in 1955 Greece prevented the Permanent Council from meeting in Athens. On 23 December 1955 minister of foreign affairs Spiros Theotokis declared that cooperation with Turkey within the Balkan Alliance would not be resumed until Turkey paid compensation for the damage done during the events of 6–7 September. Despite Tito's efforts at mediation, the tension between the two countries persisted, and the Permanent Council failed to meet again. The Permanent Secretariat functioned in Athens until January 1957. When it became Belgrade's turn to take over and the transfer did not take place, it too ceased to function. The subject of resuscitating the Balkan Pact came up for consideration when relations mellowed somewhat in 1958, but the foreign ministers of both Greece and Yugoslavia made statements declaring that this would not be possible. In this way the Balkan Pact and Alliance Treaties were tacitly brought to an end. The Balkan Pact and Alliance had been the direct products of Turkish-Greek friendship and ended because of the growing differences between the two countries.

C. The Effects of Friendship on the Minorities

We have already noted that historically the policies of the governments toward the minorities living in Turkey and Greece have been indexed to the state of relations between the two countries. The decade of the 1950s was no exception to this rule. During this decade of friendship in all spheres, the minorities lived in peace and contentment. Important developments took place in the field of education through the Cultural Agreement of 1951 and the exchange of letters in 1952. The governments agreed to the employment of teachers from Turkey in the minority schools in Western Thrace and teachers from Greece in the Greek minority schools in Turkey.

After the election of Athenagoras as patriarch, there was a perceptible relaxation in Ankara's relations with the patriarchate. This resulted in the patriarchate's increased influence over the Greek Orthodox community of İstanbul. As the patriarchate mended its relations with the government, it was able to set up a press bureau. In 1951 it started the publication of the weekly magazine Apostolos Andreas in addition to the daily newspaper Orthodoxia, which it had been publishing since 1926. With Ankara's consent, it repaired the damage to the patriarchate building caused by the fire of 1941. The patriarchate also played a part in the arrangements dealing with the community's properties. The mukataa tax (a kind of rent paid for cultivated land turned into building land) was repealed in 1949. A law was passed to the effect that all the properties of the Balıklı Foundation formed part of the patriarchate's patrimony. Important progress was also registered in the field of education. In 1951 permission was granted to the Halki (Heybeliada) Theological Seminary to admit students from Greece and other Christian countries. The 1951 Cultural Agreement contained provisions allowing instructors from Greece to teach in the Greek minority schools. There were also provisions to facilitate the procurement of textbooks. The use of Greek as the language of instruction in the schools of Gökçeada (Imbros) and Bozcaada (Tenedos), which had been suspended in violation of article 4 of the Peace Treaty of Lausanne since 1927, was resumed. In the election of 1950, the Greek minority in İstanbul gave its support to the DP. In return, it benefited from the economic policies of the DP when it came to power. Greek traders and business owners were able to obtain generous government loans, which allowed them, together with their Armenian and Jewish colleagues, to obtain an important share of Turkey's foreign trade business. The deputies of Greek extraction became more active in the TGNA.

During both World War II and the Civil War, the Turks of Western Thrace had remained loyal to Athens. During the 1950s they also benefited from the relaxed atmosphere. The 1951 Cultural Agreement and the exchange of letters of 1952 allowed a good number of instructors to come to their schools from Turkey, and instructors from Western Thrace went to Turkey for courses. Students from Western Thrace obtained scholarships to attend teacher-training schools in Turkey. Official permission was granted for the repair of minority schools in Western Thrace, with funds provided by the Turkish Consulate in Komotini to carry out the repairs. The Celal Bayar High School, which was opened by President Bayar during his visit to Greece, was the first Muslim-minority high school in Western Thrace. Law No. 3065/1954, also known as the Papagos Law, referred to Turkish schools for the first time instead of using the customary "minority schools" formula.

In the 1950s, for the first time, the Turkish minority was allowed to elect Community Administrative Boards. Despite these positive developments in Western Thrace, the ill-famed Law No. 2185 was enacted in 1952. This was the law that provided the legal basis for the expropriations that would take place later and create problems in bilateral relations. Some people assert that the positive developments of 1954 were due to the Papagos government's decision to internationalize the question of Cyprus. They claim that the objective was to demonstrate to the Turkish Cypriots and to Turkey how well the Turks would fare when the island would unite with Greece. But these positive developments in Western Thrace cannot be due to tactical considerations within the framework of the Cypriot policy of the Greek government when viewed against the background of the improvements of the Greek minority's condition in Turkey and the flourishing friendship between Turkey and Greece, which was bound to have positive effects on the condition of minorities.

The softening of the policies of the Turkish and Greek governments toward their respective minorities was confined to the period from 1950 to 1954. Starting with the emergence of the Cyprus question, followed by the disputes in the Aegean, Greek-Turkish relations entered a period of disputes and disagreements. This situation had negative repercussions on the minorities, and neither government had any qualms about using them as a lever to gain advantage in a situation of strained relations.

III. FRIENDSHIP UNDER THE SHADOW OF THE CYPRUS QUESTION (1955–1960)

Two important developments in the postwar world helped reshape the international order as well as Turkish-Greek relations. These were the Cold War and the newly independent states that emerged from colonialism by exercising their right to self-determination (Box 4-12).

The Cold War and the consequent bipolar world were the basis of the closer friendship established between Turkey and Greece. Self-determination and the process of decolonization that followed placed the question of Cyprus firmly on the agenda and damaged that friendship.

From 1950 on, the public's interest in the question of Cyprus was rising; but the two governments, acting within the spirit of Turkish-Greek friendship, sought to keep the matter in the background. But when Turkey formally became a party to this question in 1955, the dispute

Box 4-12. Self-Determination/Self-Government

Self-government denotes autonomous political self-governance without full independence. Self-determination can be defined in three ways.

- 1. It can be defined as the ability of a people to decide on the political, economic, social, and cultural system within the country, which in practice is democracy. The first "pure" example of this is the French Revolution of 14 July 1789. We can call this the "internal" definition. (The American experience is mixed with the "external" aspect.)
- 2. After World War I and especially after World War II, the term also acquired an "external" definition. Although the concept was first embodied in points 6 and 7 of Wilson's Fourteen Points, the first explicit use of the term in international documents occurred in articles 1 and 55 of the UN Charter. Since 1950 the term has meant colonies becoming independent states.
- 3. The right to secede from an independent state is another definition, but this definition does not receive general approval in international relations. Today there are about 600 to 3,000 living languages and 5,000 separate ethnic groups within the world's 184 independent states. Acceptance of this version of self-determination would lead to a chain reaction that could produce fragmentation down to the clan level and create chaos. At present the right of self-determination cannot be claimed against a sovereign and independent state, because the territorial integrity of states and their national unity must be upheld.

If there is a division in a country's territory, with the sea or the territory of another state coming in between, if the separate parts are ethnically and religiously very different, and if the country does not enjoy democratic freedom of expression, however, then the right of secession may find general acceptance and at least may not meet with strong opposition in the international arena. Of course, it all depends on the play of power politics. One trend developing in the West believes that external self-determination might be justified in a country without internal self-determination (that is, democracy).

At the same time, within the terms of the second definition, it is agreed that self-determination is not the right of minorities but the collective right of peoples. When the term "people" has been used in international documents since the 1980s, it usually means indigenous people who are very different culturally and otherwise from the groups that govern the country.

(B. ORAN)

started setting the course of Turkish-Greek relations. The U.S. intervened in the dispute in order to protect NATO's interests. Both countries identified their national interests with NATO's interests, so they decided to reach a mutually agreeable settlement of the question. Thus it became possible, in the first phase of the Cyprus question, to settle the matter within the framework of Turkish-Greek friendship through the establishment of an independent Republic of Cyprus in 1960. This proved not to be a lasting solution, however, and Cyprus became a stumbling block once again in the 1960s. By then it was no longer Turkish-Greek relations that shaped developments in Cyprus, but the other way around, with developments in Cyprus determining the course of Turkish-Greek relations.

A. Political Groupings in Cyprus

The first signs of what was to come in Cyprus appeared during the war years. When the Germans occupied Crete in May 1941, Britain's interest shifted to Cyprus because of its great strategic importance. Britain sent troop reinforcements there and sped up the construction of defensive infrastructure, in which 17,000 Cypriots were employed. The spending of British soldiers stationed in Cyprus, in addition to financial aid from Britain, helped revitalize the island's economy. German control of the Mediterranean made it difficult to import goods, which led to the development of small industries on the island. This too helped boost the economy. The buoyant economy in turn led to a livening up of political activity in Cyprus. The Cypriot Trade Unions Committee (PTUC), established in 1941, intensified its activities. The trade union movement and communism, two movements that would play a big role in the island's political life, got started in this period. All political activity on the island had been banned since the 1931 uprising. The social activism resulted in a loosening up of political life. The British colonial administration announced in 1941 that local elections would be held and decreed that political activities in connection with the elections would be allowed.

Political groups started getting established as a result of this relaxation. The Progressive Party of the Working People (AKEL) was formed in 1941. It would later become one of the strongest Communist parties in the region. The presence of AKEL and its activism led the Orthodox Church, the traditional leader of the island's Greek community, into action. The Cyprus National Party (KEK) came into being with the backing of the church. At the municipal elections held in March 1943, AKEL scored a success, with its candidates becoming mayors of Limassol and Famagusta. The Nationalist Front carried the cities of Nicosia, Larnaca, and Paphos.

The divisions within the Greek Cypriot community that appeared in the 1943 elections were ideologically based, while the divisions within the Turkish Cypriot community were based on personalities. For years Necati Özkan had led the progressive wing of the Turkish Cypriots. Now he was confronted by Fazil Küçük, who enjoyed the backing of the Turkish Consulate. Although Fazil Küçük was the winner in the election, it became necessary to attempt a political restructuring in order to overcome the weakness arising from divisions within the community. The community's weakness was especially disturbing because both AKEL and the Orthodox Church were beginning to espouse enosis (union with Greece). On 18 April 1943 the Turkish Minority Association of the Island of Cyprus (KATAK) came into being, with the participation of both Özkan and Küçük. But the unity of KATAK did not last long. A group led by Küçük left the association, claiming that more rigorous action was necessary against the British administration and the demands for enosis. Fazıl Küçük and his group established the National Turkish Popular Party of Cyprus (KMTHP) on 23 April 1944. As a result of Küçük's increasing popularity within the Turkish community, KATAK and KMTHP merged on 6 November 1949. In 1955 the new entity would be renamed the Cyprus Is Turkish Party (KTP) to underline its opposition to enosis. On 21 June 1949 Necati Özkan established the Cypriot Turkish Unity-Independence Party. As the Cyprus question became more acute and started affecting Turkish-Greek relations, the DP administration in Turkey increased its support for Küçük against Özkan, who was known for his closeness to the opposition CHP in Turkey. The opposition voices among the Cypriot Turks were gradually suppressed, and Küçük emerged as the sole leader.

Toward the end of World War II, these organizations accelerated their activities. AKEL made rapid headway among the workers. In 1944 PTUC adopted a decision acknowledging AKEL's leadership role in the political, economic, and social struggle. Because of its trade-union links, AKEL also increased its activities among Turkish workers. This was causing uneasiness among both nationalist Greeks and the Turkish leadership. The nationalist Greeks established the Confederation of Cypriot workers (SEK) with church backing and thereby created the first split among the workers. There were several attempts at establishing trade unions among the Turks, but the most effective among these was the Turkish Workers' Association of Cyprus, established in 1945. Among its political objectives was to combat enosis and to neutralize the covert activities of AKEL among Turkish workers. It took on the Cypriot Turks who participated in events like general strikes organized by PTUC and AKEL and marginalized them within the Turkish community. It also prevented the spread of leftist movements among Turkish workers. The often tactical references to enosis in AKEL's program and the pressures applied by the Turkish leadership on Turks who happened to be members of AKEL or PTUC prevented the emergence of a leftist movement in Cyprus embracing both communities. Thus it never became possible to establish the only platform that could have led both communities in a common struggle against the British colonial administration.

B. Demands for Enosis after World War II and Turkey's Reaction

Since Britain took over the administration of Cyprus in 1878, the Greek Cypriots had never relented in pressing for enosis at every opportunity. These efforts gathered momentum during World War II and the postwar period. The movement had two separate leaders. AKEL, supported by the working class, was one of them and had gathered much strength during the war. The other was the Orthodox Church, the perennial standard bearer of the Greek people.

It was difficult for the postwar Labor government in Britain to ignore the demand for enosis completely. The rise of Arab nationalism, however, demonstrated that Britain would not be able to stay in Egypt much longer. To maintain its military presence in the Mediterranean, Britain had to hold onto the strategically important island of Cyprus. In these circumstances, the British government sought a compromise and, emphasizing the anti-enosis stance of the Turkish Cypriots, drew up a program of political and economic reforms for Cyprus, which was an nounced on 23 October 1946.

On 28 February 1947 the Greek parliament bowed to the pressure from Cyprus and adopted a resolution call ing for the union of Cyprus with Greece. This resolution had no effect on Britain. The new British governor, Reginald Fletcher, Lord Winster, who arrived on the island on 27 March 1947, launched the promised reform program. A Constituent Assembly was convened on 1 November 1947. Protesting the reforms, the Orthodox Church refused to send representatives. This resulted in the Right not being represented at the Assembly, which consisted of ten Greeks (eight of them from AKEL), seven Turks, one Maronite, and a British judge. Of the nineteen members, two were appointed directly by the British government. Differences emerged as soon as deliberations got underway. The AKEL representatives demanded selfgovernment, while the Turks were opposed to the idea. When Lord Winster introduced his draft Constitution, which made no provision for self-government, on 20 May 1948, the AKEL representatives walked out. It was impossible to continue work with the remainder of the representatives, and the Constituent Assembly was dissolved on 12 August.

After this, AKEL intensified its activities aimed at achieving immediate enosis. On 23 November 1949 it submitted a memorandum seeking self-determination to the UN General Assembly and Security Council, bearing the title "The Cypriot People Accuse Great Britain: A Petition to the United Nations." AKEL's initiative forced the Orthodox Church into action. The Council of the Archbishopric took a decision on 5 December, calling on Britain to arrange a referendum before 15 January 1950. Should Britain fail to do so, the church threatened to organize its own referendum. The referendum took place after Sunday mass on 15 January and, because of insufficient participation, continued the following Sunday. The referendum showed that 96% of the participants had voted for enosis. It should not be forgotten, however, that the Turks did not participate in this referendum. Despite this, the church went ahead and sent emissaries to different countries and organizations describing the results of the referendum as reflecting the will of the Cypriots. This placed the church ahead of its rival AKEL in its bid to lead the Greek Cypriots. When the bishop of Kition, Mihael Mouskos, was elected archbishop on 18 October 1950 and assumed his post as Makarios III, the church became even more politically active in the enosis campaign.

As Makarios intensified his agitation after 1950 in the quest for enosis and extended his activities to Greece, the Greek government was left in a quandary. It was feeling the increasing pressure of public opinion, which supported enosis, but at the same time felt that its national interest as a member of the Western alliance called for it to preserve good relations with Britain and Turkey. The Greek government's Cyprus policy up to 1954 can be described as a search for a solution to the question through bilateral negotiations with Britain. In November 1951 Britain was offered a lease on four bases in Greece for ninetynine years if it agreed to enosis, but it did not respond. The coming to power of Papagos after the election of 19 November 1952 raised the hopes of the champions of enosis.

As the Greek politician who was most concerned with Cyprus, Papagos had promised to take the issue to the UN if he came to power. But he did not deviate from the traditional policy and declared that he preferred to solve the question through bilateral talks with Britain. The opportunity for this came when Britain's foreign secretary, Anthony Eden, visited Greece in September 1953 to recover from an illness. On that occasion, Papagos and Eden held two informal meetings. When Papagos inquired about Britain's intentions, he was sharply rebuked by Eden. Britain did not accept that Cyprus was an issue either then or in the future. Eden told Papagos that he did not want to discuss the issue. He added sarcastically that more Greeks lived in New York and Alexandria than in Cyprus and asked Papagos if Greece was going to claim these places too.

On 28 July 1954 the undersecretary of the Colonial Office, Henry Hopkinson, made a statement in the House of Commons, which constituted the last straw for Greece. He declared that some places in the British Commonwealth could never expect to be fully independent because of their special circumstances. It was clear that Hopkinson had Cyprus in mind when making his statement. At that time, Britain had reached an agreement with Egypt to withdraw its troops from the Suez Canal zone. This agreement had been the result of U.S. prodding, and now Cyprus was Britain's only remaining possession in the Mediterranean, except for Malta. It is likely that Hopkinson was relying on U.S. backing in connection with Cyprus when he made his statement. In view of these developments, Greece abandoned its policy based on bilateral diplomacy and decided to shift to a policy of internationalizing the issue. One of the factors that facilitated this shift was the Turkish government's posture vis-à-vis the Cyprus question after World War II.

Between the two world wars, the Cypriot Turks closely followed the Kemalist reforms being carried out in Turkey, but Turkey kept its dealings with its Cypriot kin confined to the cultural sphere. As a matter of fact, when the Greek Cypriots intensified their activities in favor of enosis in the postwar period, they were met with opposition from the Turkish Cypriots who had studied in Turkey or who were settled there, rather than from the Turkish government. From 1948 on, they set up Cypriot Turkish Cultural Associations in Ankara and İstanbul and established contacts with the press. The newspapers Tasvir, Vatan, and particularly Hürriyet started publishing news and commentary on Cyprus, and the public's attention was increasingly drawn to the subject. The government maintained its cautious approach, however, to avoid harming relations with Britain and Greece. On 23 January 1950 the minister of foreign affairs, Necmettin Sadak, declared: "There is no such thing as a Cyprus question... The British government does not intend to transfer the island of Cyprus to another state. This being the case, there is no need for our youth to get excited. They need not exert themselves for nothing" (Ulus, 24 January 1950, quoted in Gürel 1985, p. 74). Despite this effort to appease public opinion, the arrival of a succession of delegations from Cyprus forced the government to take an interest in the matter. In March 1950 Sadak declared that all possible assistance would be provided to the Turkish Cypriots, and verbal support followed.

In the election campaign of 1950, the election manifestos of the CHP and the DP did not contain any reference to Cyprus. The minister of foreign affairs of the DP government, Fuat Köprülü, pursued the line of his predecessor and declared on 20 June 1950 in reply to a question in a press interview that there was no Cyprus question. The DP government maintained the same position in its international dealings. When the Greek prime minister Sophocles Venizelos visited Ankara in 1951, he responded to the pressure exerted on him by Greek and Greek Cypriot public opinion and raised the question of Cyprus. Menderes appeased his Greek counterpart by assuring him that a solution would be found within the framework of Turkish-Greek friendship. The rising passions in connection with Cyprus after 1950 did not result in any changes in Turkey's policy. Turkey was incapable of formulating a policy without reference to NATO and gave priority to friendship with Britain and Greece within the Western alliance. In these circumstances Ankara was left with no Cypriot policy, and all it could do was back Britain's stand on the issue. It announced that it wanted to see the status quo maintained on the island; but if there was to be a change, Turkey had to be consulted. This approach to the question, which encouraged the Greek government to press on, lasted until 1955, when British action made Turkey a party to the dispute.

c. The Internationalization of the Question and the Beginning of EOKA Activities

As noted above, Hopkinson's speech produced a sharp reaction both in Greece and among the Greek Cypriots. Papagos applied to the UN Secretariat on 16 August 1954, calling for an item to be inserted in the agenda of the ninth session of the General Assembly entitled "The Implementation of the Principle of Equal Rights and Self-Determination for the Inhabitants of the Island of Cyprus under the Aegis of the UN." The question of Cyprus had been internationalized and has remained on the international agenda to this day.

The General Assembly took up the question on 17 December 1954, with interventions from the interested parties stating their views. These views can be summarized as follows.

- 1. Britain and Turkey declared that British sovereignty over Cyprus was an internationally recognized fact. Consequently, it should be considered a question of domestic jurisdiction and therefore not susceptible to discussion in the UN. Greece claimed that the UN was competent to consider the issue.
- 2. Britain and Turkey pointed out that the transfer of sovereignty over Cyprus to Britain took place according to the multilateral Treaty of Lausanne, also signed by Greece. For Greece to ignore the treaty and claim rights over a British territory and for the General Assembly to consider such a claim would set a very dangerous precedent from the point of view of international law. Greece claimed that it had signed the treaty at Lausanne as a witness of Turkey's recognition of the annexation of Cyprus by Britain, but its signing did not imply Greek recognition of the annexation.

- 3. Britain drew attention to the strategic importance of Cyprus and explained that it could not give up sovereignty. Greece accepted this reasoning but added that the strategic value of bases surrounded by an unfriendly population would be much diminished.
- 4. Britain and Turkey noted the presence of the Turks living on the island who were against enosis and whose views had not been taken into account. To consider this question in the General Assembly in these circumstances would bring about disturbances on the island. Greece stressed that if the principle of self-determination would be applied, the Turkish Cypriots would enjoy all the minority rights enjoyed by the Turkish minority in Western Thrace.
- 5. Britain and Turkey used the argument of geographic proximity, declaring that the island was closer to Turkey and Syria than it was to Greece. The Turkish representative Selim Sarper cited the example of the Aaland Islands and claimed that Cyprus formed part of Anatolia from the geographic, historical, economic, and ethnic points of view.
- Britain and Turkey pointed out that the island had never been under Greek sovereignty historically.

After long deliberations, the UN General Assembly resolved that it would not be appropriate to reach a decision on Cyprus at that time. The General Assembly thus refused to place Greece's application on its agenda. Britain had received the support of all NATO members, with the exception of Iceland, while Greece got the support of the Eastern Bloc, the Latin American states, and the newly independent states. Both sides had reasons for being satisfied with the result. In the view of Britain and Turkey, the General Assembly had not accepted the arguments for enosis, because it refused to consider the issue. Greece and the Cypriot Greeks noted that the decision not to consider the issue was taken with the proviso "for the time being." The door was left open to the possibility of taking up the question at another time in the future.

From 1950 on, Makarios was pushing Greece to internationalize the issue by taking it to the United Nations. At the same time, he was making preparations for resorting to armed action to force Britain's hand, in case internationalization did not produce the desired results. To this end, he was in contact with Georgios Grivas, one of the leaders of the secret organization X, known as Chi in Greek. A native of Cyprus, he had moved to Greece, joined the army, lived in Greece after retirement, and returned to the island in 1951 to prepare for guerrilla warfare. In his contacts with Grivas, Makarios told him that he wanted armed action to be confined to acts of sabotage. He did not want Grivas, who would assume the command of an armed force, to break loose from his control and emerge as an alternative leader.

When the Greek Cypriots failed to obtain the result they were seeking from the UN, Makarios gave Grivas the green light, with the approval of the Greek government. Grivas set up the National Organization of the Cypriot Struggle (EOKA), which carried out its first acts of sabotage on 1 April 1955. The action was directed against British officers, policemen, and government officials. It also targeted civilian Greek Cypriot members of AKEL, who were regarded as traitors by EOKA.

With the eruption and intensification of violence, the opposition in Britain started criticizing the government's policies in Cyprus. This led the British government to revise its policies and adopt a three-stage plan for Cyprus:

- 1. A conference would be convened, to be attended by Britain, Greece, and Turkey.
- 2. Preparations would be made for a draft Constitution.
- 3. An economic development program for Cyprus would be introduced.

As Britain prepared for a conference in London on this issue, its plans were based on the assumption that Turkey would be turned into one of the parties in the dispute.

D. The London Conference and the Events of 6–7 September

On 20 June 1955 the British government issued invitations to the Greek and Turkish governments to attend a conference in London that would take up the political and defense issues of the eastern Mediterranean. Although Cyprus was not specifically mentioned among the issues to be taken up at the conference, it was clear that the sole subject for discussion would be Cyprus. Britain was being careful not to upset Greece by including Cyprus explicitly among the issues to be taken up at a conference to which Turkey was also invited.

Turkey accepted the invitation right away. Greece also accepted the invitation, but after early hesitations.

The objection, as usual, came from the island. Makarios saw a trap in Britain's initiative and announced that Greece should accept the invitation only on condition that Britain agree to the principle of self-determination for the Cypriot people. Greece was caught in a dilemma, with public opinion pulling in one direction and its national interest in another. Finally, it accepted the invitation unconditionally, because it dared not risk impairing its relations with its allies.

The London Conference commenced its work on 29 August 1955. The first speaker was British foreign secretary Harold Macmillan, who declared that it was not enough for Britain to have bases in Cyprus to carry out its commitments under NATO and the Baghdad Pact. It must have full control of the entire island. His Greek counterpart, Stefanos Stefanopoulos, stressed that the island's inhabitants must be able to exercise their right of self-determination, but this did not require the removal of Britain's military presence from the island. The military bases located in Cyprus were adequate for defending Britain's strategic interests in the region. Finally, minister of foreign affairs Fatin Rüştü Zorlu spoke for Turkey. He started by reminding everyone of the island's proximity to Turkey, the presence of the Turkish community in Cyprus, and the island's historical, cultural, and economic links with Turkey. He then dwelt on the island's strategic significance for Turkey. If Cyprus was acquired by a state that already possessed the islands off Turkey's western coastline, it could effectively encircle Turkey. No country could totally leave its security to such an extent at the mercy of another country, no matter how friendly. Zorlu explained that Turkey was satisfied with the status quo and wanted to see it maintained. If there was to be any change in the status quo, however, the island must revert to its former owner, Turkey.

Britain's initiative had turned Turkey into a party to the dispute, and for the first time Turkey had formulated a Cyprus policy. Turkey had selected not Britain but Greece as its adversary and was conveying the message to all that Britain's departure from Cyprus would result in differences, and perhaps worse, not only between the Turkish and Greek Cypriots but also between the two NATO allies, Greece and Turkey.

On 6 September Macmillan submitted the reform package for Cyprus and stated that, with the new Constitution, Cyprus would become self-governing. Turkey rejected the British proposals because they went too far, while Greece rejected them because they did not adequately respond to the wishes of the Cypriots. The conference was deadlocked, but it was the events of 6–7 September 1955 that took place in Turkey (Box 4-13) that caused the conference to break up as a failure.

The events of 6–7 September had two important consequences. The first was a practice that Turkey would later resort to repeatedly: whenever Ankara felt under pressure in Cyprus, it would respond by exerting pressure on the minorities who were its own citizens. The second consequence was that the damage inflicted on Turkish-Greek friendship could never be fully repaired. The first victim of this state of affairs was the Balkan Pact, which turned out to be stillborn.

E. Britain's Cyprus Proposals and Turkey's Espousal of the Partition Plan

Greece's second attempt to inscribe Cyprus in the UN General Assembly's agenda in 1955 was also rejected. The events of 6-7 September had brought relations between Athens and Ankara to the breaking point. Inevitably, these developments would have ugly repercussions in Cyprus. EOKA intensified its activities, while the Cypriot Turkish community, heartened by Turkey's involvement in the dispute, also went into action. The KMTHP, led by Küçük, turned itself into the Cyprus Is Turkish Party, and Volkan was established as the first Turkish resistance movement. Volkan distributed tracts declaring that EOKA would meet with an immediate response if it attacked the Turkish community or Turkish officials and policemen. The British administration tended to recruit Turks as policemen, and EOKA was prone to attacking them as the representatives of the British administration. In these circumstances, it was easy to conclude that intercommunal strife would spread and intensify.

Makarios was very intransigent in his dealings with the new governor, Marshal John Harding. He held that Britain had to accept the principle of self-determination before discussing the modalities of self-government. He was against the Turkish government's participation in the negotiations. Makarios also insisted on restricting the governor's area of competence and transferring some of the governor's responsibilities to the new government. Finally, Makarios wanted an amnesty for all EOKA activists. The British government started perceiving Makarios as the sole obstacle to constitutional reform and, citing his links to EOKA, exiled him to the Seychelles Islands on 9 March 1956.

After the exiling of Makarios, EOKA intensified its acts of violence. The Turkish community was beginning to perceive this violence as directed against it. In their visits to Ankara, the Turkish leaders were explaining the gravity of the situation on the island and seeking

Box 4-13. The Events of 6-7 September

Turkish public opinion about Cyprus was getting mobilized even before the Turkish delegation left for the London Conference. A group from the National Turkish Student Association, a nationalistic organization under the chairmanship of Hikmet Bil, had formed the Cyprus Is Turkish Society. The press, led by high-circulation Hürriyet, was taking a close interest in the Cyprus dispute. On 24 August 1955 Adnan Menderes made a speech highly critical of Greece.

At a time when tension was running high, the pro-government Istanbul Ekspres newspaper ran a second edition announcing that Atatürk's house in Salonica had been bombed on 6 September. The newspaper's editor, G. Sipahioğlu, would later claim that the semiofficial news agency Anadolu Ajansı had been the first to release the news of the bombing. The Cyprus Is Turkish Society then organized a demonstration in Istanbul. In a short time the demonstration degenerated into a mass melee in which the rabble attacked and pillaged properties, churches, and schools belonging mostly to the Greek minority. The police stood by passively as the burning and looting went on over several hours. Similar disturbances took place in Izmir, where the Greek Consulate and the Greek stand at the International Fair were burned down and the homes belonging to minorities and Levantines (foreign subjects settled in Turkey for centuries) were looted. When the news of these events reached Menderes, he cut short his journey to Ankara and returned to Istanbul. Martial law was declared in Istanbul and Izmir. In the course of the events of 6-7 September, a number of elderly Greeks were killed, thirty-five people were injured, and 5,622 buildings were destroyed. The material damage was estimated to run to $300 million. But the worst damage was inflicted on Turkey's international image, with frequent references abroad to Turkish barbarism.

The Turkish government issued an official statement qualifying the events as a national calamity and expressing profound regrets. The Cyprus Is Turkish Society was closed down, and eighty seven of its members were arrested. Most of the three thousand people who were also arrested were known as leftists, because the government announced that the events were the work of Communists.

Greece sent a protest to the Turkish government, and the Greek press claimed that the events were planned by the authorities. To normalize the tense relations between the two countries, the Greek flag was hoisted on the building of the Greek Consulate in izmir in an official ceremony held on 24 October. With U.S. mediation, bilateral relations were repaired in a relatively short time.

It never became completely clear who was behind these events. The investigation conducted in Greece revealed that the sound bomb that went off in Atatürk's house was provided to an employee of the Turkish Consulate by a student from Western Thrace in the service of Turkish intelligence. Retired general Sabri Yirmibeşoğlu, however, speaking to a journalist about the events and obviously referring to the "deep state" (see Box 7-5 in Section 7), said: "6-7 September was a Special Warfare [Department] work and it achieved its purpose. Wasn't it a magnificent organization?" (Fatih Güllapoğlu, Tanksız Topsuz Harekat [İstanbul: Tekin Yayınevi, 1991], p. 104).

At the trials conducted at Yassiada following the 27 May coup, the court concluded that Menderes and Fatin Rüstü Zorlu were responsible for planning the events. But given the politically motivated character of the court's verdicts and the inability of Zorlu to get a hearing for witnesses who might testify in his favor, it is difficult to claim that the trial was able to identify those who were responsible for the events. Nevertheless, there is no doubt that the Turkish government did at least encourage the events by remaining passive. The demonstrators were not even prevented from traveling to the neighboring islands of Islanbul to carry out their destruction.

help. Barriers were being set up in Nicosia between the neighborhoods where the two communities lived, dividing the city into two separate zones. Harding had decreed a state of emergency in the island under which measures were allowed to stem EOKA activities and violence. But they were not producing the desired results and were inviting criticism from the opposition in London, which wanted to know why the island was not granted self-determination. In justifying its actions, the British government cited Turkey as the obstacle to granting self-determination to Cyprus, whereas it was actually developments in Egypt that made it necessary for Britain to hold onto the island.

When Harding's strong measures proved fruitless, Britain shifted its policy. A constitutional expert, Lord C.J.R. Radcliffe, went to Cyprus in July 1956 to prepare a new Constitution but found no Greek Cypriot ready to discuss the issue. After the exiling of Makarios, the leadership of the Greek Cypriot community had passed to EOKA, which refused to talk to the British before Makarios.

rios was allowed to return. All contacts between the two sides had been severed, and the British administration continued to implement its repressive measures with the utmost severity. EOKA declared a unilateral cease-fire on 16 August 1956. It said that it wanted to test the sincerity of the British administration, which claimed that it was EOKA violence that was hindering the search for a solution. The cease-fire did not result in any change in Britain's policies. The 1956 Suez operation was being planned at that time, and Cyprus was of vital strategic importance. Consequently, EOKA resumed the violence. The international situation had altered significantly.

The 1956 Suez operation was a failure for Britain, which had profound effects on the fate of Cyprus. Britain ceased to be the paramount power in the region after this failure, and its role as the guardian of Western interests was taken over by the U.S. through the Eisenhower Doctrine of 1957. The island's strategic value for Britain had diminished. Britain could now manage with just military bases in Cyprus.

On 19 December 1956 Britain's colonial secretary, Alan Lennox-Boyd, paid a visit to Athens and Ankara, where he announced that Britain agreed to the implementation of the principle of self-determination for Cyprus. He added that among the alternative solutions that would be put before the Cypriots was the partition of the island. Britain was resorting to its old practice of "divide and rule."

On the day when Lennox-Boyd was announcing Britain's plans, Lord Radcliffe disclosed the draft Constitution for Cyprus. The legislature would have thirty-six members. A quota of six members would be set aside for the Turks and the governor's appointees, with the majority of seats allocated to the Greeks. Defense, public order, and foreign relations would be the responsibility of the governor. There were also provisions allowing Britain to use Cyprus as a base to carry out its international commitments.

Makarios, who was still in exile, refused to consider this draft. Greece announced that the draft was formulated in a way that would maintain the colonial administration and, as such, was far from being a final solution to the problem. The colonial secretary's announcement that the island might have to be partitioned was received very positively by the Turkish government, which declared that Radcliffe's draft Constitution contained the elements that could lead to a final solution and that it would consider the proposals in that light. Turkey's positive approach reflected its changed Cyprus policy, which was now based on the thesis of partition.

The idea of partition—the division of Cyprus between Turkey and Greece—was first advanced in the July 1955 issue of the journal Forum published in Ankara. Subsequently, Greek foreign minister Evangelos Averoff had broached the idea with the Turkish ambassador, Settar İlksel; but at that time the Turkish government did not look kindly upon an idea coming from the Greek government.

Although Turkey was cool toward the idea at first, it warmed up after Britain made its proposal of 19 December. On 28 December Prime Minister Menderes made a statement in the TGNA, explaining partition and declaring that this was now Turkey's official policy. İnönü, the leader of the opposition, also supported this thesis. The public took up the idea right away and replaced the old battle cry "Cyprus or death" with "Partition or death" at meetings and demonstrations. By the time the TGNA adopted a resolution in favor of partition on 16 June 1958, however, different formulas were being mooted in the diplomatic contacts on Cyprus.

While Britain was preparing draft Constitutions and the pros and cons of the partition formula were being debated, Greece was pressing on with its policy of internationalizing the question. In 1956 Greece applied once again to the UN with the request that the granting of the right to self-determination to Cyprus be placed on the agenda. That year, Britain too resorted to the UN and accused Greece of supporting terrorism in Cyprus. The two applications were merged into one agenda item, which was taken up at the General Assembly on 18 February 1957. In the end, an Indian draft resolution was adopted with fifty-seven votes and one abstention. The resolution called for a peaceful, democratic, and just solution and expressed the hope that negotiations leading to such a solution would be undertaken in an atmosphere of peace and free expression.

The Turkish side welcomed the resolution as a positive step. Ankara saw the resolution as a formal acknowledgment by the UN of Turkey as a party and of the Turkish Cypriot community as an entity with equal rights. The resolution was also seen as a rejection of enosis. Greece saw things in a completely different light. Athens held that the negotiations aimed at a peaceful, democratic, and just solution had to take place between Britain and the Cypriot people. Thus Greece was changing its policy as a consequence of the resolution, which had not endorsed its previous policy. Greece now argued that it was not a party to the question, thereby hoping to remove Turkey as a party through this shift. For Greece, the question was now a dispute between Britain and the Cypriot people. By this argument, Greece abandoned its previous course of internationalizing the issue and now adopted the position that this was an internal issue.

Britain's position also had shifted and was now the mirror image of Greece's position. London had previously maintained that Cyprus was a domestic issue. Now it was stressing the issue's international character. Britain was now reconciled to maintaining some bases in Cyprus and was anxious to get rid of the problem, which was causing it political headaches at home as well as material and moral losses on the island. Britain's change, of course, was essentially due to the shifting balances in the Middle East. The U.S. announced that the question could be resolved within NATO.

After the Suez debacle, Prime Minister Eden resigned and was replaced by Harold Macmillan. In March 1957 the new government canceled the order exiling Makarios. After calming the atmosphere in Cyprus, steps were taken to start tripartite negotiations within NATO. The U.S. supported a policy that would grant Cyprus independence after guaranteeing the preservation of the British bases on the island. But Makarios was opposed to plans that were conceived within the framework of any organization other than the UN and was able to influence the Greek government to support his stance.

Having adopted the partition thesis, Turkey and the Cypriot Turkish community were opposed to the U.S. formula based on independence. The 1957 election campaign was in full swing in Turkey. In this atmosphere, the subject of Cyprus was a recurring theme, and anti-Greek rhetoric was heard in all quarters. This negative environment was having its effect on the Greek minority in İstanbul. Patriarch Athenagoras felt obliged to make a statement on 30 November 1957 to refute his critics by declaring his attachment to the Turkish homeland and emphasizing that as a religious institution the patriarchate had no interest in the Cyprus issue, which was purely political. This statement failed to appease his critics, who blamed him for not condemning Makarios.

Meanwhile a Greek-sponsored draft resolution at the UN failed to get the requisite number of votes. Turkey noted that as it insisted on partition, however, it was losing ground to Greece at the UN.

Late in 1957 Britain came up with a succession of plans to resolve the question of Cyprus. The first of these was the Foot Plan, named after the new governor, Hugh Foot, who arrived in Cyprus on 3 December. The Foot Plan contained the following principles for resolving the question: (1) There was to be a transitional period of five to seven years before the final solution. (2) Assurances would be given to the parties that a solution would not be reached without the approval of the Cypriot Greeks and Turks. (3) The state of emergency would be lifted on the island, and Makarios would be allowed to return. (4) Negotiations would be undertaken with the leaders of the two communities to determine the system of selfgovernment. Turkey rejected the plan, because it was opposed to Makarios's return to the island and the lifting of the state of emergency. Greece was opposed to Turkey's becoming a party with equal rights. Athens also wanted to see the final solution right away. It was obvious that the Foot Plan would not be implemented.

Britain then proposed the Macmillan Plan on 19 June 1958. Under this plan, a new Constitution would be drafted in consultation with the two communities as well as Turkey and Greece. The new Constitution would have the following basic features. (1) Each community would have a separate assembly of representatives, which would be responsible for all matters concerning its community. (2) A council under the chairmanship of the governor would be set up, consisting of two members representing the governments of Turkey and Greece plus four Greek and two Turkish Cypriot members. (3) The governor would be responsible for foreign relations, defense, and internal security. In exercising these responsibilities, the governor would consult with the representatives of Turkey and Greece. (4) The representatives of Turkey and Greece could have recourse to arbitrators if they considered a law to be discriminatory.

According to the Macmillan Plan, the status of the island would remain fixed for seven years, which meant that British sovereignty would be maintained during this interval. At the end of this period, Britain would be prepared to share sovereignty with its allies, Turkey and Greece, if Turkey and Greece would agree to continue their cooperation and if the British could continue using the military bases and facilities on the island.

The new plan was rejected by all of the parties. Makarios and Greece feared that the plan might lead to partition, while Küçük and Denktaş, along with Turkey, feared that the plan might pave the way for enosis. Meanwhile developments in Turkey and Cyprus were making it harder to reach a solution. "Partition or death" demonstrations were being organized in Turkey, and public opinion, which had been aroused by the government, was circumscribing the government's freedom of maneuver. As the solution became more elusive, the Greek Cypriot-British confrontation on the island was turning into a general Greek Cypriot-Turkish Cypriot confrontation.

It must be said that the Turkish Resistance Organization (TMT), formed on 1 August 1958, was contributing to the deteriorating situation. The TMT was established with covert economic and military support from Turkey. It claimed that its purpose was to be the resistance organization of the Cypriot Turkish community in the face of EOKA aggression. But it also served another, unmentioned purpose. It fomented violence between Turks and Greeks in order to demonstrate that the two communities could not coexist. By this tactic, the TMT was striving to make partition acceptable as a solution (Hasgüler, pp. 125–26).

Macmillan revised his draft in August 1958, but this too was rejected by the Greek Cypriots and Greece because it provided for separate local administrations. Turkey accepted the revised version, however, even though it was less favorable from a Turkish point of view, and Ankara sent its representatives to Cyprus right away. Under U.S. pressure, Turkey was softening its uncompromising stand. Turkish-British cooperation in Cyprus triggered EOKA violence once again, this time directed against civilian targets. With TMT reacting in the same fashion, intercommunal strife escalated, as did the tough countermeasures of the British administration. The question of Cyprus was now completely deadlocked.

F. The Solution: Independent Cyprus.

The deadlock in Cyprus was causing concern in the U.S., the leader of the Western alliance during the Cold War. The escalating intercommunal violence was leading to a possible Turkish-Greek clash, which could weaken NATO's southeastern flank and strengthen the USSR in the region. When the Macmillan Plan failed to produce a solution, the U.S. started pressing Ankara and Athens to agree to the independence formula. Athens was successful in its efforts to persuade Grivas and Makarios, and the archbishop gave his consent to the independence formula in September 1958.

Makarios had assessed the situation realistically. He approved the independence solution in preference to partition or the granting of rights to Turks, which could not be subsequently withdrawn. According to Makarios, there would be a period of self-government, to be followed by an independent Cypriot state that would have no links with either Greece or Turkey. Cypriot independence was to be guaranteed by the UN. The new state would grant the Turks minority rights and would remain a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Turkey reacted sharply to Makarios's independence solution and declared that it would never accept a formula in which the Turkish community would have the status of a minority.

Eventually the First Committee of the UN General Assembly adopted a resolution calling for a conference with the participation of the interested three governments and the representatives of Cyprus. Zorlu and Averoff undertook to be helpful in the search for a solution. At the NATO meeting of December 1958, the parties declared that they had abandoned the enosis and partition solutions. This sudden reversal of policy by the Turkish government caused dismay among the Turkish public and the Turkish-Cypriot leadership. To understand the reason for this change, we must assess the situation from a broader perspective.

The escalating armed struggle between the Turks and Greeks of Cyprus throughout the summer of 1958 was straining relations between Ankara and Athens and threatening to drag the two countries to the brink of war. A breach in the southeastern flank of NATO would serve the interests of Moscow, which had direct links with AKEL and was a backer of Makarios, who was a supporter of the nonaligned movement. At this point, the U.S. came into the picture and insisted on a solution, using its influence with the Menderes and Karamanlis governments. It was not easy to find a solution that would completely satisfy the Turkish and Greek people, who had been aroused over many years, as well as the Turkish and Greek Cypriot leaders. In the bipolar world, however, countries like Turkey and Greece, dependent on the West economically and militarily, were not in a position to put up much resistance. Both sides agreed to the independence formula. This outcome was seen as a surprise; but given the circumstances of the day and the situation of the two governments, it is easy to see why they would agree to this formula. The two governments had identified their national interests with NATO's interests; consequently, when NATO's interests were at stake, they were ready to abandon the national policies adopted by their respective parliaments.

1. The Zurich and London Conferences

Throughout January 1959 Turkish and Greek diplomats were engaged in the elaboration of the details concerning the establishment of the independent Republic of Cyprus. During this period Karamanlis was briefing Makarios and trying to keep him on his side. When the preparations were completed, Menderes, Karamanlis, Zorlu, and Averoff met in Zurich on 6 February 1959.

During the Zurich negotiations, the meeting reached a deadlock over Turkey's insistence on the establishment of a joint military headquarters and its demand for bases on the island and for a higher number of troops to be stationed there. Greece eventually agreed to a joint headquarters, and Turkey agreed to give up its demand for bases and a higher number of troops. A joint communiqué was issued on 11 February, announcing that Turkey and Greece were agreed on an overall plan for a solution.

At the Zurich meeting, Menderes and Karamanlis signed the following documents: (a) a gentlemen's agreement designed to clarify the contents and meaning of the documents signed in Zurich, including definitions that would facilitate their implementation; (b) a treaty that contained the constitutional framework of the independent Republic of Cyprus consisting of twenty-seven articles and an annex; and (c) a treaty of alliance between the Republic of Cyprus, Turkey, and Greece.

In addition, the Treaty of Guarantee between the Republic of Cyprus, Britain, Turkey, and Greece was initialed.

The treaties signed and initialed by Turkey and Greece had to be signed also by Britain and the two Cypriot communities. As Zorlu and Averoff were proceeding to London on 11 February, Karamanlis returned to Athens and met with Makarios. At this meeting, Makarios raised no objections to the Zurich documents; but when he was invited to London shortly afterward to sign the documents, he started having second thoughts.

Makarios's ambivalence was due to his being under two conflicting pressures. On the one hand, Grivas and the EOKA activists were against independence and were pressuring Makarios under their battle cry "Only enosis." The archbishop was fearful of losing the leadership of the Greek community to Grivas by appearing to be making concessions. On the other hand, after having exhausted all the means at its disposal to help the Cypriots, the government of Greece was insisting. Makarios talked to Karamanlis one last time to inform him that he was against the Treaty of Guarantee. Having failed to persuade Karamanlis, he agreed to go to London. After this, it would be Makarios's turn to seek to persuade Grivas.

The London Conference was scheduled to convene on 17 February. A day before the scheduled opening, Makarios made one last attempt to change the course of events. He declared that, having failed to persuade other Greek Cypriot leaders, he would not sign the documents approved in Zurich unless they were renegotiated and revised. Despite this negative development, the Turkish and Greek prime ministers decided to proceed to London as planned. On the evening of 17 February Karamanlis informed Makarios that he would go ahead and sign the treaties and that, if they chose, the Greek Cypriots could pursue their struggle without Greece's backing. When Makarios announced on 18 February that he had come to London to confer and not to sign any documents, British foreign secretary Selwyn Lloyd gave him until 9:45 the next morning to reach a final decision. Makarios declared that this was the longest and most difficult night of his life but relented on 19 February, allowing the signing ceremony to go ahead. Menderes signed in his hospital bed, where he was recovering after a plane crash. Thus the first phase of the question of Cyprus, which had been festering for fifteen years, was settled with the signing of the legal documents that established the independent Republic of Cyprus.

2. The London Treaties and the TGNA

The London Treaties were signed on 19 February by the prime ministers of Britain, Greece, and Turkey and by Makarios and Fazil Küçük on behalf of the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities, respectively. They consist of the following documents: (a) the Basic Treaty concerning the Establishment of the Republic of Cyprus; (b) the Treaty of Guarantee between Britain, Greece, Turkey, and the Republic of Cyprus; (c) the Treaty of Alliance between the Republic of Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey; (d) Britain's declaration of 17 February 1959 to the effect that the British government agreed to these documents on the condition that certain provisions regarding bases were inserted in them; (e) the declaration of the Greek and Turkish foreign ministers, agreeing to the British Declaration; (f) Makarios's declaration that he agreed to the documents signed in London; (g) Küçük's declaration that he agreed to the documents signed in London; and (h) the convention containing the provisional measures to be taken in connection with the implementation of the Constitution of Cyprus and other relevant documents. The following documents were the most important.

The Basic Treaty concerning the Establishment of the Republic of Cyprus

According to this treaty, Cyprus was an independent republic under a presidential system of government. The president would be a Greek Cypriot and the vice-president a Turkish Cypriot, to be elected by their respective communities for a term of five years by universal suffrage. Whenever the president and vice-president were unable to carry out their responsibilities, the Greek Speaker and the Turkish Deputy Speaker would substitute for them. The official languages of the Republic would be Greek and Turkish, and all official documents would be written in these languages. The official flag of the state would be in a neutral color and design to be determined by the president and the vice-president. On national days of Greece and Turkey, however, the flags of both countries could be hoisted, along with the Cypriot flag, and these holidays could be celebrated in Cyprus.

The House of Representatives, consisting of fifty members to be elected separately by each community through universal suffrage for a term of five years, would exercise legislative power. The membership of this body would be 70% Greek-Cypriot and 30% Turkish-Cypriot. All questions not within the competence of the two Communal Assemblies would be dealt with by the House of Representatives. Differences over competence would be referred for a decision to the Supreme Constitutional Court, consisting of a Turkish and a Greek Cypriot judge to be selected by the president and vice-president in agreement and a third neutral judge. The House of Representatives would make its decisions by simple majority. Constitutional changes would require a two-thirds majority of the Greek representatives as well as of the Turkish representatives. Decisions concerning the holding of elections, municipalities, customs duties, and taxes would require separate voting by the Greek and Turkish members. Each community would have its own communal assembly and would decide on the size of the membership of its assembly. The communal assemblies would be responsible for matters dealing with religion, education, and personal status and would levy taxes on the members of their respective communities.

Executive power would be exercised by the president, vice-president, and Council of Ministers. The Council of Ministers would consist of seven Greeks appointed by the president and three Turks appointed by the vice-president. One of the cabinet posts responsible for foreign affairs, defense, or finance would be assigned to a Turk. The president and vice-president could singly or conjointly veto any decision or legislation dealing with foreign affairs, defense, or security. This right of veto would not apply in the case of Cyprus joining an international organization or an alliance that included both Turkey and Greece.

At all levels of the public administration, all positions would be allotted to Greeks and Turks in the proportion of 70-30. This ratio would also apply to the police force and the gendarmerie, whose total personnel should not exceed 2,000.

Cyprus was to have a 2,000-man army, consisting of 60% Greek and 40% Turkish Cypriots. The commander and his deputy both in the army and in the police force/gendarmerie were to be from different communities and were to be appointed by the president and vice-president in agreement. One of the commanders was to be a Turk.

The Turks were to have separate municipalities in the five largest towns, where coordination committees would be set up to ensure cooperation between the two communities in carrying out joint activities. In four years' time, the president and vice-president were to decide whether the practice of separate municipalities would be continued.

In the area of judicial power, the following provisions applied. If both the plaintiff and the defendant were of the same community, a court consisting of judges from their community would handle their case. If the plaintiff and the defendant belonged to different communities, a mixed court appointed by the Supreme Court would be in charge. The Supreme Court would consist of two Greek-Cypriot judges and one Turkish-Cypriot judge selected by the president and vice-president plus a neutral judge who would preside and have two votes.

The Basic Treaty regulated every aspect of the Republic of Cyprus in great detail. The Treaty of Guarantee and the Treaty of Alliance formed part of the Constitution of the new state. Enosis and partition were prohibited. In all agreements that Cyprus entered into, Britain, Greece, and Turkey would enjoy most-favored-nation status. Greece and Turkey would have the rights to provide financial assistance to the educational, cultural, sports, and charitable organizations of their respective communities.

b. The Treaty of Guarantee

Article 1 of the Treaty of Guarantee signed by the Republic of Cyprus with Britain, Turkey, and Greece contained the following provisions: "The Republic of Cyprus undertakes to ensure the maintenance of its independence, territorial integrity, and security, as well a respect for its Constitution. It undertakes not to participate, in whole or in part, in any political or economic union with any State whatsoever. It accordingly declares prohibited any activity likely to promote, directly or indirectly, either union with any other State or partition of the island." In article 2 Britain, Turkey, and Greece recognized this undertaking and provided their guarantee. Article 3 guaranteed Britain's rights in Cyprus: "The Republic of Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey undertake to respect the integrity of the areas retained under United Kingdom sovereignty at the time of the establishment of the Republic of Cyprus." Article 4 concerned the measures to be taken in case of noncompliance: "In the event of a breach of the provisions of the present Treaty, Greece, Turkey, and the United Kingdom undertake to consult together with respect to the representations or measures necessary to ensure observance of those provisions. Insofar as the common or concerted action may not prove possible, each of the three guaranteeing Powers reserves the right to take action with the sole aim of reestablishing the state of affairs created by the present Treaty." This last provision was the legal basis for Turkey's intervention in Cyprus in 1974.

c. The Treaty of Alliance

Articles 1 and 2 of the Treaty of Alliance signed by the Republic of Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey describe the purpose of the treaty. "The High Contracting Parties undertake to cooperate for their common defense and to consult together on the problems raised by that defense." "The High Contracting Parties undertake to resist any attack or aggression, direct or indirect, against the independence or the territorial integrity of the Republic of Cyprus." Article 3 foresees the establishment of a Tripartite Headquarters to achieve the purpose of the treaty. The Additional Protocol provided for basing military contingents from Greece and Turkey in Cyprus. The Greek contingent would consist of 950 officers, noncommissioned officers, and men and the Turkish contingent of 650. These contingents would participate in the Tripartite Headquarters and be responsible for the training of the Cypriot army.

d. The British Government Declaration of 17 February 1959

With this declaration, the British government announced that it would retain sovereignty over two areas, with their military installations, after the Republic of Cyprus acquired its independence. The first area consisted of Akrotiri, Episkopi, and Parmali, while the second area consisted of Dikelia, Pergamos, Hagia Nicola, and Ksilofagu. Britain retained the right to make use of roads and ports, public services, and Nicosia Airport and to carry out military exercises outside the base areas. Britain would also have facilities in the port of Famagusta and exercise exclusive judicial competence over its military personnel.

When examining the formula used for granting independence to Cyprus, we note that the requirements of Turkey and Greece take precedence over the requirements of the two peoples of Cyprus and that the need for NATO's smooth internal functioning takes precedence over the new state's functioning. This was to be a sui generis state, unique in the world, which would be independent, sovereign, and unitary, according to its Treaty of Establishment.

Cyprus was not allowed to change its Constitution; should it attempt to do so, it would be subject to foreign intervention. It accepted that parts of the island would remain under British sovereignty. Although not based on territory, it had a system that could be described as a functional federation. Therefore the Republic of Cyprus was neither independent and sovereign nor unitary. There were so many rules hampering the functioning of the state that it could have functioned smoothly only if the treaties had been prepared by the communal leaders in good faith and full sincerity. The leaders had accepted the treaties grudgingly, however, under external pressure. The imposed system stressed and magnified communal differences to such an extent that it was impossible for these differences to be swept aside in good faith, allowing a common Cypriot identity to emerge that would lead to mutual confidence. These difficulties were compounded by the policies of Greece and Turkey, which developed the tendency to see the Republic of Cyprus not as an integral entity but as consisting of separate Greek-Cypriot and Turkish-Cypriot communities and fashioned their policies accordingly. All of this made it evident that the new state had little chance to be long lasting.

The London Treaties were submitted to the TGNA for consideration on 28 February 1959. The opposition was critical of the government's decision to sign treaties that would allow Cyprus to become independent when the resolution of the TGNA dated 16 June 1958 called for partition, although the leader of the opposition CHP, İsmet İnönü, declared: "[W]e appreciate that the strong reasons that drove us to sign the treaties have to do with the general harmony and security of the alliances that we belong to. We can also imagine that the advice of strong friends had an important effect on our decision-making." With this statement he displayed his understanding of the motives that were behind the government's actions. Still, the opposition felt that the partition solution should not have been abandoned. This criticism was refuted by Zorlu, who declared that the sacrifice, if any, lay in abandoning the solution through which the whole island was to be absorbed. Abandoning partition was no sacrifice: instead of insisting on this solution and feuding with Greece over many years, a solution had been achieved that gave the Turkish Cypriots sovereignty while also ensuring Turkey's security.

After long deliberations, the treaties were ratified on 4 March 1959, with 347 votes for and 138 votes against and 2 abstentions. The next year would see the 27 May military coup, which replaced the architects of the solution with those who criticized it for abandoning the idea of partition. The implementation of the Cyprus solution would now be in the hands of its critics.

L. RELATIONS WITH ARAB STATES

After 1923 Turkey turned its face westward, and its relations with the Middle East were at a negligible level, apart from the Mosul and Sanjak episodes. When examining Turkey's Middle Eastern policies after World War II, two important developments in the international sphere must be borne in mind, including how they were perceived by Turkey's decision-makers. To understand Turkey's active but unsuccessful policies vis-à-vis the Middle East after 1950, we must bear in mind the Cold War and the decolonization process ensuing from the right of self-determination. These developments had a considerable impact on Ankara.

After 1947 the Western states acknowledged the Cold War and adjusted their policies to this fact of life. Turkey had perceived a Soviet threat since 1945. It was also in need of external financial resources to overcome the negative impact of the war on its economy. In these circumstances, the new policies of the West provided Turkey with the opportunity it had been seeking. Turkey based its foreign policy exclusively on NATO, stressing its strategic importance and identifying the security of the West with Turkey's own security. Especially after 1950, when the DP came to power, Turkey's foreign policy was based on the view that Turkey's interests coincide with the West's, that is, America's interests. This view was also reflected in Turkey's Middle Eastern policies. Turkey started looking at events in the region from the logic of the Cold War and saw things from a Western point of view. As the "representative" of the West in the Middle East, it took on the duty to lead the new independent Arab countries and bring them closer to the West. Compared to the past, it started to take a close interest in regional developments and pursued an active policy.

In its relations with the Middle Eastern states, Turkey acted as the "spokesperson of the West" and (basing itself on the logic of the Cold War and the bipolar world) tended to ignore the yearning of the newly independent states to establish a third pole based on their own values. Turkey was eager to develop its relations with the Arab countries within the framework of regional defense organizations, which it sought to set up to further Western interests. These efforts were met with a frosty reaction from the Arab countries, which had won their independence after struggling against Western imperialism. They saw Turkey as the "spokesperson of imperialism." For these reasons, Turkey's postwar policies in the Middle East were unsuccessful and inflicted wounds on its relations with the Arab countries that would be difficult to heal over the years. During the 1960s Turkey would become aware of the negative results of its Arab policies of the 1950s and would have to revise them drastically.

A. The Period of Rapprochement with Arab States (1945–1949)

At the end of World War II, Turkey paid the price of its wartime policy of staying out of the war and felt isolated and alone. Until the proclamation of the Truman Doctrine in 1947, the U.S. and Britain met Moscow's demands from Turkey with understanding. Turkey felt threatened from the north and sought close relations with its Arab neighbors in order to enhance its security and avoid problems on its southern borders.

At the end of World War II, there were seven independent Arab states: Yemen (1918), Egypt (1922), Saudi Arabia (1926), Iraq (1932), Lebanon (1945), Syria (1946), and Jordan (1946). On 2 March 1945 these states signed the pact establishing the Arab League. As the first country to have struggled against Western imperialism, Turkey welcomed this initiative coming from countries that had fought for their independence against Britain and France. The secretary-general of the Arab League made statements stressing the importance of Turkish-Arab friendship.

Subsequently Turkey did its best to establish cordial bilateral relations with Arab countries. On 15 September 1945 Abdulilah, the regent of Iraq, visited Ankara. The Turkish-Iraqi Treaty of Friendship and Good Neighborliness was signed on 29 March 1946.

The establishment of friendly relations with Iraq had a positive effect on Turkey's other Arab neighbor, Syria. Turkish-Syrian relations had become strained because of the Hatay question. When Syria gained independence, the Syrian Ministry of Foreign Affairs sent a circular note to all the foreign representatives in Damascus on 5 July 1944, declaring that it would be bound by all the international treaties and agreements concluded by France on its behalf. But when France left the region in 1946, Syria's position started to change. The statements coming out of Damascus announced that Turkey's sovereignty over Hatay was a violation of international law and that, like the Palestinian question, this was a matter that concerned the entire Arab world. Upon these statements, Turkey delayed its recognition of Syria's independence. It took the intercession of Iraq's prime minister Nuri Said Pasha to reach an understanding. Turkey would no longer insist that Syria formally acknowledge the annexation of Hatay by Turkey, and Syria would no longer formally raise the question. After this, Turkey recognized the independence of Syria and Lebanon on 6 March 1946. This compromise, however, was short-lived. The question of Hatay, which was not allowed to get in the way of friendly relations during the rule of Col. Hosni Zaim, was revived when Col. Adib Chichakli took power in 1950, and bilateral relations suffered as a result.

On 20 June 1946 Lebanese president Bechara El Khoury paid a visit to Turkey. Bilateral relations followed a smooth course throughout the 1950s, even though they were confined to a narrow area. A Treaty of Friendship and Good Neighborliness was signed with King Abdullah of Jordan on 8 January 1947 during his visit to Ankara. This coincided with the emergence of the Cold War and the Palestinian question, when the first signs of the split among Arab countries were becoming evident. In his speech on that occasion, King Abdullah said: "We are the good friends of Great Britain in the West and the great Turkish nation in the East." This statement was interpreted to mean that Britain was not about to abandon its interests in the region. It was also seen as the emergence of a London-Ankara-Amman block in Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and especially Syria, where it gave rise to misgivings. The bipolar world was making its influence felt in the Middle East, and the paths of Turkey and the Arabs were beginning to diverge.

Nevertheless, when the question of Palestine came to the UN in 1947, Turkey acted with the Arab states and voted against the partition of Palestine on 30 November. Both the U.S. and the USSR voted for partition. Despite the deteriorating relations, Turkey's vote against the resolution was received favorably by the Arabs. The president of Syria, Shukri al-Kuwatli, sent a telegram to Ankara to express Syria's appreciation.

The year 1948 marked the turning point in Turkey's relations with the Arab states. The proclamation of the Truman Doctrine the previous year was a formal acknowledgment of the Cold War. In effect, the West was changing its position and abandoning its previous indifference to Turkey's security concerns. As Turkey was drawn toward the West, it also began to distance itself from the Arabs.

The sign that Turkey would follow a westward-oriented policy in the Middle East was seen in its handling of the Palestinian question. The Arab-Israeli War and the establishment of an Israeli state in Palestine on 14 May 1948 brought the question back to the UN. On 12 December 1948 the Arab states had voted against the establishment of a Conciliation Commission for Palestine by the UN General Assembly. Turkey voted in favor of the resolution, however, along with the Western countries. The U.S., France, and Turkey were elected members of the commission. On 28 March 1949 Turkey granted Israel diplomatic recognition. As the first Muslim country to recognize Israel, it drew sharp criticism from the Arab states.

Turkey's changed orientation in its Middle Eastern policy was not confined to the question of Palestine. It also took the initiative in the establishment of military pacts in the Middle East, a region that was a focal point of East-West rivalries because of its strategic importance and its vast petroleum reserves.

B. From the Middle EastCommand Project to the Baghdad Pact (1950–1955)

When NATO was formed on 4 April 1949, Turkey's efforts to gain membership in this Western defense organization failed to yield positive results. Turkey and Greece had been in close cooperation with the West since 1947, but Britain and the Scandinavian countries were opposed to their membership in NATO. The Scandinavians saw these two countries as geographically distant and did not consider them to be really European. Britain's opposition was based on its desire to exclude the U.S. from the region. Britain controlled the Suez Canal, commanded the Arab Legion in Jordan, had military bases in Iraq, held the sheikhdoms of the Persian Gulf under its protection, and was firmly implanted in Cyprus. As such, it was the paramount power in the Mediterranean region and the Middle East and was not ready to share power with anyone. Britain favored a defense organization in the eastern Mediterranean with Turkey, Greece, and some of the Arab states.

Turkey felt that a Mediterranean Pact would be difficult to set up without U.S. backing. Ankara was also aware that the Arab states would never perceive the Communist threat as a mortal danger as long as Israel existed and continued to receive military aid and the support of the Jewish lobby in America. For this, Western policy toward Israel would have to undergo a drastic change. When the U.S. declared openly that it did not favor regional pacts, Britain gave up the idea of a pact and decided to pursue its search for Middle East security within the framework of its bilateral agreements with Egypt. Now that the Mediterranean Pact had failed to materialize, Turkey resumed its efforts to gain NATO membership.

In 1950 the newly formed DP government wanted to accomplish something in the field of foreign policy that had eluded its predecessor, the CHP. The opportunity came with the Korean War, which the DP government saw as a means to gain admission to NATO. The government decided to send a military contingent to that country. The Korean War and the likelihood that communism would spread in Asia enhanced Turkey's strategic worth in U.S. eyes. In the fall of 1950 Turkey was invited to take part in NATO's Mediterranean defense planning. But there was still no word on NATO membership. This was because Britain was working on plans to set up a multinational Middle East Command that would replace the existing bilateral treaties with regional countries, while preserving the rights and privileges provided by these bilateral treaties. Britain held the view that Turkey should act in coordination with British headquarters in the region. The U.S. changed its position after the Korean War and decided to support the project for a Middle East Command to counter Soviet expansion.

Ankara became aware that it would not be possible for Turkey to join NATO without Britain's agreement. On 11 September 1951 minister of foreign affairs Fuat Köprülü informed the British ambassador in Ankara that Turkey was ready for a preliminary exchange of ideas on the defense of the Middle East with the British, U.S., and French governments. He added, however, that the exchange of ideas would lead nowhere unless these governments agreed to Turkey's accession to NATO.

On 20 September 1951 the NATO Council, meeting in Ottawa, unanimously decided to invite Turkey to join NATO. This paved the way for tangible steps to be taken on the subject of a Middle Eastern Command.

1. The Middle Eastern Command Project

Britain and the U.S. had already reached an agreement on the structure of a Middle Eastern Command by June 1951. According to this plan, the Middle Eastern Command would not be a NATO headquarters but would be closely linked to NATO.

Britain was the initiator of the project because of the special role its presence in the Suez Canal played in safeguarding its interests in the region. The project would allow Britain to overcome the differences that had emerged with Egypt after the war. The project would enable close partnership and cooperation with regional countries and thereby mitigate the resentment felt because of the presence of British bases. Turkey's participation was important from this point of view. With its army, the largest and most powerful in the Middle East, Turkey would be undertaking an important task in the defense of the region. As a Middle Eastern and Muslim country, Turkey's presence in the Middle Eastern Command would also help in allaying the impression that this was a purely Western project. When Turkey recognized Israel in 1949, sent a chargé d'affaires to Tel Aviv in January 1950, and signed its first trade agreement with Israel in July, however, its relations with the Arabs were seriously affected. Thus Turkey's policy to establish close relations with Arab states and to draw them into Western defense schemes against the USSR took a blow at the outset.

On 15 October 1951 Turkey announced that it considered the Middle Eastern Command to be useful, indeed essential, and that it was ready in principle to join it. The other important regional country was Egypt. The strategic Suez Canal was located on its territory. It also played host to the Arab League Headquarters and was highly influential among the Arab states. That is why a special effort was being made to draw Egypt into the project. In this way, Britain also expected to forestall the difficulties that would arise from the British military presence in Egypt if Cairo did not extend the British-Egyptian agreement of 1936. On 13 October Britain, the U.S., France, and Turkey had issued an invitation to Egypt to join the Middle Eastern Command. Egypt was told that it would have the same status as the founding members if it agreed to join. Furthermore, Britain would renounce the 1936 agreement and remove all of its military forces from Egypt except for the units that would be placed at the disposal of the Middle Eastern Command. Egypt rejected the invitation, however, announcing that it would ignore all proposals for cooperation as long as British troops remained on its soil. It went one step further and denounced the 1936 agreement.

Turkey's decision to participate in the Middle East Command drew a sharp reaction. The Egyptian press was full of denunciations, while the USSR delivered a note on 24 November, expressing its concern at Turkey's participation in Western-inspired defense arrangements in the region. It was now clear that the Arabs were not ready to participate in Turkey's initiatives aimed at strengthening the Western position in the region. But Turkey continued to convey the message to the U.S., and others, that it was the sole power capable of leading efforts to safeguard Western interests in the region.

Upon Egypt's rejection of their offer, Britain, the U.S., France, and Turkey felt the need to issue a statement on 10 November 1951, in which they underlined the necessity for the free world to ensure the defense of the Middle East. The four countries also declared that they had not given up the project for setting up a Middle Eastern Command. Nevertheless, by that point it was clear to them that the project in its present form would not take off.

In June 1952 Britain and the U.S. decided to change the Middle Eastern Command from a military command into a planning organization and renamed it the Middle Eastern Defense Organization. The two countries were agreed on the objective but had differences over the means. Britain, with Turkey's backing, held the view that the organization should be established first, with the efforts to recruit Arab states to follow. Britain wanted to work on the Arab states other than Egypt, and especially Iraq and Jordan. Against this view, the U.S. held that the Arab states should be involved from the beginning and that Egypt should be given its justified place in the plan. Aware that regional projects without U.S. backing stood no chance of success, Britain undertook the negotiations with Egypt but failed to make progress.

The U.S. was conscious of Britain's waning influence in the region, a situation that was creating a gap in the defense of the Middle East. The Truman Administration was reluctant, however, to shoulder new military commitments. It was the Eisenhower Administration that eventually took over from Britain the task of leading the efforts to ensure the defense of the Middle East.

2. The Baghdad Pact

When Eisenhower became president in 1953, the U.S. felt the need to review its Middle Eastern policy. The new administration in Washington recognized that, in the new circumstances, neither the Middle Eastern Command nor the Middle Eastern Defense Organization was up to the job. The analyses that were conducted led to the following conclusions. (1) From the Arab perspective, the primary threat to the Arab world came not from the USSR but from Israel; therefore, Arab cooperation could not be obtained by dwelling only on the danger of communism. (2) The Arab states were extremely jealous of their newly won independence. The Arabs would remain cool to any initiative that might remind them of the imperialist past of Britain and France. (3) After having obtained their political independence, the priority for the Arab countries was to initiate their economic development process. From this point of view, they were more likely to feel attracted to the policies of the USSR after Stalin's death. (4) Egypt had a special place in the Arab world. It had assumed the leadership of Arab countries that were cool toward the West, notably Syria. Unless the disputes between Britain and Egypt, starting with the Suez Canal, were quickly sorted out, it would be impossible to cooperate with the Arab world.

Having come to these conclusions, the new U.S. administration decided to take the initiative in the Middle East. Between 11 and 28 May 1953 secretary of state John Foster Dulles visited Egypt, Israel, Syria, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Iran, India, Pakistan, Greece, Turkey, and Libya. Turkey was initially not included among the countries to be visited, because it was considered to be safely in the Western camp. At Menderes's request, Dulles came to Ankara and held talks with Turkish leaders on 26-27 May. Turkey's message was clear: the Arabs were unaware of the Soviet threat, so it would not be possible to cooperate with them in the defense of the Middle East. A new approach was required. The cornerstone of Middle Eastern defense was Turkey, but Pakistan should also be involved in the endeavor. Dulles agreed that Turkey was fundamental for Middle Eastern defense, but he added that the Arabs must not be totally ignored or alienated.

After his Middle Eastern tour, Dulles gave a speech at the National Security Council on 1 July 1953 and enunciated the concept of the Northern Tier (see Box 4-8 above). According to Dulles, the countries most keenly aware of the Soviet threat and those likely to be overrun in the event of a Soviet attack were in this Northern Tier: Turkey, Iran, Iraq, Pakistan, and Syria. Consequently, the defense of the Middle East should be entrusted to these countries, because they felt directly threatened by the USSR, unlike the other Arab countries, living in fear of Israel. The new defense system should not be imposed by the West but should be the result of a regional initiative.

The new American policy in the Middle East gave Turkey its chance. With its economy deteriorating in 1954 and its need for new loans growing, the DP government stressed its geographical location, its loyalty to the West, and its historical links with the region to prove its indispensability for the defense of the West. In the process that led to the Baghdad Pact, Turkey was ready to carry out the policies created in Washington.

At this time, Turkey took on a leadership role in the defense arrangements for the Middle East. To play this role adequately, it should have used the advantage conferred by being a country belonging to the region. Ankara's policies after 1954, however, estranged most of the Arab countries. The estrangement with Egypt started with a diplomatic crisis in January 1954. The Turkish ambassador in Cairo, Hulusi Fuat Tugay, was related to the Egyptian royal family through his wife. When the royal family's properties were expropriated after the revolution, the ambassador criticized Nasser and had a nasty exchange with him at a party. Shortly afterward, Ambassador Tugay was declared persona non grata and deprived of his diplomatic immunity. Although this situation was the consequence of his own improper behavior, the lifting of his diplomatic immunity even before he left the country was in breach of diplomatic etiquette and reflected Egypt's negative attitude toward Turkey. Ankara decided not to make a major issue of this incident, because, in early 1954, it was intent on recruiting the Arab states into the Middle Eastern defense arrangement. Although it was the first time that a Turkish ambassador had been declared persona non grata, the incident was downplayed in a joint statement issued with Egypt, in which the incident was described as regrettable.

The strained relations with Egypt were really due to the struggle for political leadership, rather than a trifling diplomatic incident. Middle Eastern states were split into two camps. One camp consisted of pro-Western states led by Turkey. The other camp was made up of states under Egyptian leadership seeking to defend their political and economic independence against Western encroachment. Turkey and Egypt were involved in a leadership struggle that was to determine the political configuration of the Middle East. In this struggle, Turkey was in the vanguard of the effort to bring the Arab states within the Western defense structures. But Turkey went further and stood in the Western ranks in the UN even on the issue of Algerian independence throughout the years of struggle in that country from 1954 on. This earned it the sobriquet of "the representative of imperialism in the Middle East." In these circumstances, the chances of Turkey being able to persuade the Arab states to join the Western defense arrangements were minimal.

Treaty of Friendly Cooperation between Turkey and Pakistan (2 April 1954)

The first tangible evidence of a new defense arrangement appeared on 28 December 1953 when the U.S. and Pakistan signed a technical and economic aid treaty. Pakistan had problems with India and perceived a threat from the Soviet Union. By signing the treaty, it came under the Western guarantee. On 18 February 1954 Turkey and Pakistan issued a joint declaration of their intention to sign a defense treaty.

The first reaction came from Moscow. In notes sent to Turkey and Pakistan, the USSR declared that this treaty was the kernel of a larger grouping that would include other countries in the Middle East. The treaty could not be regarded as a defensive pact because there was no threat in the region. This was a NATO maneuver that would endanger the Middle East and Southeastern Asia. The Soviet notes were followed by an Egyptian statement, which claimed that the treaty was a threat to the regional states. Iraq was noncommittal, while Iran declared that it would not join the treaty.

Despite these negative reactions, Turkey and Pakistan went ahead and signed the Treaty of Friendly Cooperation on 2 April 1954. Also known as the Karachi Treaty, this compact was not of a military nature. The treaty provided for the parties to exchange views on international questions of common interest and to cooperate to the fullest extent in the cultural, economic, and technical fields. There were also some general references to cooperation in the field of defense. Article 6 stated that the treaty was also open to other countries. This indicated that the aim was to organize cooperation in the field of defense among a larger group of countries.

Soon after the Karachi Treaty, Prime Minister Menderes paid an official visit to the U.S. on 30 May. During this visit, he declared that "it is necessary for the Arab countries to recognize the reality of Israel's existence" (Ayın Tarihi 247 [June 1954]: 96). This pronouncement on a matter of utmost sensitivity for the Arabs had an adverse impact on Turkish-Arab relations. It revealed that Turkey framed its Middle Eastern policies not from the point of view of the Middle East but according to the logic of the Cold War. Egypt and the other anti-Western Arab states would later refer to this frame of mind and use it against Turkey.

Turkey-Iraq Treaty of Mutual Cooperation (24 February 1955)

On 27 July 1954, shortly after Menderes's Washington visit, Britain and Egypt signed a treaty under which Britain would evacuate the Suez Canal zone. This revived hopes in Washington and Ankara that Arab states might participate in Middle East defense arrangements. Menderes made the first move toward repairing relations with Egypt and conveyed to Cairo his wish to meet with Nasser. Egypt rebuffed this request. It was obvious that as long as Menderes sought to establish a westward-leaning defense pact, he could not establish a dialogue with Nasser.

After this failure in Egypt, Turkey concentrated its efforts on Iraq. At that time, Iraq was a country under very strong British influence. Nuri Said Pasha, known as "Britain's man," ruled the country. Conversations had been conducted with Iraq for some time. In April 1954 Iraq signed a treaty with the U.S. and started receiving military aid. Iraq's noncommittal attitude toward the Karachi Treaty and its declaration that "for the time being" it did not intend to accede to the treaty were due to Iraq's wish to avoid antagonizing the other Arab states. The Iraqis welcomed the British-Egyptian Treaty and were relieved by its terms. When Nuri Said Pasha formed the Iraqi government in September 1954, Iraq's convergence with the West gained pace. On 9 October Nuri Said Pasha called on Menderes on his way back from London and took up questions of common defense. On that occasion, he declared that "if the questions of the Suez Canal and Palestine are resolved in a manner satisfactory to Arab nations, all Arab states are convinced that cooperation is possible with the West." His statement indicated that Iraq could move forward with greater ease now that one of the questions, namely Suez, had been resolved.

Between 6 and 12 January 1955 Menderes visited Baghdad. From the joint communiqué released after the visit, it was understood that a treaty with the following provisions would be concluded. (1) The treaty would provide for cooperation in the event of an attack from the region or from outside the region. It was obvious that the source of the attack from outside the region was the USSR. An attack from the region would be from Israel. This was inserted to encourage other Arab states to join the treaty. (2) Stability would be sought in accordance with the principles and resolutions of the UN. In other words, there would be compliance with UN resolutions on Palestine upholding Arab rights. (3) Countries that had displayed their determination to contribute to the peaceful aims of the treaty or those with the means to make such a contribution would be welcome to join. In this way, the criteria for eligibility to join the treaty were extended beyond the region, paving the way for the U.S. and Britain to join.

Menderes's visit to Iraq was a success. To bring other Arab countries into the treaty, Menderes visited Syria on 14–15 January and Lebanon on 15–17 January. Both countries remained under Egyptian influence, however, and refused to join. Like Egypt, Israel too was displeased with the Turkish-Iraqi joint communiqué, fearing that Ankara might review its policy toward Israel as Turkey came closer to the Arab states.

Despite the negative reactions coming from the region, Turkey and Iraq could count on the support of the U.S. and Britain. On 24 February 1955 they went ahead and signed the Mutual Cooperation Treaty in Baghdad.

Also known as the Baghdad Pact, the treaty consisted of eight articles. Article 1 describes the purpose of the pact. "Consistent with article 51 of the United Nations Charter, the High Contracting Parties will cooperate for their security and defense. Such measures as they agree to take to give effect to this cooperation may form the subject of special agreements with each other." This wording gave governments wide latitude in implementing the pact. The treaties allowing Britain to accede to the pact were concluded on the basis of this article. When Iraq withdrew from the arrangement in 1958, the U.S. and the three regional members of CENTO also signed their bilateral treaties on the basis of this article. In article 3, the parties undertake not to interfere in one another's internal affairs and to settle all disputes between themselves through peaceful means. Article 4 reads: "The High Contracting Parties declare that the dispositions of the present pact are not in contradiction with any of the international obligations contracted by either of them." This article ensured that the pact is not interpreted in a manner that would affect Turkey's obligations under NATO or the Balkan Pact. The same applies to Iraq's obligations within the framework of the Arab League and the Arab Treaty of Mutual Defense and Economic Cooperation of 1950. Article 5 states: "This pact shall be open for accession to any member of the Arab League or any other State actively concerned with security and peace in this region and which is fully recognized by both of the High Contracting Parties." The wording of the article allows all the Arab states to accede to the pact in addition to Pakistan, Iran, Britain, and the U.S., while excluding Israel. Article 6 provides that, when at least four powers become parties to the pact, a Permanent Council at ministerial level will be set up to function within the framework of the pact's purposes. Article 7 stipulates that the pact will remain in force for five years and will be renewable for further five-year periods.

Iraq was uneasy about possible negative reactions from the Arab states to its pact with Turkey and was anxious to reduce such reactions to a minimum. That is why a sentence was inserted in the joint communiqué released before the signing ceremony declaring that the UN's resolutions regarding the Middle East had been accepted. But Turkey was against such an insertion in the text of the pact, because Ankara wanted Britain and the U.S., which had strong links with Israel, in the Middle Eastern defense system. The question was settled in a manner that gave Iraq satisfaction by means of an exchange of letters carried out when the pact was signed. In a letter addressed to Menderes, Nuri Said Pasha declared: "In connection with the pact we have signed today, I have the honor to inform your Excellency that we have agreed to work in close cooperation to implement the resolutions of the United Nations regarding Palestine." In his reply, Menderes informed Nuri Said Pasha that he concurred with the contents of his letter. It looked like Nuri Said Pasha had obtained Turkey's cooperation in the event of an Israeli attack. The Iraqi leader was thus preempting Arab criticism by demonstrating that Iraq had not forgotten the Palestinian cause and that it had even imposed certain obligations on Turkey in connection with this issue. Although these letters were annexed to the pact, the Menderes government did not submit them to the TGNA at the time of the pact's ratification. Consequently, these letters imposed no legal obligation on Turkey but remained as mere expressions of intent by the two governments (Soysal 1991, p. 492).

The Baghdad Pact was badly received in Israel. In a statement issued on 26 February, the Israeli Foreign Ministry drew attention to the absence in this pact of the usual phrase where the parties foreswear the use of force or the threat of force. The statement added that the exchange of letters following the signing of the pact was an unfriendly act directed against Israel.

Britain acceded to the Baghdad Pact on 4 April 1955. On the same day, it signed a cooperation treaty with Iraq. This treaty ended the Britain-Iraq Alliance of 1930. Britain now undertook to help in training and equipping the Iraqi army and promised to assist in defending Iraq by force of arms in the event of an attack on Iraq and upon Baghdad's request. Britain's accession weakened the Baghdad Pact in the eyes of the Arabs. The new treaty signed with Iraq demonstrated that Britain maintained its influence and presence in Iraq and strengthened the impression that the pact was designed to protect the interests of the West in the Middle East.

Pakistan, ever preoccupied with India, acceded to the pact on 23 July 1955 in order to obtain Western backing. After the U.S. overthrew the government of Mosaddeq, the shah moved closer to the West, and on 3 November 1955 Iran acceded to the Baghdad Pact. With the membership now reaching five states, the Permanent Council of the Baghdad Pact held its first meeting in Baghdad. The U.S. sent an observer delegation to that meeting and announced that it would maintain permanent military and political contact with the council. Washington stopped short of formally acceding to the pact, however, for the following reasons. (1) It did not want to disturb its relations with leading countries of the Arab League like Egypt and Saudi Arabia. (2) It did not want to provoke the USSR by giving the impression that a pact under U.S. leadership had been formed in the Middle East. (3) It was wary of raising Israeli concern by joining a grouping that had excluded Israel and had been badly received by Tel Aviv. (4) Accession would require U.S. Senate approval. In this process, Washington's Middle Eastern policy would be the subject of a debate and the issue might turn into a domestic policy question that could be used against the administration, something that Eisenhower wanted to avoid (OTDP, p. 267).

After the signing of the Baghdad Pact, Turkey made one more attempt to get other Arab states to join but failed again. At this time, Egypt and Syria decided to enter into a new political, economic, and military agreement that would exclude Iraq and replace the Arab League's defense pact. On 6 March Egypt, Syria, and Saudi Arabia announced their intention to enter into an agreement to strengthen the Arab world's military, political, and economic structure and to stay away from the Baghdad Pact. Egypt's attitude came as no surprise to Turkey, but the same could not be said about Syria, which had remained noncommittal on the issue all along. Turkey's reaction to Syria's negative stance was sharp. On 7 March 1955 Syria received the following warning message from Turkey: "We expect that Syria's common position with Egypt is not final. Because if it is, Turkey will be forced to conclude that Syria has adopted a position hostile to Turkey under Egyptian pressure and will feel compelled to revise its present policy toward Syria... If Syria adopts an antagonistic position, Turkey cannot remain indifferent to this situation." Syria replied that the contemplated pact with Egypt would not be against the Baghdad Pact and added that Damascus could not join a pact that appeared to be pro-Israel.

When Turkish-Syrian relations became strained, Washington reminded Ankara that its tough position could only alienate the Arabs from the Baghdad Pact. This helped soften Ankara's subsequent diplomatic moves. The first overture was made to Jordan. In view of Jordan's close links with Iraq, it was considered that its likelihood of joining the Baghdad Pact was high. For this reason president Celal Bayar visited Amman on 3 and 4 November 1955. Turkey knew that the Israeli threat was paramount for Jordan, so it gave firm assurances that Turkey would stand by Jordan on the question of Palestine if Jordan joined the Baghdad Pact. A change of government took place in Amman, however, after Bayar's visit. With the coming to power of a group that was pro-Nasser, it became clear that Jordan would not join the Baghdad Pact.

There were a number of reasons why no Arab country other than Iraq joined the Baghdad Pact, including Nasser's influence and the Israeli threat, which were of immediate importance to the Arab states. Furthermore, there was the conviction that the Baghdad Pact would help perpetuate Britain's regional presence. America's role must also not be forgotten. While Ankara was pursuing its diplomatic efforts aimed at reducing Egypt's influence among the Arab states, the U.S., in cooperation with Britain and the World Bank, offered to finance the Aswan Dam on 10 November 1955. This move was designed to prevent Egypt from moving close to Moscow. While the U.S. supported the Baghdad Pact, the offer of economic aid to Egypt also demonstrated to the radical Arab countries that not joining the Baghdad Pact need not affect relations with Washington.

The Baghdad Pact was designed to plug the gap between NATO and SEATO, but politically it can be qualified as a failure for a number of reasons:

- 1. The Baghdad Pact failed to live up to the expectation that it would facilitate the defense of the West and the Middle East. First, it never produced a credible defense force. Turkey was already a NATO member, and its armed forces were allocated to NATO. Ankara was not in a position to contribute anything more to the defense of the West within the framework of the Baghdad Pact. The military forces of Iran, Iraq, and Pakistan were negligible. The chief reason for their participation in the pact was to secure U.S. aid rather than to ward off the Soviet threat. For Iraq, the principal threat was Israel; and for Pakistan, it was India.
- 2. The Baghdad Pact failed to produce cooperation against communism among the Arabs. It only helped to draw them into antagonistic camps. Egypt, Syria, and Saudi Arabia opposed the pact, while Jordan and Lebanon preferred to maintain their distance. Iraq was condemned to isolation as the pact's sole Arab member.

- 3. Israel saw the pact as directed against it, fearing that, if the Arab states joined the organization, it would add to their strength and allow them to pursue tough anti-Israeli policies.
- 4. As the Arab states felt powerless against the West, they displayed a readiness to enter into cooperation with the USSR, which reiterated on every occasion that it would respect their independence and provide them with economic assistance. At the same time, the USSR had no history of imperial domination in the region. Although the Baghdad Pact was designed to stem communism, it ended up by facilitating the USSR's entry into the area (OTDP, p. 269).

The Baghdad Pact also failed to produce positive results for Turkey.

- 1. It did not help the Middle Eastern countries, and particularly the Arabs, to move closer to the West.
- 2. Not only did Turkey fail to play a leadership role in the Middle East, but it was also accused of pursuing imperialistic policies in the region, reminiscent of the Ottoman Empire. Its relations with the Arab countries became strained, especially with Egypt and Syria.
- Ankara was estranged from the nonaligned countries.
- 4. Turkey's relations with Israel suffered because of the Israeli perception of the Baghdad Pact as anti-Israel.
- 5. Turkey failed to receive the expected support even in the West. There was a substantial drop in U.S. economic aid to Turkey in 1955 and thereafter.

It took until 1960 for Turkey to assess the negative picture properly. The DP government was guided by the objectives of "protecting the Middle East against communism" and "defending Western interests" when it signed the Baghdad Pact. It remained attached to these objectives until its overthrow in 1960 and remained loyal to the Western alliance in all of the Middle Eastern crises.

C. The Middle Eastern Crises and Turkey (1956–1960)

Starting in 1956, the Middle East went through a succession of crises and became one of the theaters of the Cold War. Turkey's policies during these crises helped accelerate its isolation.

1. The 1956 Suez Crisis

After 1955 Egypt continued its drift toward the Eastern Bloc. In September 1955 Cairo signed an agreement with Czechoslovakia for the purchase of arms; in May 1956 it established diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China; and Nasser announced that he would be visiting Moscow in August. In reaction to this, on 15 July 1956 the U.S. withdrew its offer to help finance the Aswan Dam. Britain and the World Bank soon followed suit. Egypt reacted sharply and on 26 July announced that it had nationalized the Suez Canal. Three days later, Britain, the U.S., and France decided to convene a conference in London, to be held on 16 August. The signatories of the Convention of Constantinople of 1888 regulating passage through the canal were invited to attend, along with the principal users of the canal.

When the Suez crisis erupted, Nasser saw a similarity between the Suez Canal and the Turkish Straits and asked Turkey to act as mediator in the dispute. But Ankara looked upon the question as a political rather than a legal issue. Ankara accepted the invitation to attend the London conference for the following reasons: (a) it was a party to the 1888 Convention; (b) Britain was a member of the Baghdad Pact; and (c) the British-Egyptian Treaty of 1954 provided that, in the event of an attack on Turkey, Britain would have the right to use the canal. Egypt's takeover of the operation of the canal would pose difficulties for Britain in its use of the canal.

The conference met on 16 August, with the participation of twenty-two states. The deliberations were conducted on the basis of a plan submitted by U.S. secretary of state John Foster Dulles. According to this plan, the canal would be operated by an international organization that would be attached to the UN and established through an international treaty. Egypt would participate in the organization, which would be dominated by no single country. The canal would be operated according to the 1888 Convention and would remain open to all states without restrictions or limitations. The canal was to provide a reasonable and just income to the Egyptian government, and the Suez Canal Company was to receive a fair compensation. Disputes arising over these two issues would be referred to tribunals to be set up by the International Court of Justice.

D. T. Shepilov, the minister of foreign affairs of the USSR, was against the Dulles Plan because it had a "colonialist taint" (Keesing's Contemporary Archives, 1955–1956, pp. 15049–55, quoted in Kürkçüoğlu, p. 83). Shepilov proposed a wider conference in which all users of the canal would be represented. He held that the nationalization of the canal was consistent with Egypt's sovereign rights and that no state had a right to interfere with these rights. Finally, Shepilov argued that the question of navigation through the canal concerned all nations.

Turkey sided with the West at the conference. It declared that Egypt's sovereign rights should not be challenged and added that the Dulles Plan did not violate these rights. Turkey stated that, given the unique character of the canal, transit navigation must be ensured by an impartial international authority. By stressing the unique features of the canal, Ankara wanted to make sure that no analogy with the Turkish Straits was drawn and thus to avoid possible charges of inconsistency. Nevertheless, Turkey was also among the countries that proposed revisions in the Dulles Plan. Together with Pakistan, Iran, and Ethiopia, Turkey suggested that the principle of respect for Egyptian sovereignty be included as a separate article. With this amendment, the plan was approved by a majority of participants.

At the London Conference, a committee of five was formed to persuade the Egyptian government to accept the Dulles Plan. The talks took place from 3 to 9 September, but no progress was made. Nasser insisted that there was no way for Egypt to allow the Suez Canal to come under international supervision or to dilute Egyptian sovereignty over the canal. If these two points were granted, Egypt would make sure that all countries could freely use the canal.

When the Cairo talks ended in failure, the eighteen countries approving the Dulles Plan met for a second time in London on 19–21 September 1956. At the end of the Second London Conference, a joint communiqué was adopted, reiterating the decisions of the first conference. A Suez Canal Users' Association was formed, charged with the responsibility of working with the Egyptian government to seek a solution to the Suez question. At the second conference, Turkey continued to support the Western positions and was among the first countries to join the Suez Canal Users' Association.

After the Second London Conference, Britain and France took the issue to the UN on 23 September. When the UN Security Council failed to come up with a solution, Britain and France resorted to force. Even while the negotiations over Suez were proceeding, Britain and France started drawing up secret military plans with Israel. The U.S. was against any military action in the Middle East that might bring the regional countries closer to the USSR, so Britain and France were careful not to appear as the aggressors. They would use an Israeli attack on Egypt as a pretext for stepping in. When Israel attacked Egypt, British and French forces would intervene in the Canal Zone to separate the combatants and end the fighting.

Hostilities began on 29 October 1956 with Israel's attack on Egypt. The next day, Britain and France delivered an ultimatum to both sides, giving them twelve hours to end the fighting and to remove their respective forces behind lines ten miles on either side of the canal. Israel accepted the ultimatum, but Egypt turned it down, whereupon British and French forces based in Cyprus attacked Egypt.

The Anglo-French attack on Egypt met with the general disapproval of the international community. Both the U.S. and the USSR accused the Britain and France of aggression. In the face of international censure, Britain and France announced their decision to withdraw from Egypt on 3 December. Israel evacuated the Sinai Peninsula. This completed the process of nationalization of the Suez Canal.

Turkey adopted a strange position in the face of these developments. Although it considered the Anglo-French attack to be a breach of international law, it accused Egypt of being responsible for these events. Ankara declared that the events had been to the advantage of the USSR and reiterated that it had been demonstrated that the security of the Middle Eastern nations would best be insured through participation in the Baghdad Pact.

When war broke out in the Middle East, the prime ministers of the Baghdad Pact member states met in Tehran without the participation of Britain. Iraq had requested that Britain refrain from attending Baghdad Pact meetings until the evacuation of Egypt was completed. In the joint communiqué adopted at the end of the meeting, the Israeli attack was condemned, Britain and France were asked to withdraw their troops, and an appeal was made to respect Egypt's independence, territorial integrity, and sovereignty. The communiqué expressed appreciation to the U.S. for promptly taking action at the UN. It was also announced that the UN's 1947 partition plan could serve as a basis for talks to settle the question of Palestine. Clearly, the text of the communiqué was carefully drafted to avoid upsetting the West. Neither Britain nor France was condemned, while the U.S. was praised for its conduct. The Arabs were far from satisfied by the language of the communiqué, because it characterized the 1947 UN partition plan, which had been rejected by the Arab states, as an appropriate basis for negotiations. On 10 November 1956 Menderes met with the British ambassador to inform him that Britain's not being invited to the Tehran meeting was due to temporary difficulties; he reassured the ambassador that no hostile stand had been taken against a Western ally. For Turkey, relations with the West were of paramount importance under all circumstances.

Although Turkey displayed a lenient attitude toward Britain and France, it had severe criticism for Israel. Turkey declared that the Israeli attack had created a serious danger in the Middle East. Moreover, by diverting the world's attention to the Middle East, it had allowed the events in Hungary to go unnoticed: this was a betrayal of the free world's cause. Sensitive to Arab and domestic public opinion, Turkey also recalled its envoy from Israel. Diplomatic relations between the two countries were not severed but were reduced to chargé d'affaires level. But this was a cosmetic affair, designed to appease public opinion. The recalled Turkish minister informed the Israeli Foreign Ministry that this action was not directed against Israel but was designed to strengthen the Baghdad Pact. Turkey had no intention of damaging its friendly relations and its trade links with Israel.

Turkish policy during the Suez Canal crisis dealt a new blow to Turkey's prestige among the Arab nations. Arab circles welcomed the withdrawal of the Turkish minister from Tel Aviv, but this limited gesture was far from satisfying the Arabs. In a situation where even the U.S. acted with the USSR in condemning Britain and France, Turkey's unusual consideration for these countries in its pronouncements demonstrated that Turkey was, as usual, looking at all situations from the perspective of the East-West struggle.

2. The Syrian Crisis of 1957

The outcome of the Suez crisis was that it ended the influence of Britain and France in the Middle East for good. The USSR quickly filled the vacuum with its anti-imperialistic rhetoric. This disturbing situation led the members of the Baghdad Pact to call on Washington to join the pact. Bearing in mind its relations with both Israel and the Arab countries that were not members of the pact, the U.S. did not accede to this request. It proclaimed the Eisenhower Doctrine on 5 January 1957, however, to demonstrate that it would be more active in the region. At the Karachi meeting of the Baghdad Pact held on 3–6 June 1957, it also formally joined the pact's military committee.

In the aftermath of the Suez crisis, the U.S. came closer to the member states of the Baghdad Pact, while the USSR came closer to the Arab countries struggling against Western influence in the region, notably Egypt and Syria. On 6 August 1957 Syria and the USSR signed an economic and technical aid agreement. On 13 August Syria ordered the deportation of three U.S. diplomats on the grounds that they were plotting to overthrow the regime in Damascus. The U.S. reacted sharply and declared the Syrian ambassador in Washington persona non grata. On 17 August Syria initiated a major purge in its army: the chief of the general staff, Gen. T. Nizameddin, was retired and replaced by Col. Afif Bizri, an officer with Communist leanings.

Alarmed by the Syrian events, King Faisal of Iraq and King Hussein of Jordan came to Ankara. On 24 August the two kings, the Turkish president and prime minister, and the American official L. W. Henderson held a meeting. The subject of their deliberations was the events in Syria. Cairo issued a statement identifying Henderson as an expert in staging coups d'état and alleged that, having failed to overthrow the Syrian regime from within, the U.S. was now instigating the neighbors to act against Damascus.

Menderes conveyed his opinion to U.S. ambassador Fletcher Warren that Syria had become a Soviet satellite and added that they were awaiting a decision to take appropriate action. Turkish military spokesmen voiced Turkey's apprehension over the Soviet danger coming not just from the north but also from a possible second front in the south and claimed that Syria was creating the right conditions for such an attack with the huge stocks of Soviet munitions accumulating there.

The U.S. declared in September 1957 that it would be delivering arms to Syria's neighbors and would not tolerate an attack by Syria against any of them. Washington also sent messages to the governments of Turkey, Iraq, Jordan, and Lebanon, however, informing them that it did not intend to intervene militarily against Syria. It also warned Ankara not to take unilateral action against Syria.

The Menderes government realized that the U.S. and friendly Arab governments had no intention to intervene militarily against Syria, so it chose an intermediate form of action by concentrating troops on the Syrian frontier. According to U.S. sources, by 27 September Turkey had deployed a mobile force of 33,000 men, consisting of two infantry divisions and one armored division. By 10 October a further armored brigade had been moved close to the Syrian frontier, bringing the force up to 37,000 men (Sever, p. 191).

The first reaction to Turkey's concentration of forces on its Syrian border came from the USSR. On 10 September Prime Minister Bulganin sent Menderes a letter in which he voiced his concern over the concentration of forces on the Syrian border. He also warned that Turkey would be dragged into a catastrophic situation if it came under the influence of outsiders who had no interest in the preservation of peace in the Middle East. Bulganin added that it would be wrong to expect that a war caused by aggression could be confined to a local theater. In his reply, Menderes rejected the Soviet allegations and expressed his astonishment that the USSR would act on behalf of Syria in a situation where Syria had lodged no complaint.

Roughly a month after Bulganin's letter, Syria delivered a note to Turkey on 8 October. It accused Turkey of creating border incidents, violating Syrian airspace, and concentrating troops on the border. In its reply, Turkey stated that its military dispositions were related to its security and were a direct reaction to the present tension in the Middle East and that Syria's assessments of Turkish actions were an inadmissible interference in Turkey's sphere of sovereignty.

At this stage, the U.S. administration made statements supporting Turkey and declared that the real threat to peace came from Syria, with the backing of the USSR. The USSR blamed Turkey and the U.S. for pursuing aggressive policies in the Middle East. While two Soviet warships called in the Syrian port of Latakia, the U.S. 6th Fleet visited the port of İzmir.

When the crisis took on an international dimension, Saudi Arabia issued an official statement on 21 October 1957. It was announced that King Saud had offered to act as mediator and that both countries had accepted the mediation. Ankara confirmed this on the same day. Syria accepted the mediation at first but subsequently changed its mind. Egypt did not relish Saudi Arabia's rising prestige among the Arabs and was well aware of that country's influence over Syria. Cairo accused King Saud of acting like an American agent and claimed that the mediation offer had been made at the request of the U.S. State Department.

After rejecting the Saudi offer, Syria called on the UN to take up the question. In discussion of the question at the General Assembly on 22 October, recriminations came from both sides. When the time came to consider a number of draft resolutions that had been offered, the Indonesian representative proposed that none of the resolutions be put to a vote. Instead, he suggested that the question should be settled by the parties through negotiations. The majority, including Turkey and Syria, accepted this proposal, and on 30 October the question was dropped from the General Assembly's agenda.

At this point, the USSR had softened its position visa-vis Turkey. On 29 October Khrushchev, Bulganin, and A. I. Mikoyan attended the National Day reception at the Turkish Embassy in Moscow. The following month Bulganin sent a politely worded letter to Menderes.

When Syria and Egypt decided to merge into the United Arab Republic (UAR) on 1 February 1958, a more businesslike relationship was established between Turkey and Syria. Turkey found a Syria united with another country less threatening to its security than a Syria drifting ever closer toward Moscow. Ankara recognized the UAR on 11 March 1958. Turkey also supported the federation that Iraq and Jordan decided to set up on 14 February 1958 to serve as a counterweight to Nasser, however.

The reason for Turkey's decision to escalate the tension with Syria into a full-blown international crisis cannot be explained in terms of the Cold War and the security concerns it engendered in the Middle East region. This was a totally artificial crisis, and the USSR made a strenuous effort to defuse it. The explanation lay in Turkey's domestic politics. Turkey was scheduled to hold a general election in 1957. The DP government was moving toward a critical election faced with serious economic problems and shaken by violent arguments over democracy and its implementation. By bringing about the Syrian crisis, it drew the public's attention away from economic woes to foreign policy. It also helped remind the Americans, who had been reducing their economic aid since 1955, of the deteriorating situation in the Middle East and the importance of the role played by Turkey in the region. The Syrian crisis caused Turkey's relations with the other Arab countries to deteriorate further.

3. The 1958 Iraqi Coup and the Establishment of CENTO

With the beginning of the Cold War, Iraq pursued a policy that diverged from the other Arab states and became the sole Arab member of the Baghdad Pact. The coup that occurred on 14 July 1958 under the leadership of Gen. Abdulkarim Kassem not only toppled the monarchy in Iraq but also led to important changes in the whole Middle East. The coup took place on the day when the Baghdad Pact was to hold a high-level meeting in Istanbul. The leaders of the Baghdad Pact members were shocked to learn that King Faisal, the regent Prince Abdulilah, and prime minister Nuri Said, whom they expected to see in İstanbul, had been murdered in Baghdad. At the İstanbul meeting held on 14-17 July, the events in Iraq were considered. The joint communiqué issued at the end of the meetings condemned the coup and described it as resulting from subversive activities directed from outside Iraq. The international community was curious to know if the member states would intervene in Iraq. The Baghdad Pact governments sent a message to the U.S. declaring that Nasser and the Communists instigated the coup and that Washington's reaction would be of vital importance. Their message concluded by calling on the U.S. to apply the Eisenhower Doctrine and intervene in Iraq.

Turkey's reaction to the coup was even tougher. In a press briefing held on 17 July, minister of foreign affairs F.R. Zorlu declared that Turkey did not recognize any new Iraqi government. The head of the Iraq-Jordan Federation was King Hussein and the only legitimate government was the government under his leadership. As a matter of fact, the federation to which Zorlu alluded had ceased to exist. Baghdad radio was appealing to the Jordanians to rise up against the rule of King Hussein. On 2 August King Hussein announced that the Arab federal union between Iraq and Jordan was at an end.

The Turkish government was highly disturbed by the events in Iraq and was seriously contemplating a military intervention. Zorlu's proposal to this end received the approval of Bayar and Menderes. The U.S. and Britain, however, warned Turkey against any hasty action on the grounds that an intervention would help bring the Iraqis solidly behind the new regime, drive the Iraqi government closer to Egypt and the USSR, and perhaps even lead to a Soviet intervention.

The mild policies of the U.S. and other Western states vis-à-vis the new administration in Iraq persuaded Turkey to moderate its stand. On 31 July 1958 Ankara recognized the new regime in Baghdad.

The most significant international consequence of the Iraqi coup was the transformation of the Baghdad Pact into the Central Treaty Organization (CENTO). In its concern to prevent a possible intervention, the new Iraqi regime was careful not to strain its relations with Western states and decided to stay in the Baghdad Pact, although it remained passive as a member. For Baghdad, this was the organization that had alienated it from the rest of the Arab states.

On 28–29 July all the foreign ministers of the countries of the Baghdad Pact except Iraq, plus the U.S., met in London to reassess the situation in the Middle East. The communiqué issued after the meeting stated that the situation in the Middle East made the Baghdad Pact more essential than ever and asked the U.S. to join the pact. Although the U.S. turned down the call to join the pact once again, it did reinforce its bilateral ties with its members. The bilateral agreement signed by Turkey with the U.S. on 5 March 1959 was based on this London communiqué.

On 23 October 1958 the Council of the Baghdad Pact announced that the headquarters of the organization would temporarily be transferred to Ankara because of the current situation and in order to secure the continuation of the activities of the pact. Iraq failed to participate in the Karachi meeting held on 26 January 1959 and announced its withdrawal from the pact on 24 March 1959. In his speech delivered on that occasion, General Kassem declared that "membership in a military and aggressive pact is incompatible with Iraq's neutrality" (Keesing's Contemporary Archives, 1959–1960, P. 16749, quoted in Kürkçüoğlu, p. 129). The pact's last link with the Arab world had thus been severed.

On 21 August 1959 it was announced that the name of the Baghdad Pact had been changed to CENTO and that its headquarters would henceforth be in Ankara. The first meeting of the CENTO Council was held in Washington on 7–9 October 1959 under the presidency of U.S. secretary of state Christian Herter. After the meeting, it was announced that the organization had been renamed the Central Treaty Organization because it was located between NATO and SEATO. CENTO became a part of the Western defense system in the Middle East and continued to function until the Iranian revolution in 1979.

4. Turkey and the Events of1958 in Lebanon and Jordan

In 1958 nationalist movements influenced by Nasser began to appear not just in Iraq but throughout the Middle East. They were opposed to the existing order and governments in power. Nasser instigated nationalist stirrings against the established order not just in Iraq but throughout the Middle East. In Lebanon, there was fierce opposition to the pro-Western policies of the Maronite leader Camille Chamoun. Chamoun's term of office would expire in 1958, and according to the Constitution he could not be reelected. When he attempted to change the Constitution, the pro-Nasser nationalists took up arms; violence broke out.

As Lebanon was drawn into turmoil, Chamoun became alarmed by the 14 July coup in Iraq and called on the U.S. to back him. On 15 July U.S. marines landed on the tourist beaches of Beirut, ostensibly to protect the interests of Americans in Lebanon and to preserve the independence and territorial integrity of a country of vital importance for U.S. interests and world peace. Thus the Eisenhower Doctrine was being implemented for the first time to help the Lebanese government.

Turkey expressed its satisfaction over the U.S. action in Lebanon, both in its collective statements with other Baghdad Pact members and in its own official pronouncements. It also allowed the U.S. to use the air base at İncirlik. As a precaution against emergencies, about five thousand American soldiers were sent there during the U.S. landing in Lebanon. But Turkey did more than allowing the use of İncirlik. Minister Zorlu informed the U.S. ambassador that the Turkish government was ready to support U.S. actions by placing its airforce in a state of alert. The U.S. informed Turkey, however, that this was not a NATO operation and that the Turkish Air Force, already allocated to NATO, would not be required.

In the TGNA, the opposition rebuked the government for its policies in connection with the Lebanese events. In his reply to the opposition, Zorlu admitted that the İncirlik base had been used for purposes outside Turkey's NATO commitments. He claimed that this had been done to support a friendly small country and dismissed the criticism as misguided.

The use of the İncirlik base also drew criticism from the USSR and the UAR. But the Turkish government was intent on demonstrating to the U.S. and the West that Turkey was a dependable ally at a time when the Turkish economy was in very great difficulty.

The Iraqi coup affected Jordan even more than Lebanon. According to the Constitution of the Arab federal union, all powers and responsibilities were transferred to Jordan's King Hussein when the king of Iraq, who also happened to be the head of the union, was overthrown. King Hussein feared that the events in Iraq would spread to Jordan. After the Lebanese intervention, he asked the U.S. and Britain on 16 July to help Jordan. Britain heeded this request, and some British units based in Cyprus were flown to Jordan. The U.S. provided support for this operation. Having secured Western support, Jordan went to the UN and accused the UAR of interfering in its internal affairs. On 20 July Jordan severed its diplomatic ties with that country.

Turkey sided with the West once again during the intervention in Jordan. Ankara described the British intervention as "defense of Jordan's independence against subversive activities with foreign roots" (Kürkçüoğlu, p. 135).

The Cold War was at its height in the 1950s, and Turkey's national policy then was to look at all events from a NATO perspective. It was this policy that led Turkey to be in the forefront in the establishment of the Baghdad Pact. Turkey was slow to grasp the Arab countries' deep desire to pursue nationalist and independent policies. Such policies were invariably assessed as attempts by the Soviet Union to implant its influence in the Middle East. Furthermore, in its eagerness to maintain good relations with the West and demonstrate its dependability as an ally, Turkey adopted policies that were against independence movements in the region. The Turkish War of Liberation waged against imperialism had made a profound impression on the Third World. Against this background, the Menderes government's policy of supporting France in the Algerian struggle for independence, which started in 1954, came as a rude shock to the countries of the region and adversely affected Turkey's relations with them.

Despite the profound sympathy of the Turkish public for the Algerian struggle, Turkey voted against the Afro-Asian motion to place the issue on the UN's agenda in 1955. In 1957 and 1958 Turkey abstained on the Afro-Asian resolution on self-determination for Algeria. At that time, Greece was consistently voting with the Afro-Asian bloc. This should explain why Turkey was so isolated when the question of Cyprus came up for discussion at the United Nations in the 1960s. In the 1960s Turkey reviewed its Middle Eastern policies and sought to bring about a rapprochement with the Arab countries. But it was not so easy to live down the image that it had acquired as "the representative of imperialism in the Middle East."

II. THE QUESTION OF PALESTINE A. The Background of the Question

The thorny question of Palestine, which erupted after World War II, has its roots in the policies of the Western states, which were bent on dismembering the Ottoman state during World War I.

On 16 May 1916 Britain and France signed the secret Sykes-Picot Agreement (see Box 1-23 in Section 1) regarding the allotment of Ottoman territories in the Middle East. According to this agreement, France would be allocated the entire Syrian coastline, starting in Acre and going north to include Beirut. In addition, France was to get Adana and Mersin. Britain would get the region between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers from Basra to Baghdad. There was no provision in the agreement about the disposition of Palestine.

After World War I, Britain engaged in intensive activities to ensure that Palestine came under its control. At that point, Britain's regional policies were heavily influenced by Lord Rothschild, who was president of the Federation of Zionist Associations of Britain. The declaration signed by the foreign secretary, Lord Arthur Balfour, on 2 November 1917 was drafted by Lord Rothschild. This declaration had a determining influence in the unfolding of the question of Palestine.

The Balfour Declaration contained the following passage: "His Majesty's government approves the establishment in Palestine of a national homeland for the Jewish people, and shall make every effort to make this possible." Although the declaration also made clear that the civil and religious rights of the non-Jewish communities already living in Palestine would be fully protected, the political rights of Jews would have priority.

An effort was made at the San Remo Conference, held in April 1920, to settle the fate of Palestine. At this conference, Britain and France revised the Sykes-Picot Agreement and reapportioned the Ottoman Empire's Middle Eastern territories. They agreed that France would be given a mandate over Syria and Lebanon, while Britain would get a mandate over Palestine, Jordan (Trans-Jordan), and Iraq.

Under Britain's mandate administration, Jewish immigration to Palestine increased rapidly. From 1920 to 1922 twenty-five thousand Jews moved into the territory. This situation inevitably led to disputes and tensions, especially in urban centers like Jerusalem and Jaffa. There were a great number of Jewish organizations in Palestine whose activities exacerbated the tension.

On 3 June 1922 Britain sent the World Zionist Organization an explanatory note, stating that it was not the intention of the Balfour Declaration to establish a Jewish Palestine but only a national homeland for the Jews. Furthermore, Britain was not prepared to share its sovereignty in the territory with any of the Jewish organizations operating there. Britain made clear that all those living in Palestine were Palestinian subjects. The Jews living there could only be described as a community within the larger Palestinian population. The Council of the League of Nations adopted a resolution on Palestine on 24 July 1922, which confirmed Britain's understanding of the situation.

– s.e.c Kütümlesi Despite Britain's efforts to bring clarity to the Balfour Declaration's imprecise language and minimize misinterpretations and abuses, it could not prevent the erosion of its position in the region and a weakening of its influence. During the interwar years, there was a continuing struggle between the Jews, who were intent on turning a national homeland in Palestine into a Jewish state, and the Arabs, who wanted to foil this ambition.

On three occasions in 1920, 1921, and 1924, Arab and Jewish rivalries in Palestine degenerated into disturbances and clashes, which the British authorities proved incapable of subduing. As anti-Semitism gathered strength in Europe, the flow of Jewish settlers to Palestine grew, further upsetting the makeup of the population. All of these factors helped to make the problem insoluble in the 1930s. The Arab and especially the Jewish terror organizations that were established in the early 1930s targeted one another as well as the British and left scars that lasted for many years in the Palestinian landscape.

Britain sought to control the situation by resorting to military measures. It also proposed political solutions in White Books that it issued from time to time. Neither the Arab nor the Jewish community was satisfied with these British efforts to find a way out of the difficulties. The tension and the clashes continued during World War II. The UN inherited the LoN's problem after the war and had to grapple with it throughout the years.

B. Israel's Independence and Turkey's Reaction

1. The Partition of Palestine and Turkey

When the British and American efforts to find a solution to the question after World War II proved fruitless, Britain placed the question on the UN's agenda on 2 April 1947. Britain was looking for a way to rid itself of a problem that had been plaguing it for too many years.

On 15 May 1947 the UN General Assembly decided to set up a working group to be known as the Ad Hoc United Nations Commission for Palestine. The members of the commission were to go to Palestine, examine the situation, and report back. The commission's report was submitted to the secretary-general of the UN on 1 September 1947. In their report, the members agreed unanimously on a package of principles. The report also contained a majority plan and a minority plan. According to the principles adopted unanimously, the mandate administration was to come to an end immediately and Palestine would become independent. According to the majority plan, the independent state of Palestine would be partitioned into Arab and Jewish states, joined in an economic union with Jerusalem coming under an international administration. The minority plan called for a federal Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital and consisting of Arab and Jewish federated entities.

The Arabs favored an independent Arab state in Palestine and were adamantly opposed to the idea of partition. The U.S. and the USSR announced on 10 November 1947, however, that they supported partition. Britain stated on 13 November that it would withdraw its troops from Palestine and end the mandate regime on 14 May 1948. The UN General Assembly decided on 29 November that Palestine would be partitioned into Arab and Jewish states.

In the course of the debates at the UN, Turkey sided with the Arab states that were opposed to partition and supported an independent Arab Palestine. This was in keeping with its traditional foreign policy, which lasted until the proclamation of the Truman Doctrine.

When the Ad Hoc United Nations Commission for Palestine's report was being considered in the General Assembly, Turkey continued to support the Arab position. Turkey was among the twelve countries that voted against the partition resolution, along with the six Arab states. At a time when even the USSR voted for partition, Turkey sided with the Arab states and earned their gratitude. The Western press saw this Turkish position as a manifestation of Muslim solidarity. Turkey's motives were not based on sympathy for the Arabs, however, but on the need to guard against the destabilization that partition would bring about in the region (Gruen 1997, p. 115).

2. The Establishment of the State of Israel

Soon after the UN General Assembly adopted the resolution on the partition of Palestine, clashes erupted between the Arab and Jewish communities of that country. The Arab League met four times in the interval between December 1947 and April 1948 and adopted a series of decisions opposing partition and threatening to resort to armed force to prevent it. During this period the Jewish terrorist organizations Haganah, Irgun, and Stern intensified their activities directed against the Arab population. This in turn led the Arabs to retaliate against Jewish civilians.

As a consequence of the clashes and the terrorist activities directed against them, the Arabs were forced to abandon many of their settlements to the Jews. On 14 May 1948 the Jewish National Council met in Tel Aviv, a few hours before the expiry of the British Mandate Administration, and declared an independent state of Israel in Palestine. David Ben Gurion formed the first Israeli cabinet on that day. The U.S. recognized the new state just eleven minutes after it was established, while the USSR announced its recognition on 17 May.

The establishment of an Israeli state in Palestine, without a corresponding Arab state, was met with caution and apprehension in Turkey. The government was opposed to the establishment of the state of Israel for two fundamental reasons.

First, despite all the efforts by the LoN and the UN to resolve the issue of Palestine, the question had become ever more insoluble. To establish a Jewish state by overriding Arab opposition at a time when the question was most intractable would make peace in Palestine that much harder to achieve. Turkey had supported the Arabs in the UN debates from the very beginning and did not relish seeing a solution to which it was opposed.

Second, Turkey had misgivings about the future political orientation of Israel, located so close to its southern borders. The Jewish terror organizations that played such a large part in the creation of the state of Israel had close links with the USSR. Czechoslovak arms had been smuggled into the region after 1946 with the help of the USSR. The USSR had also given the green light to the process of transferring Jews from the countries under Communist domination in Eastern Europe to Palestine. The cooperative farms and workshops established in Jewish settlements during the years of the mandate were being run according to socialist precepts. All of this led Ankara to fear the creation of a Soviet satellite in the Middle East.

3. The Arab-Israeli War and the Conciliation Commission for Palestine

Immediately after Israel's declaration of independence, the armies of Egypt, Syria, Transjordan, and Iraq invaded Palestine. Despite their numerical superiority, the inexperienced and uncoordinated Arab armies were unable to register any significant successes. On 22 May 1948 the UN Security Council called on the parties to end all military activities and observe a cease-fire. This resolution was followed by a further resolution on 29 May, calling on the parties to observe a four-week cease-fire. When Israel and the Arab states announced that they would observe the cease-fire, hostilities came to an end. But, starting in mid-October, clashes erupted once again in southern Palestine between Israeli and Egyptian forces. The Israeli forces established superiority over the Egyptian forces and even occupied some Egyptian territory. The UN Security Council called for an immediate cease-fire on 29 December. Egypt and Israel complied with this order in early January 1949. In the first half of 1949 Israel signed separate cease-fire agreements with Egypt, Transjordan, Lebanon, and Syria.

Even as the war raged, the UN General Assembly passed a resolution establishing the Conciliation Commission for Palestine, made up of the representatives of the U.S., France, and Turkey. A balanced commission was sought by selecting a pro-Israel American, neutral French, and pro-Arab Turkish members. Turkey had already displayed the first signs of its change of policy vis-à-vis Israel's independence, however, by supporting the formation of the commission against Arab opposition and by accepting membership in it.

The reasons behind this change of policy were the proclamation of the Truman Doctrine and the launching of the Marshall Plan. The priorities of Turkish foreign policy would shift perceptibly after this and be more closely aligned with the West. Turkey's membership in the Conciliation Commission for Palestine marked the beginning of the long period of coolness in its relations with Arab countries. During its membership in the commission, Turkey departed from its pro-Arab line of opposing partition and shifted to a more neutral stance, while attempting to conciliate the two sides.

The Turkish member of the commission was Hüseyin Cahit Yalçın, a nationalist intellectual and a close friend of İsmet İnönü. Although he was a confirmed anti-Communist and therefore suspicious of the apparent close links between the USSR and Israel, he did nothing in the commission that would betray his neutrality. After a meeting with prime minister Ben Gurion in Israel, Yalçın was able to cast off his misgivings over Israel's links with the USSR. When he returned to Turkey, he recommended to İnönü that Turkey recognize Israel.

4. Turkey's Recognition of Israel

On 30 June 1948, soon after Israel declared its independence, Turkey and Israel concluded a postal agreement. Despite Israel's pleas and the telegram sent to Ankara by Israel's foreign minister, Moshe Sharett, Turkey was not yet disposed to recognize Israel and preferred to follow a wait-and-see policy. When the Arab states protested the postal agreement signed by Turkey with Israel, Ankara pointed out that 10,000 of its citizens lived in Israel and that the agreement was concluded solely for humane reasons.

When hostilities broke out between Israel and its Arab neighbors, Ankara maintained a neutral stance and took measures to restrict the travel of its citizens who wanted to go to Palestine to fight. But once the fighting lost its intensity in September 1948, Turkey lifted the travel ban imposed on those wishing to go to Palestine. Radio Ankara broadcast the announcement that Turkish citizens were free to travel to any country they chose. This was the green light for Turkish citizens of Jewish background who wanted to emigrate. From the latter part of 1948 on, thousands of Turkish Jews were transported to Israel through Ankara's cooperation with the Jewish Agency. This figure would reach 50,000 in the early 1950s (Gruen 1997, p. 116). It could be said that behind this liberal policy lurked the wish, perhaps subconscious, to see a homogeneous Turkish nation-state freed of all non-Muslim minorities. This was the policy advocated since the time of the Committee of Union and Progress, and these sentiments were present, if only subconsciously, in the cadres that helped the Jews to emigrate.

Turkey recognized Israel on 28 March 1949 while it was still on the Conciliation Commission for Palestine. It was the first Muslim country to do so. Shortly before the recognition, minister of foreign affairs Necmettin Sadak declared that, in order to carry out its work in the commission with objectivity, Turkey had to do what thirty other countries had already done and recognize Israel. This was the justification for Turkey's action. But Turkey had three other basic reasons for recognizing Israel.

First, Turkey's pro-West foreign policy following World War II called for this recognition. Although the USSR and the countries of Eastern Europe were among the thirty mentioned by Minister Sadak, the majority of countries recognizing Israel were Western. The preparations for creating NATO were underway at the time, and Turkey was eager to be a member. For this, Turkey had to bring its policies into line with those of its prospective allies. Furthermore, Sadak was due to travel to Washington in early April. Ankara was expecting more U.S. political and financial support and felt the need to make a friendly gesture toward Truman, who was totally committed to Israel.

A second reason was that the initial fears in Ankara that Israel might end up as a Soviet satellite turned out to be groundless. Israel established cordial relations with the U.S. and proved that it was not a covert ally of the USSR. Even a confirmed anti-Communist like Hüseyin Cahit Yalçın declared to the Turkish press that he had seen no indication that Israel was under the influence of any foreign power (Gruen 1997, p. 116). Finally, the intellectual establishment in Turkey was becoming increasingly critical of the government's pro-Arab policies. The psychological effects of the Arab revolt and betrayal of 1916 were still being felt in Turkey. The Turkish intellectuals considered events from the angle "my enemy's enemy is my friend," a dictum that always had validity in the Middle East. From this perspective, Israel had been established in a struggle with the Ottoman State's enemies of World War I. Consequently, it was proper to establish warm relations with this new state. Furthermore, the process of ridding Turkish culture and society of Arab influences had created a negative predisposition toward Arab states among Turkish intellectuals. This was another factor in the decision to recognize Israel.

III. RELATIONS WITH NON-ARAB STATES

Relations with Israel

Background of the Progressive Development of Relations with Israel

At the opening session of the TGNA on 1 November 1949, President İnönü delivered a speech in which he assessed relations with Israel in the following terms: "We have established political relations with the newly created state of Israel. We expect this state to be an element of stability and a force for peace in the Middle East."

Inönü's sympathy for Israel helped in accelerating the development of relations with that country. Approximately one year after Turkey's decision to recognize Israel, on 9 March 1950, diplomatic links were established with the opening of legations in Ankara and Tel Aviv. At the same time, there was a diversification in relations. This process was launched by the CHP government but continued when the DP came to power. The process gathered strength under the influence of four factors.

1. There were a number of similarities between the two countries. Both states were established in the Middle East on the model of a secular state in a region where religious elements were in the forefront. Although secularism, the defining feature of the Turkish Republic, did not figure explicitly in the documents establishing Israel, in practice the Israeli administration exercised its responsibilities without reference to religion.

Furthermore, both states were run according to Western models. Care was being taken to establish and maintain parliamentary democracy in the political sphere, while Western-type development models were being implemented in the economic sphere in both Turkey and Israel.

2. The U.S. had succeeded Britain as the dominant power in the Middle East and established cordial relations with Israel, which had its effect in Turkey. As Turkey established close political and economic ties with the U.S., Israel was following a parallel course. This inevitably brought Turkey and Israel closer together. The American-inspired legislation for promoting foreign investments and for regulating the exploration and extraction of petroleum adopted by Turkey corresponded closely to Israel's laws adopted during that period. There was a striking similarity in the two countries' relations with the U.S.

The Turkish leaders were aware of the influence of the Jewish lobby on decision-makers in Washington. In their desire to pursue and develop their cooperation with the U.S., they consciously cultivated their relations with Israel.

3. Turkey was uncomfortable about the policies of the Arab states in relation to the Korean War. Turkey saw participation in the Korean War as an important opportunity for gaining entry into NATO. At the UN, the Arab states were against military intervention in Korea, while Israel was a firm supporter of the U.S. position in advocating military intervention. This helped in raising Israel's standing in Ankara.

4. The desire to develop bilateral relations was felt as strongly in Israel as it was in Turkey. Israel appointed one of its ablest diplomats, Elihu Sasson, to its legation in Ankara. It also appointed a military attaché, its fourth after Washington, Paris, and London. These were demonstrations of the importance that Israel attached to its relations with Turkey. Israel's leaders were convinced that their efforts to establish strong links with the West would be helped by having good relations with pro-Western Turkey (Nachmani 1987, pp. 3–40).

In addition, some Israeli leaders felt that Turkey might be helpful in resolving the problems between Israel and the Arab states.

2. Economic and Cultural Relations

There were close trade relations with Palestine dating from the days of the British mandate. These relations continued in the postwar years. Turkey's exports to Palestine from 1946 to 1949 amounted to $18 million. This made Palestine Turkey's third largest market.

After the establishment of diplomatic relations with Israel, priority was given to developing the existing trade relations. Trade negotiations were undertaken in February 1950, leading to the signature of a trade agreement as well as a payments agreement on 4 July. These agreements allowed Turkey to supply Israel with all of its cotton and half of its cereal requirements, amounting to 150,000 tons. This was in the 1950s, when Israel had not yet embarked on its agricultural revolution. During this period Turkey met an important part of Israel's needs for tobacco, wool, dried fruits, meat, and fish as well as minerals. Turkey's imports from Israel consisted of electrical tools, tires, construction materials, pharmaceuticals, glass products, and chemicals. In addition, trucks, bulldozers, tractors, and steel products manufactured in Eastern European countries were imported via Israel, because Turkey had not yet established proper trade links with these countries. The two agreements also made possible direct payments between the Turkish Central Bank and the Anglo-Palestine Bank, which acted as Israel's central bank at that time.

In addition to the 1950 agreements, a provisional agreement was signed to regulate trade matters, pending the signing of a comprehensive agreement on trade and navigation. With this provisional agreement, the parties granted one another most-favored-nation status, although with certain reservations.

During this period Israeli firms undertook the construction of housing projects and military airbases in Turkey. The road linking Yeşilköy Airport with İstanbul was built by the Israeli firm Solel Boneh. An Israeli firm built the housing project in Ankara that was known as the "Israeli housing project."

When Israel accomplished its successful agricultural development and gained a large measure of self-sufficiency and even became an exporter of farm products, Turkey's exports to Israel started to shrink rapidly. After 1954 Israel began to register a surplus in its trade relations with Turkey. From then until the early 1990s Turkish-Israeli trade maintained a steady course.

In the first half of the 1950s there were lively cultural relations between the two countries. The president of the U.S.-based World Jewish Congress, Rabbi Maurice Perlzweig, met with foreign minister Fuat Köprülü in Ankara and expressed his satisfaction with the condition of Turkish Jews. Köprülü agreed to Perlzweig's request for the Turkish Jews to establish links with the World Jewish Congress. This was received very favorably in Israel. A year later, the 500th anniversary of İstanbul's conquest by the Turks was marked with various academic events in Israeli universities. Many Jewish migrants from Turkey were instrumental in organizing these events. These celebrations made a positive impact in Ankara.

A forest was established on Mount Carmel near Haifa and named after Atatürk. The foremost Israeli football team, Hapoel Tel Aviv, played its first international match in Turkey against Fenerbahçe. All of these activities helped in enriching the cultural dimension of relations (Nachmani 1992, pp. 15–16).

The close economic and cultural relationship between Turkey and Israel allowed political relations to follow a smooth course. But the events of the second half of the 1950s led to a cooling of these relations.

3. Political Relations

Israel's Attitude to the Baghdad Pact

Israel followed the process leading to the establishment of the Baghdad Pact with close interest. At first Israel refrained from joining Egypt, Syria, and Saudi Arabia in their violent opposition to the new formation, because of the enthusiastic support of Washington and London for the pact. Three developments, however, led Israel to join the ranks of those who stood against the pact.

The first was the language employed by Turkey and Iraq in the negotiations leading up to the signing of the Baghdad Pact. After the talks in Ankara between the parties, the joint communiqué adopted on 19 October 1954 contained the following sentence: "Turkey and Iraq are agreed that the only way to ensure world peace and security is for the nations that are sincerely attached to the ideals and principles of the UN Charter to be in full solidarity and united in a solid collective defense front against those who aim to oppress them and destroy their existence." It was also stressed in the text that "Turkey would consider it to be against its own interests to follow a course of action that ignored the legitimate interests of the Arab states." The joint communiqué issued on 12 January 1955 following Menderes's visit to Baghdad contained the following passage: "Turkey and Iraq will strive to ensure security by foiling all attempts to commit aggression in the Middle East in violation of the principles of the UN, as well as the resolutions in compliance with these principles aimed at achieving stability." Israel interpreted this language as Turkish support for the Arabs in the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The second development disturbing Israel was the speech of Iraq's prime minister on 26 February 1955, in which he interpreted article 5 of the pact as meaning that Israel would never be admitted to the pact.

The third development was Menderes's statement made in Damascus following his visit to Baghdad. To reassure his Syrian hosts about the Baghdad Pact, Menderes declared that Turkey stood ready to come to the assistance of the Arabs in the event of an Israeli attack.

Israel expressed its displeasure to Ankara over the proposed Baghdad Pact as well as the Turkish policies toward Israel. At the same time, it made demarches in Washington and London to foil the Baghdad Pact. The Israeli minister in Ankara voiced Israel's misgivings to Turkish deputy prime minister Zorlu on 7 January 1955 but failed to get a positive response.

Britain and the U.S. continued to provide full support for the Baghdad Pact; but at the same time, they suggested that the Turkish government might do something to soothe Israel. When he conferred with the British ambassador on 22 January 1955, Adnan Menderes declared that Turkey's policy toward Israel remained unchanged. He repeated these reassurances to the Israeli envoy in Ankara on 28 January. When the Israeli diplomat inquired whether Turkey would stand up against an Iraqi attempt to use the Baghdad Pact against Israel, Menderes replied that there was a 90% probability that Turkey would oppose such a move. Menderes also requested that the Israeli government not use these friendly assurances as propaganda material. He was concerned about attracting Arab hostility.

Menderes failed to ease Israel's concerns, however. In March 1955 Israel delivered a note to Ankara that recalled Ankara's past pronouncements favoring Israel and sought clarifications about whether there was any change in Turkey's position. Ankara replied that the Turkish position remained unchanged, but its credibility was suffering because of its pro-Arab policies aimed at winning over the Arab countries that remained outside the Baghdad Pact.

Israel should have been more sensitive about not upsetting its relationship with the only country in the region with which it had friendly relations. Instead Tel Aviv escalated the tension with Ankara by keeping up its criticism of the Baghdad Pact, to which Turkey attributed utmost importance. The Israeli government claimed that the Baghdad Pact was an anti-Israeli organization and that it would foment anti-Israeli feelings among the Arabs and encourage Arab aggression.

Israel's policies caused considerable displeasure in Ankara, which was enthusiastically pushing for the formation of the Baghdad Pact. As a result, Ankara reviewed its policies toward Israel. Starting in the summer of 1955, Turkey's diplomatic contacts with Israel were reduced to a minimum level. Turkish ministers started refusing to give appointments to Israel's minister in Ankara. As a consequence, Israel's legation lost its diplomatic function and was reduced to a mere observer mission.

The creation of the Baghdad Pact had cooled bilateral relations, but the events of 1956 created even greater tension.

b. Turkey's Policy toward Israel during the 1956 Suez Crisis

When Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser nationalized the Suez Canal, Israel attacked Egypt on 29 October 1956. This was followed by the combined British and French attack the next day. The war and its aftermath were followed closely in Turkey. Both Israel's aggression and British and French support for the aggressor received widespread criticism.

Although the Turkish government looked upon the events with disapproval, it refrained from taking a public stand against Britain and France, its allies in NATO. Zorlu, a prominent member of the DP leadership, declared: "Turkey regrets the use of force by Britain and France against Egypt. Whatever the motives, such action has to be seen as a violation of international law." He then softened his criticism by adding: "British and French intervention contributed to ending the war." Zorlu was making it clear that he did not want to confront these two allied countries.

Turkey's approach to Israel was different. The four regional members of the Baghdad Pact met in Tehran in November to discuss this question. Ankara gave the first tangible sign of its changed policy toward Israel by signing the statement condemning Israel that was adopted at this meeting. Ankara also gave serious consideration to the idea of recalling its minister in Tel Aviv. Turkey contemplated taking this course in order to deflect the criticism of the Arab countries directed at Iraq for entering into an alliance in the Baghdad Pact with Turkey, a country with diplomatic relations with Israel. Before recalling its minister, Ankara was making efforts to prevent Britain from interpreting this as a hostile attitude toward Israel.

In the days following the Tehran meeting, criticism of Israel continued to mount in Turkey, even as the Arab world's outrage kept growing. Turkey responded to these developments by recalling its minister in Tel Aviv, Şevkatî Istinyeli, on 26 November 1956. In doing this, Turkey was seeking to stem the tide of anti-Turkish criticism coming from Arab states, particularly Egypt. Despite Turkey's readiness to renounce its good relations with Israel in all fields, however, the Egyptian leadership continued its vilification of Turkey. This kept Turkey from severing its diplomatic ties with Tel Aviv.

When Turkey recalled its minister from Tel Aviv and the Turkish mission in Israel was reduced to chargé d'affaires level, an anomalous situation emerged, because Israel failed to reciprocate Ankara's action. This created displeasure in Ankara, which started pressing Israel to recall its minister. Israel eventually complied and on 19 December 1956 recalled its minister back to Tel Aviv. Relations between the two countries remained at chargé d'affaires level until July 1980, when Israel declared Jerusalem to be its capital, whereupon Turkey retaliated by reducing its representation to second-secretary level.

c. The Peripheral Pact

The developments in the Middle East following the Suez crisis led to the idea of new machinery for regional cooperation under Israel's leadership. Israel's prime minister David Ben Gurion felt that the Pan-Arab currents unleashed by Nasser in Egypt and Cairo's close links with the USSR were a direct threat to Israel's security. Israel's feeling of insecurity was made worse when Egypt and Syria merged to form the United Arab Republic in February 1958. Soviet military experts took up duties in the UAR, compounding Israel's fears.

Ben Gurion considered that the threat to Israel posed by the Arabs could only be neutralized by a pact consisting of the non-Arab countries of the region. The Israeli prime minister called this arrangement, designed to circumscribe the Arab states, the Peripheral Pact. The name was selected because its members would be the countries on the periphery of Arab states: Ethiopia, Iran, and Turkey.

The U.S. was the chief supporter of the Peripheral Pact. Secretary Dulles considered that the pact would help reduce Soviet influence in the region, so he encouraged Israel to proceed with the formation of the pact on an urgent basis. He also briefed the leaders of the prospective members on the features of the pact. With U.S. backing, Ben Gurion signed cooperation agreements in the field of security with Ethiopia and Iran in early 1958. He was well aware, however, that such a pact would be a non-starter without the participation of one of the strongest countries in the region: Turkey.

On 28 August 1958 Ben Gurion and foreign minister Golda Meir visited Ankara secretly and conferred with Menderes and Zorlu. News of the visit was withheld from the press; and, in order to prevent leaks, diplomats from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs served as waiters at the meals (Nachmani 1987, pp. 74–76). Dulles had briefed Menderes and Zorlu on the pact. During the one-day visit of the Israeli leaders, the Turkish leaders accepted the proposal for Turkey to join the Peripheral Pact (Nachmani 1992, pp. 31–33). Three reasons can be advanced for Turkey's acceptance.

1. After the diplomatic row with Syria in 1957, the decision of Egypt and Syria to unite their two countries was not well received by Ankara. The Soviet decision to provide Syria with military aid was also a matter for concern in Turkey.

2. After the coup carried out by General Kassem in Baghdad in July 1958 and the end for all practical purposes of Iraq's membership in the Baghdad Pact, Turkey perceived a growing threat on its southern borders. The U.S. was eager to see Turkey within the Peripheral Pact.

Essentially, the Peripheral Pact was designed to secure joint action among its members to confront Pan-Arab and Communist currents. In addition, the members were expected to engage in increased scientific and economic cooperation. The pact's most effective action was the establishment of a network (known as Trident) among the intelligence services of the members. The intelligence services met twice a year to share information within the framework of this arrangement.

After the establishment of the Peripheral Pact, Turkish-Israeli relations improved and returned to their state prior to the Suez crisis. But the events of the second half of the 1960s brought this period of cooperation to an end.

B. Relations with Iran

Overcoming the Wartime Interruption

From 1941, when the wartime Allies occupied Iran, until the end of 1947, Turkish-Iranian relations were at a stand-still. During these years, decisions relating to Iran were taken by the occupying powers rather than by the Iranian government. This was why Turkey made representations with Britain on the subject of two issues having to do with Iran.

The first issue was British ill-treatment of the Kashkai Turks living in Shiraz and the Persian Gulf region. Britain perceived the Kashkai Turks as pro-German and imposed strict controls on their confederation of tribes, which had always maintained a semiautonomous existence. Actually, Shah Reza had followed similar policies toward the Kashkai in the 1930s, but this had not affected Turkish-Iranian relations during the Atatürk era. Ankara felt the need to become interested in the fate of the Turkish peoples living beyond its borders during the war years, however, under the influence of racist and Pan-Turkic currents that were being stirred up by Nazi Germany.

The representation made by Ankara on behalf of the Kashkais was due to its interest in the fate of Turks outside its borders, even if this was at the cost of interfering in the internal affairs of another state. This was a significant departure from Turkey's traditional foreign policy. Once Germany lost the initiative in the war and enthusiasm for Pan-Turkic causes started waning, however, Turkey returned to its traditional policies.

The second issue was the probability that the Soviet occupation might continue after the war. Turkey feared that, as in the case of the Balkan states that became Soviet satellites toward the end of the war, Iran might also end up under Moscow's control. This would mean that the USSR and its satellites would surround Turkey on three sides. Turkey was calling on Britain to be more sensitive to this probability.

At this time, Turkey's main concern was the Soviet threat, so it gave its fullest support to the preservation of Iran's territorial integrity and tried hard to prevent the Iranian government from coming under Soviet influence. Turkey's support for Tehran continued even as the shah's forces destroyed Azerbaijan's autonomy in 1946, whereas Turkey's main concern during the war had been the wellbeing of people with Turkish roots living in Iran.

After a ten-year hiatus during the war years and thereafter, Turkish-Iranian relations revived in 1948. That year, a new Iranian ambassador was assigned to Ankara, a post that had been vacant for a long time. In 1949 Yakup Kadri Karaosmanoğlu became Turkey's ambassador in Tehran.

In the new bipolar world order, both Turkey and Iran perceived a threat emanating from the USSR in 1945 and 1946. This led the two countries to come closer to the West and to adopt similar foreign policy courses, which helped bring their relations to the level attained during the era of Shah Reza. In the old days, relations were direct and on a bilateral basis. Now the relations were developing in a more indirect way through the U.S. These relations suffered a setback when Mosaddeq came to power in Tehran.

The Mosaddeg Period

The nationalistic tendencies that appeared in Iran in the early 1950s and prime minister Mohammad Mosaddeq's attempt to nationalize the petroleum industry were not well received in Turkey. At this time, the defining feature of Turkey's foreign policy was its Western orientation: for Ankara, being anti-West or anti-U.S. was practically identical with being anti-Turkish. During Mosaddeq's period, not only was Iran drifting toward neutralism, but the Communist Tudeh Party was enjoying increasing popular support and gaining an effective place in the cabinet. Turkey feared that the Mosaddeq government would lead Iran to chaos and bring the country under Moscow's control. This led to a worsening of Turkish-Iranian relations in the years 1951 to 1953, when Mosaddeq held power.

When Iran's relations with Britain became strained because of the dispute over oil, Turkey gave its fullest support to Britain and joined the oil embargo imposed on Iran. Turkey even supported and encouraged a possible British-American operation against Iran, while Tehran accused Turkey of being the compliant tool of imperialism.

In August 1953 Mosaddeq was overthrown through a CIA coup, and Mohammad Reza Pahlavi returned to the throne. Relations immediately resumed their previous course, and the atmosphere of crisis was over. Henceforth, bilateral relations would revolve around the Baghdad Pact.

From the Sadabad Pact to CENTO

The Soviet threat that emerged after World War II forced Turkey and Iran to take a closer interest in collective security models. Turkey was seeking to join the European collective security system, while Iran wanted to revise the Sadabad Pact and turn it into a military alliance. With this mind, Iran proposed to Turkey in 1949 that Pakistan be invited to join the Sadabad Pact and that its text be revised. Turkey responded by noting that such an invitation would not be right before the Afghanistan-Pakistan border dispute was resolved. Ankara added that, if the U.S. did not join the Sadabad Pact, such a move would serve no useful purpose and would needlessly provoke the USSR.

After Shah Mohammed Reza regained control of Iran following the 1953 coup, the influence of the U.S. over Iran became more pronounced. This made the Soviet threat the priority issue of Tehran's foreign policy. The Soviet threat was also Turkey's main concern, and Ankara was in the process of implementing the U.S. plan for establishing a "Northern Tier" to prevent the spread of communism. As we have already noted, the Baghdad Pact was established in 1955, and Iran became a member in November of that year.

Expecting Iran to join the pact from the beginning, Turkey was disturbed to note Iran's early hesitation. To persuade the shah to act, president Celal Bayar visited Iran in September. Bayar found out that Iran's hesitation was entirely due to its wish to secure the maximum amount of military aid from the U.S. before making a move. Bayar explained to his Iranian hosts that Turkey had received significantly more aid after its accession to NATO, and Iran joined the pact shortly after Bayar's visit. Actually, what caused the shah to proceed with caution was his wish not to stir up trouble with pro-Mosaddeq groups and leftists in his country. He did not raise this issue during Bayar's visit, however, in order to avoid giving the impression that there were undependable elements in Iranian society. And yet, in all of the Middle East, including Turkey, Iran was the only country that could generate mass movements capable of influencing the leadership. It would be incorrect to assume that Iran's socioeconomic fabric could not produce opposition. The shah's tendency to conceal the strength of the internal opposition to his policies until his overthrow in 1979 was an important factor in his loss of the throne.

In addition to the nationalist-leftist opposition and the desire to obtain more military aid, another factor caused the shah to proceed with caution in his approach to the pact: the wish not to provoke the USSR. In the 1940s it was Iran that wanted to revise the Sadabad Pact and Turkey that wanted to proceed cautiously in order not to provoke the USSR. Now, in the middle of the 1950s, the roles were reversed. Unlike Turkey, however, Iran did not have the luxury of feeling secure under NATO's umbrella and consequently wanted to see the active participation of the U.S. in the pact.

After the proclamation of the Eisenhower Doctrine in January 1957, the U.S. became a member of the military committee of the Baghdad Pact. This helped in stiffening the pact, but not for long. When Iraq withdrew from the pact after the coup in July 1958, the pact became the Central Treaty Organization (CENTO) and moved its head-quarters to Ankara in recognition of Turkey's pivotal role in the organization.

Fearing that Iran would be next in line after Iraq, the shah called for CENTO to become a more effective organization. CENTO's resources were limited, however. Turkey had the largest force among the CENTO countries, but its forces had been assigned to NATO. The coup that the shah feared might take place in Iran occurred in Turkey on 27 May 1960.

Far from affecting relations with Iran, the coup in Turkey actually helped improve relations between the two neighbors. The shah was apprehensive over prime minister Adnan Menderes's attempts to bring about a rapprochement with Moscow during the last few months of his rule. After the coup, he was reassured by the first official statement of the ruling junta (the National Unity Committee) that Turkey remained fully attached to NATO and CENTO. To demonstrate his trust and support, the shah stopped at İstanbul's Yeşilköy Airport for a few hours on his way back from a European trip on 29 May 1960, just two days after the coup, where he met with some of the members of the ruling junta.

The most important issue in the relationship of the Committee of National Unity with the shah during the early 1960s was stiffening CENTO's military capabilities.

Appraisal of the Period

I. THE INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENT AND DYNAMICS

The atmosphere of the 1960s and the 1970s provided new opportunities for countries like Turkey to enjoy a substantial degree of relative autonomy.

The Slackening of the Cold War

The bipolar world continued to be the main feature of the period. Nonetheless, the rigidities of the system were beginning to break down and giving way to détente under the influence of factors such as the balance of terror brought on by nuclear weapons and an acceptance of the status quo by both sides. As a result of all this, the two blocs entered into negotiations to secure Mutual and Balanced Reduction of Forces and later got involved in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), which culminated in the 1975 Helsinki Final Act, a document that embodied détente (Box 5-1).

Another factor that developed even before Helsinki was the tendency for centrifugal forces to appear in both blocs. This created a climate of competition between the leaders of the blocs, which proved to be to the benefit of the medium and small countries within the blocs as well as the nonaligned countries, by allowing them to exercise greater independence. As the leaders of the blocs found it harder to control their smaller countries, they improved their relations with the countries of the opposing bloc in order to undermine their opponents. To cite an example, because Moscow frowned on Romania's industrialization, that country started receiving economic support from Britain and France. The U.S. was providing loans to Poland, Hungary, and Yugoslavia. Turkey also would start reaping substantial political and economic benefits from this climate of competition in the latter part of the 1960s and thereafter.

In the Western Bloc, France led the centrifugal forces, under the leadership of Charles de Gaulle, a typical nationalist. In the Eastern Bloc, the centrifugal forces resulted in a dramatic development in Czechoslovakia in 1968. Soviet tanks crushed the liberalization movement under prime minister Alexander Dubcek in that country. Unlike the suppression of the Hungarian revolt in 1956 during the darkest period of the Cold War, the suppression of the "Prague spring" had deep repercussions, leading to splits in the world's leftist movements, including those in Turkey.

The U.S. Retreat

The U.S., as the leader of the Western Bloc, lost considerable strength during this period.

The Vietnam War had worn the U.S. down, especially after the Tet offensive of February 1968. Until then, the U.S. had always appeared to be militarily successful. Now it was deeply shaken, and world public opinion began to turn. The massacre of civilians at My Lai caused an uproar all over the world, especially in the U.S. itself. President Nixon was eventually forced to abandon Vietnam. In 1969 he announced that the U.S. would no longer be the policeman of the world and that each country must fend for itself in the struggle against communism (see Box 4-3 in Section 4).

A second factor was the plight of the U.S. currency. The hoard of U.S. currency accumulated by France and other European countries and the high cost of the Vietnam War led to the devaluation of the dollar in 1971. This amounted to the collapse of the Bretton Woods system and shook international confidence in the U.S.

Third, Germany and Japan had been strengthening their economies following World War II and now were in a position to challenge the economic supremacy of the U.S.

Fourth, strong opposition to the government developed within American society itself. The Watergate scandal, in which one political party was eavesdropping on another; Nixon's lying, which forced him out of office; and the public burning of draft cards by young men who refused to go to Vietnam all led to a serious internal weakening of the U.S.

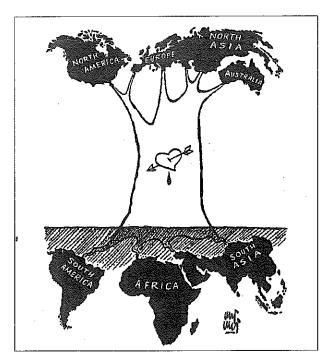

Figure 5-1. Cartoon by Ali Ulvi depicting the exploitation of the Third World by Western powers (Cumhuriyet, date unknown).

Finally, in 1979 the U.S. lost Afghanistan to the Soviet Union. More importantly, it also lost Iran, a country in which it had invested much political capital and to which it had supplied vast quantities of arms.

The Growing Strength of the USSR and the Third World

Unlike the U.S., the USSR registered important gains in the 1970s. Until then the U.S. had been the main user of foreign aid as a tool to influence developing countries. Now the USSR was beginning to use the same method to further its influence, even if less effectively than the U.S. did. It acquired military bases in the Middle East. It built aircraft carriers and sailed them into the Mediterranean. At the request of the Afghan government, it sent its army into Afghanistan and came closer to the Indian Ocean. Such moves were common U.S. practices; but when coming from the USSR, they set alarm bells ringing in the West.

Then there were the events in the aftermath of the Arab-Israeli War of 1973, when the oil-producing Arab states used the oil weapon against the West by jacking up the price to astronomical heights. The price of oil, which was three dollars per barrel in 1973, had risen to thirty dol-

Box 5-1. The CSCE (Up to 1990)

The proposal for the two blocs in Europe to seek reconciliation was first put forward by Molotov in 1954. At that time, however, the Cold War was at its peak. Under the Hallstein Doctrine, West Germany was severing its relations with those countries that recognized East Germany. But West Germany's "reunification first, détente later" formula was a nonstarter. The attempt to force the USSR to submit by resorting to policies such as "containment" and "rollback" stood no chance of success. The rule of force, which characterized the Cold War, was gradually giving way to the establishment of norms through mutual compromises (Gerger 1980). When Willy Brandt became chancellor in West Germany, he pursued the policy known as Ostpolitik from 1970 to 1973. This policy also involved recognizing West Germany's eastern frontiers through bilateral agreements signed with neighbors. This created a propitious climate for the CSCE.

In 1969 the USSR renewed its proposal for holding a European security conference, because it wanted the West to recognize the status quo in Europe and its "acquisitions" following World War II. This proposal was strongly supported by Finland, which depended on reconciliation between the East and West to continue its peaceful existence, and Poland, which wanted to see its Oder-Neisse frontier in the west formally acknowledged. The West remained cool to the idea for a long time but finally assented in order to strike at the USSR where it was at its weakest: in the field of human rights.

The negotiations got underway in 1973 and were structured to reflect the positions of the two blocs. The first "basket" of the conference dealt with European security issues in line with the wishes of the USSR, while the third basket dealt with human rights issues in line with the wishes of the West. The second basket dealt with the issues of economic, scientific-technological, and environmental cooperation.

The Helsinki Final Act that emerged from the negotiations was a delicately balanced document, approved by acclamation without a vote. Its binding force was not legal but political and moral. The parties agreed to preserve the status quo (which, for the USSR, meant acquiescing to the status quo), refrain from actions likely to impair confidence, and increase ties in fields such as human rights, culture, and education, which were of benefit to the West.

From then on the CSCE led to developments mostly in the area of the third basket. When the second summit took place in Paris in 1990, on the eve of the disintegration of the USSR, it became institutionalized within the framework of the third basket.

lars by 1980. The Arab states cut off oil deliveries to the U.S. and the Netherlands. The first oil shock and the second one that came in 1979 undermined the economic and political domination of the West for at least seven years after 1973. The West would eventually take its countermeasures and actually use the oil shocks to its advantage, thereby overcoming them in the 1980s. But the measures taken by the West were extremely detrimental to developing countries.

Box 5-2. The Nonaligned Movement: Its Rise and Fall

Nonalignment as a concept was first enunciated by Jawaharlal Nehru of India in 1946. It entered the international vocabulary in the Afro-Asian congresses of 1947 and 1949. When the Korean War broke out in 1950, Yugoslavia, Egypt, and India declared that they were nonaligned. The movement first came to life at the Bandung Conference in 1955, because of the split between those who were pro-West and pro-East.

The nonaligned movement went through four phases.

- 1. Formation (1960–65): in this phase the nonaligned movement profited from East-West rivalries and followed independent policies based on peaceful coexistence. They supported national liberation movements and gathered strength as new countries became independent. Splits appeared in the ranks of the nonaligned countries even during this period owing to their differing backgrounds.
- 2. Temporary setback (1965–70): the Cold War was going through a lull, and differences among the nonaligned countries were beginning to surface. Military coups were causing internal difficulties. Among the movement's leaders, Nehru died in 1964, President Sukarno of Indonesia was overthrown in 1965, and Kwarne Nkrumah of Ghana was overthrown in 1966.
- 3. Development and maturity (1970–80). The first petroleum shock in 1973 brought nonalignment to the foreground. The colonies were by now independent, and the movement could no longer be based on decolonization. At the Algiers Conference of 1973, the main agenda item was economic development. At the 1961 Belgrade Conference, the concepts of fair terms of trade (meaning that the prices of raw materials and manufactured goods should not operate against developing countries), Stabex (Stabilization-Exports, a fund to stabilize the prices of raw materials), and the elimination of restrictions on the exports of the developing countries were introduced. Gradually, the rich-North and the poor-South divide would replace the East-West divide. The concept of the New International Economic Order (NIEO) was elaborated and then developed within the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD). In an atmosphere in which the Arab-Israeli dispute was dormant and the Vietnam War had ended, the nonaligned countries forced the developed countries to convene a "North-South Dialogue" conference in Paris in 1975.

At the same time, however, the movement was being undermined from within. As a consequence of the 1973 oil shock, the movement was split between those that had oil and the rest, bringing about the concept of the "fourth world." More and more divisive disputes were emerging among the unaligned nations, such as the Ethiopia/Eritrea and the Vietnam/Khmer Rouge conflicts. There was also a big ideological argument over whether the movement should give priority to the anti-imperialist struggle or to attaining global peace. During this same period the emergence of the European Community and China was diluting the rigidity of the bipolar world.

4. The fall (1980 and thereafter): the West had overcome the oil shock and added the extra costs to the prices of the products that the developing countries had to produce from that source, The USSR was no longer in a position to provide generous aid. One of the leaders of the movement, Tito of Yugoslavia, was dead, and Egypt had joined the Pax Americana as a result of the Camp David agreement. New international developments such as the events in Poland and Afghanistan and the dismantling of the apartheid regime in South Africa occurred without the involvement of the nonaligned countries. The nonaligned were gradually submitting to the IMF.

Nonalignment emerged as a result of the USSR's interruption of the second globalization stage (imperialism, beginning in the 1870s) for a period of roughly fifty years. At the stage when the nonaligned movement appeared strongest, the third globalization started, and the movement began crumbling (see Box Intro-7 in the Introduction).

(B. ORAN)

Finally, the nonaligned movement (Box 5-2) took advantage of the existence of two antagonistic blocs and allowed the former colonies to take their place in the international arena as a third force. This new force helped strengthen the Eastern Bloc, although the movement harbored no particular sympathy with its ideology, and weakened the Western Bloc. Furthermore, it brought a new dimension to international politics, which until then had consisted of two basic strategies: isolationism and military alliances. Now nonalignment became a subsystem and brought a new climate of greater equality and democracy to international relations.

The World Economy and Social Developments

The 1960s and the early 1970s were years of rapid economic growth for the world, which was finally overcoming the setback of World War II. In Europe, West Germany in particular achieved high rates of growth, which eliminated unemployment in that country. Germany now found itself in need of foreign unskilled labor to sustain its high growth rate.

There was a parallel loosening up in social mores. People began to shake off the collective conservatism that developed during the times of crisis. In the 1950s the U.S. was under the baneful influence of McCarthyism, and on U.S. beaches even two-piece bathing suits were frowned upon. Now the same U.S. introduced the world to the hippie culture and underwent a sexual revolution. The music of the Beatles became an international rage. The student revolution originated in French universities in May 1968. Under the slogan "It is forbidden to forbid," it upset all authoritarian values and helped spread an unrestrained version of freedom bordering on anarchism all over the world. It was impossible for this climate not to find its expression in international politics. This happened

A. The Economy

The following trends can be discerned in Uluğbay's table (Table 5-2; see Box 2-1 in Section 2).

- 1. The GNP registered a steady increase. Up to 1971, and especially up to 1969, this increase was not due to inflation, because the rate of inflation up to 1971 was fluctuating at relatively low levels. The inflation rate was 1.2% in 1964 and 3.2% in 1968. These low, single-digit rates were registered for the first time since World War II. The rise in the GDP reflected the buoyancy of the economy, resulting from the transition to a planned economy after the establishment of the State Planning Organization (Devlet Planlama Teşkilatı: DPT). Turkey was growing and developing.
- 2. After 1970 there was a rising trend in all of the data due to increasing inflation. Inflation rose to double digits in 1971 and hit 107.2% in 1980. After this, the deficit in the balance of trade became substantial. During this period exports increased by a factor of 814, while imports increased by a factor of 15.6.

The ratio of foreign trade to GNP was high in the early part of the period but decreased steadily thereafter until 1969; it started increasing again and showed some fluctuations toward the end of the period. The exchange rate of 9 TL to the U.S. dollar was realistic until 1970 and helped boost exports, while imports increased due to the growing investment requirements of the planned economy. The average ratio of foreign trade to GNP for the whole period was 11.8%.

Another reason for increased imports was the high volume of weapons and defense equipment procured from foreign sources. During this period of the planned economy, a policy of industrialization through import substitution (IIS) was implemented. The IIS policy of the 1923–39 period was designed to induce the local manufacture of basic commodities such as sugar, textile, and appliances without resorting to foreign capital and using local inputs. In this period from 1961 to 1980, however, Turkey could no longer rely exclusively on its own resources. The IIS policies of this period were designed to secure the local manufacture of durable consumer goods such as refrigerators, which required cooperation with foreign capital and was heavily dependent on foreign inputs (Gülalp, p. 36). In 1976 the ratio of foreign inputs in production amounted to 44% by value (Cem Alpar, Çokuluslu Şirketler ve Ekonomik Kalkınma [Ankara: İTİA, 1977], p. 155, mentioned in Gerger 1998, p. 118). Even before the oil crisis, 95% to 97% of Turkey's imports consisted of capital goods, intermediate goods, and raw materials (Keyder 1990, pp. 127–28).

The increase in foreign debts is more pronounced, rising by a factor of 16.3. Most of the debt was incurred to finance the import of defense needs and meet the external cost of investments. The foreign debt to GNP ratio varied between 7.6% and 23%, with the average for the whole period being 14.6%. By international standards, this was not a very heavy burden. Nevertheless, there were difficulties in servicing this debt toward the end of the period.

3. After 1970 came a sudden jump in the rate of inflation, in the exchange rate of the Turkish currency to the dollar, in imports, and in the foreign debt stock, even though the oil shock was some way off. These increases were a direct result of the populist policies of the day, which included hefty wage and salary raises, agricultural subsidies, and so forth. To this would be added the effects of the oil shock in 1973.

We can now examine the economic history of the period (unless otherwise specified, the following summary is drawn from Gürsel, vol. 2, pp. 479–85 and 494–506).

The Years of Growth

In the beginning of this period, the 27 May Administration (see Box 5-4 on page 401) established the State Planning Organization (DPT). As in other fields, this move was a reaction to the policies of the overthrown Democratic Party (DP), which were characterized by unplanned management of the economy. With the passage into the period of a planned economy, a carefully redesigned IIS policy would come into effect to replace the IIS policies that the DP government had been compelled to adopt because of the shortage of foreign exchange, the bottlenecks in foreign trade, and the resulting shortage of supplies and spare parts.

As explained above, the implementation of IIS policies required imports and considerable external financial resources. There was no question of giving up investments that were essential for development. The Second Five-Year Plan had foreseen reaching a stage whereby economic growth could be maintained beyond 1973 (which was the final year of that plan) without recourse to external borrowing.

This expectation failed to materialize. The trend in balance of payments during 1968 started irritating the IMF. No belt tightening took place, however, because 1969 was an election year. Following the election, on 10 August 1970, the currency was devalued by 66%. The dollar was now worth 15 TL, and new measures like tax rebates were adopted to encourage exports. New taxes were imposed and existing taxes raised. This was like an exact replica of the devaluation of 1958.

The government was careful to avoid short-term borrowing, however. Most of the borrowing was by the public rather than the private sector. Also, most of the borrowing was from international organizations and governments on favorable terms, rather than from international money markets, where higher rates of interest prevailed. With the conclusion of the Ankara Agreement with the EEC on 1 December 1964, the European influence began to balance the U.S. influence on the Turkish economy. As the plan was being implemented effectively again, the borrowing terms improved. Furthermore, there was a spurt in exports after the devaluation of 1970.

At this stage, an element came into play that had not been foreseen in the First Five-Year Plan. Workers who had been going to work in Germany in increasing numbers after 1965 started remitting their savings to Turkey at levels that were of great significance for the economy. From a trickle consisting of only 2% of Turkey's export earnings, these remittances had reached a level of 50% by 1970-71 and attained 90% by 1973 (Sönmez, pp. 60 and 70). The foreign exchange derived from this source covered 154% of the deficit in foreign trade (Keyder 1990, p. 152). In these circumstances, the government was able to do what had not been possible in the course of IIS policies implemented from 1930 to 1939: to create a mass of consumers capable of absorbing the goods that were being produced by the new bourgeoisie, an essential ingredient of any successful IIS policy. This was achieved by providing high salaries and wages and generous social rights and benefits.

The Slump and Its Causes

After 1973 a string of negative developments took place.

First, there was the sudden oil shock, which had grievous effects on Turkey. While workers' remittances were falling, the price of oil increased four-fold, and Turkey's import bill soared. Remittances fell because Western European countries were heavily dependent on oil (90% of which was imported from the Middle East) and were obliged to adopt belt-tightening policies. Turkish labor was mainly located in these countries, which accounted for most of Turkey's foreign trade. As a consequence, workers' remittances were able to cover only 39% of the trade deficit in 1975 and 24% in 1977 (Keyder 1990, p. 152). The country's foreign exchange reserves were exhausted in one year because of the oil bill. The level of the oil bill rose from 16.8% of export earnings to 49.1%.

A second negative development was the high cost of the Cyprus operation carried out in 1974.

The third development was the imposition by the U.S. of an arms embargo on Turkey in 1975 because of Cyprus. The ending of military aid inflicted considerable damage to the already reeling economy.

In the period from 1960 to 1973 Turkey had gotten used to enjoying the benefits conferred by remittances and cheap energy. The new developments shook the country, with the rate of growth in the manufacturing sector shrinking from 10.2% during those years to 8.3% in 1973–76 and then to 2.1% in 1976–79 (Keyder 1990, p. 165).

These were the external reasons for Turkey's economic deterioration after 1973. But the main reason for the collapse of the economic order was the contradiction that existed within the economy. After the shortages in the Turkish market registered in the second part of the 1950s, the DP government started supporting private enterprise and encouraged it to produce for the internal market to alleviate the shortages. When this policy was pursued in a planned manner and on a larger scale after 1960, the bourgeoisie reaped huge profils. Industry was operating without competition in a protected internal market, so it neglected quality while charging high prices. It was also benefiting from numerous incentives, so there was no need for it to strain itself in export markets. Turkish industry was importing voraciously and using up foreign exchange, while it failed to earn foreign exchange because of its unwillingness to export. It was able to keep going only thanks to the IIS policies and foreign borrowing.

Even if military aid is ignored, Turkey received foreign aid and loans that covered no less than 42% of its external deficit during the period from 1950 to 1980. This was due entirely to its geostrategic importance. The bourgeoisie, of course, had no reason for complaining. But this ability to spend unearned foreign exchange allowed Turkey the luxury of not developing an "export at all costs" mentality (Akat, p. 63), which inexorably led to the eventual economic collapse.

The Foreign Debt Spiral

The negative developments could not be allowed to interrupt the growth that had been taking place since 1960. Somehow Turkey had to find the foreign exchange needed for it to continue importing. It is true that Soviet external aid and loans became available after 1967, making it possible to carry out important industrial projects that the West had refused to finance. But, because of this Soviet aid, there was an extra bill approaching $1 billion, which the IMF and the OECD could not be expected to finance. Turkey had no choice but to resort to international capital markets. It was in these circumstances that Turkey contracted its short-term debts, which raised its indebtedness to extraordinary heights and completely changed the structure of its debts. At that time, the petrodollars accumulated by oil-producing countries that were deposited in international banks were lent on a short-term basis and with high interest to indigent developing countries. Turkey got its share of these loans. This brought the IMF into the picture, because in these circumstances banks looked to that institution before lending to a country and awaited the IMF's green light before committing their funds (see Box 4-1 in Section 4).

The Demirel government, in power from 1975 to 1977, was formed with the aim of keeping the Left at bay. It was known as the Nationalist Front-1 government and was intent on consolidating its power by finding new sources of foreign exchange. To do this, it carried out thirteen minidevaluations of the currency in two years and resorted to risky formulas like the deposits convertible to foreign exchange (ACFE). By 31 December 1975 these accounts constituted 98.4% of the country's foreign exchange reserves (Yalçın Doğan, IMF Kıskacında Türkiye, 1946–1980, 3rd ed. [İstanbul: Tekin Yayınevi, 1987], p. 131, quoted in Gerger 1998, p. 125). The ACFE system enabled nonresident individuals and institutions to deposit their foreign exchange in Turkish bank accounts and to take the proceeds of these accounts out of the country. The owners of the accounts could also withdraw the funds in the ACFEs in the form of foreign exchange or TL at any time. These accounts resulted in an increase in the money supply and were a major cause of inflation. Because the IMF was not formally engaged in Turkey at the time, the extra funds were spent on populist causes. As a result, exports grew from \$1.3 billion in 1973 only to over \$1.7 billion in 1977, while the corresponding figures for imports were \$2 billion and \$5.8 billion. After a month-long government formed by Ecevit in 1977, Demirel formed the Nationalist Front-2 government. By then, the foreign trade deficit stood at \$4 billion and foreign debts exceeded \$11 billion. Almost \$1.5 billion was required to service this debt. It was in these circumstances that Demirel uttered his famous phrase: "Turkey doesn't have even seventy cents to spare." There was no way out, except to reschedule the foreign debt. In the meantime Ecevit was able to form a new government in January 1978, with the defection of a number of deputies from the Justice Party. In order to demonstrate that he was acting independently of the IMF, his first action was to devalue the Turkish currency to 25  $\mathrm{TL}$ to the U.S. dollar and raise the prices of the products of state economic enterprises. In these circumstances, the IMF approved Turkey's new letter of intent, although with some U.S. prodding. Through informal channels, however, the IMF had given a negative message to banks, which led them to withhold new credits. In 1978 inflation reached 52.6%, and a black market emerged. Meanwhile the deficit in the state budget and the losses of state economic enterprises reached new peaks. There were shortages of staples such as salt, cooking oil, light bulbs, and cigarettes. Cooking gas and gasoline became scarce, and Ecevit and his ministers scurried from Germany to Libya, looking for relief.

When the Iranian revolution took place, Turkey's geostrategic importance increased once again. The West was ready to provide new aid, but it proved impossible to persuade the IMF to ignore its rules. Turkey went through the winter of 1978-79 short of petroleum. A new standby agreement was eventually signed on 10 June 1979, and the currency was devalued to 47 TL to the dollar. The rate for importing agricultural products and petroleum was set at 35 TL to the dollar. It was in these circumstances that Ecevit's party suffered a defeat in the partial election, forcing him to resign. Demirel formed a minority government and adopted the 24 January package of measures. He was now implementing policies favored by the IMF, which entailed abandoning the IIS strategy and adopting new export-led growth policies and integrating the country with the global economy (Box 5-3). This radical economic restructuring program, however, was based on shifting the burden to the lower-income groups. It was impossible to carry out such a radical program of economic and social measures within a parliamentary system.

These measures were implemented in the conditions created by the 12 September 1980 coup, designed to deal with the anarchy, which had reached extreme levels of violence. It now became possible to carry out the new economic program under the new conditions, which became known as the "24 + 12 formula" with reference to 24 January and 12 September.

B. Politics

The period from 1960 to 1980 witnessed some of the most important events in Turkey's history, including three military coups. The period was one of great diversity, including intervals of dictatorship and others of pluralism and freedom.

Box 5-3. The Package of Measures Adopted on 24 January 1980

The package of measures adopted on 24 January 1980 has a special place among the agreements that Turkey concluded with the IMF when it was in a situation of semibankruptcy due to its external debts and poor economic management. The poor management was reflected in the huge budget deficits, which were a result of the populist policies pursued by the government in a period of increasing domestic turmoil. The pegging of the Turkish currency to the dollar and the decision not to reflect increased oil prices in the internal market were both part of this poor economic management.

At first sight, the 24 January package appeared to be similar to past IMF programs. The Turkish lira was devalued from 47 to the dollar to 70. There were hefty price increases on the products of state economic enterprises. The price of fertilizer was raised sevenfold, and postal services fourfold. The price of sugar went up by 170%, petroleum products by 200%, electricity by 153%, and paper by 104%. It was announced that monetary policy would be tightened, agricultural support prices would be lowered to world levels, the state economic enterprises would set their prices for their products freely, all public spending (with the exception of public spending on infrastructure) would be cut, rates of interest would be raised, and wages would be frozen. The Turkish currency would be allowed to float, and an effort would be made to service the external debt on schedule. As a first step, interest rates were freed.

The importance of these measures was that they constituted a package with the economic measures adopted after the coup of 12 September 1980. The measures were designed to secure the management of the economy in accordance with the rules of the market and constituted a "structural adjustment" program that would bring fundamental changes in the economic, financial, institutional, social, and political fields. International capitalism was gaining strength (since 1970 under the banner of "globalization") and was demanding the changes known as structural adjustment.

From this point of view, the 24 January measures were a defining moment in the life of the Turkish Republic, with implications that went far beyond the strictly economic sphere. In one stroke, Turkey changed from the industrialization through import substitution (IIS) model, which had been in practice since the early days of the Republic, to an export-led industrialization model. The objective was to integrate Turkey with the global free market.

The architect of the project was Turgut Özal, undersecretary of the prime minister's office and acting undersecretary of the State Planning Organization. The package had been prepared without the knowledge of even the minister of finance. Its implementation caused much discontent among the people. In normal circumstances it should have drawn loud protests from the populace, but the military coup of 12 September prevented this, The perpetrators of the coup made sure that the measures could be fully implemented without a hitch by taking appropriate action, including the suspension of collective bargaining. The 24 January package of measures could not have been implemented without the coup of 12 September, and it has often been argued that one of the reasons for the coup was to make this implementation possible.

The structural adjustment program was implemented with great discipline and yielded good results in the early stages. But the new economy based on annuities ended up by squeezing the middle class and low-income groups. The dollar, which was worth 70 TL when the program was launched, was worth 14,000 TL when Özal died in 1993 and had reached 1,350,000 TL by the beginning of 2001. The Turkish economy had become completely dependent on the policies of international financial circles (see "Appraisal of the Period" in Sections 6 and 7).

(B. ORAN) (Source: Gürsel, vol. 2, pp. 504–6; AnaBritannica, vol. 22, pp. 412–13)

Paradoxically, the period of pluralism and freedom was inaugurated by the military coup of 27 May 1960 (Boxes 5-4 and 5-5).

At a time when Turkey had not gotten used to democracy, two dynamic new forces entered the scene: students and workers. They were capable of engaging in protest and resistance actions, which governments found difficult to handle (Özdemir, p. 225).

From Democracy to "Double 12"

The workers were seeking to become an effective pressure group by taking advantage of the rights conferred by the 1961 Constitution, including the right to strike. In this action, they were inspired by the Confederation of Revolutionary Workers' Unions (DİSK). The factor that caused the overthrow of the DP government was student action in which the leftist groups critical of the system were particularly active. The Left lashed out at two targets: (1) "the feudal system" and "feudal landlords"; and (2) the restrictions on Turkey's sovereignty caused by U.S. influence, and especially the mining and petroleum laws (see "Politics" in "Appraisal of the Period" in Section 4). In the mid-1960s there was a strong craving for new ideas in the universities, which were going through a period of great vitality and vibrancy. In 1965 rightist students attacked a lecture being delivered by the leader of the Turkish Labor Party (TTP), Mehmet Ali Aybar, at the Faculty of Political Science of Ankara University and destroyed the furniture in the hall. This event led to a period of confrontation and conflict between the two groups.

The slogans of the Left were anti-imperialism and antifascism. The Kemalist tradition was very strong at the time, and the Left was being fueled by a Kemalism with a strong social content, which can also be described as the nationalism of a developing country. In those days, it took real courage to criticize capitalism directly, so the young criticized the prevailing order indirectly by castigating the U.S. This was made easy by President Johnson's letter to

Box 5-4. The 27 May Coup

As the state of the economy worsened, the Democratic Party (DP) government adopted more repressive measures. When a committee was formed within the parliament to investigate the activities of the opposition Republican People's Party (CHP), student demonstrations broke out in Istanbul and Ankara. As the government's measures became more repressive, a bloodless coup took place on the night of 26–27 May 1960. The coup was engineered by a group of officers, organized under the name National Unity Committee (MBK). The MBK placed a ban on all political activities, dissolved the parliament, and sacked the government. It directed a group of professors to prepare a new Constitution, which was subsequently approved by a Constituent Assembly and by the citizens in a referendum. After the election of 1961, the MBK turned power over to the civilians.

Of the three coups that Turkey experienced, this one had unique features. It had no intellectual preparation, no leader (Gen. Cemal Gürsel was selected as leader later), and no cadres. Its structure was not hierarchical and consisted mostly of young officers. The coup was a reaction of Kemalist officers and was motivated by (1) disapproval of the DP's drift toward dictatorship; (2) dissatisfaction with the social, economic, and cultural ravages caused by the unplanned, haphazard policies of the DP (the excesses of the nouveaux riches, the lax approach to homosexuality in places of entertainment, Americanization, growth of squatter housing, and so on); (3) reaction against the loss of status of the bureaucracy and especially the military (e.g., the erosion of salaries due to inflation and the derision heaped on officers who could only afford soft drinks in restaurants, Menderes's remark that he could run the army with just reserve officers).

The most remarkable feature of the military coup was that it brought about the most democratic Constitution (the 1961 Constitution) that Turkey had ever seen and inaugurated the most democratic era in the country's political life. The universities experienced the only interlude of freedom from 1964 to 1968. Before that, they had been subjected to the pressures of the state and of society; and after that, they became victims of the anarchy that prevailed and the repression that was designed to deal with the anarchy.

This was the reason why the students of that period, known as the '68 Generation, were later lionized. They had sincerely believed that they could cure all of Turkey's and even the world's ills.

The CNU's members were far from being leftists. The only one among them who knew what he was doing because of his ideological leaning was Col. Alparslan Türkeş, who upon his retirement became the leader of the racist Right. But thanks to the free environment that the coup introduced, a left-leaning Kemalism developed that was severely critical of the established order. This tendency was well represented by the weekly Yôn, which revealed scandals such as the people who survived on food not fit for human consumption and the American colonel who went unpunished after killing a pedestrian while driving. Such stories shocked readers of the journal and especially the students. Yôn also probed the hardships caused by inequality by waving the statist/anticapitalism flag, which it did indirectly through its anti-American and anti-imperialist stand.

Yet the coup of 27 May was received without undue excitement by the industrial bourgeoisle and the U.S. The industrial bourgeoisle sought and obtained a larger share of scarce resources, which were being squandered in the name of populism. These resources would then be employed to carry out IIS policies that the bourgeoisle knew could not be carried out by the likes of Menderes. The U.S. was indifferent to the collapse of the regime. It may even have precipitated its demise; If only indirectly (see Box 5-5 below).

The heady atmosphere of freedom brought on by the coup of 27 May would lead first to anarchy in the late 1960s and then to the coups of 12 March 1971 and 12 September 1980. The reasons for this were the inability to carry out IIS policies at a time of economic collapse, the resort to arms by leftlist groups that were deluded about their actual strength, the violence of the right-ist movements, and, probably, the provocation of certain covert forces (see Box 7-5 in Section 7).

(B. ORAN)

Inönü in 1964 in connection with the Cyprus crisis. In the demonstrations and meetings, their target was the young politician Demirel, who had campaigned and won the 1965 election by distributing photographs of himself in the company of President Johnson. The students considered him the embodiment of American domination, and their slogan was "Sixth Fleet, go home." They also chanted his name as "Morrison Süleyman," a reference to the American contracting company that Demirel represented in Turkey before going into politics.

When fourteen members of the ruling junta that came to power on 27 May started advocating staying in power indefinitely, they were removed from the junta and sent to foreign assignments. Among these fourteen was Col. Alparslan Türkeş, whose real name was Hüseyin Feyzullah. When he returned to Turkey, he joined the Republican Peasant Nation Party (CKMP) in March 1965 and was elected party leader in August. The party's name was changed to Nationalist Action Party (MHP) in 1969. Türkeş organized the youth group known as the Ülkücüler (Idealists), also known as Bozkurtlar (Gray Wolves) or Komandolar (Commandos), who started taking over the political scene, hitherto dominated by the Left, through the use of brute force.

At that time, the Left was drawing its strength from foreign events that weakened the established order: American influence on developments in Cyprus, the Tet offensive of 1968, and the student unrest in France. As the Left grew stronger, it was also becoming fragmented. The Soviet intervention in Czechoslovakia in 1968 caused a split between the more orthodox "socialist revolutionary" TIP and the "National Democratic Revolutionary" Dev-Genç (Devrimci Gençlik: Revolutionary Youth), which declared the USSR to be "social imperialist." The

Box 5-5. The 27 May Coup and the United States

Much has been said and written about the U.S. role in the 27 May coup. The most plausible information can be summarized as follows.

- 1. At a time when everybody was aware that student protests would lead nowhere and that a military coup was imminent, the U.S. failed to warn Menderes through the CIA and allowed events to follow their natural course. The U.S. even accelerated the regime's fall by cutting off credits at a time when it was in greatest need of financial support.
- 2. The U.S. action took place because the Western aid and loans furnished to Menderes for waving the anticommunism flag were being wasted and the regime had reached the end of the line. At some point Menderes realized that the economy could not be made to function without new industries. This led him to seek alternatives to the U.S., which was against Turkey's industrialization, and to appeal to the USSR for credits. The U.S. was not pleased to see Turkey seeking to produce and sell textiles in lieu of cotton; nor did it appreciate the forthcoming visit of Menderes to Moscow, which it considered divisive for the Western bloc (for Zorlu's role in the Moscow visit, see Yetkin, pp. 62–66). During this period no effort was made to stop dissident officers and officials working in U.S. and NATO offices in Turkey from printing and distributing antigovernment tracts or from participating in demonstrations.
- 3. In addition to failing to warn Menderes of the coup, the U.S. also failed, although indirectly, to exercise a right given to it by the bilateral agreements. The Turkish-American Security Cooperation Agreement of 5 March 1959 referred to the Eisenhower Doctrine of 5 January 1957, which declared that the U.S. would provide armed assistance in the event of a request from a Middle Eastern country, subject to an armed attack from international communism. Although the doctrine referred to "an armed attack," the preamble and first article of the agreement stated that a "direct or indirect" attack on Turkey would lead the U.S. to take all the necessary measures, "including the use of armed force." This term "indirect attack" could lead, at the request of the government, to an American armed intervention even in cases of student unrest. It was this clause that led to sharp criticism of the opposition when the agreement came to the TGNA for ratification, as already mentioned. When the U.S. failed to warn Menderes of the coup, the possibility of a request for assistance was thus eliminated.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs declared that "U.S. armed assistance would be forthcoming even in cases of indirect aggression, and that this also applied to covert and subversive" activities. Furthermore, according to one source, on 9 May 1960, eighteen days before the coup and at a time when antigovernment demonstrations were being held on a daily basis, an agreement had been signed that "authorized the Pentagon to Intervene in extraordinary circumstances" (STMA, p. 1968). This raises the question of why the U.S. would conclude such an agreement if it did not intend to intervene. It must not be forgotten that the decision to intervene rested ultimately with the U.S. Article 1 of the agreement of 5 January 1957 referred to "all necessary actions in conformity with the U.S. Constitution."

The coup-makers must have been aware of these agreements and fearful of a U.S. intervention, because they issued a declaration on the morning of the coup that was repeatedly broadcast on their behalf by Col. Alparsian Türkes. He stressed the following famous passage: "We remain faithful to all our alliances and commitments. We believe in and remain attached to NATO and CENTO" (Hürriyet, 27 May 1960).

(B. ORAN)

leftists were taking over universities. At the Middle East Technical University, they burned the limousine of U.S. ambassador Robert Komer on 6 January 1969. The rightist Ülkücüler and the religion-based Akıncılar (Raiders) movement came together under the umbrella of the Association of the Anti-Communist Struggle (Komünizmle Mücadele Dernekleri: KMD). These developments led to a violent Left-Right conflict after 1969, which brought the country to a state of anarchy. On 16 February 1969 groups belonging to the KMD left the mosque after prayers and were allowed by the police to enter Taksim Square in Istanbul, where a protest demonstration against the American Sixth Fleet was going on. In the resulting melee, known as "Bloody Sunday," a number of leftists were killed or injured.

In addition to the Left-Right confrontation among students, a workers' march was organized by the revolutionary union DİSK on 15–16 June 1970 in İstanbul to protest the law on labor unions. The 150,000 workers who took part in the demonstration inflicted damage to property and caused the industrial bourgeoisie to take fright. These events led to the military memorandum of 12 March 1971 (Box 5-6).

The armed clashes did not come to an end with the restrictions on freedoms imposed by the 12 March memorandum. If anything, they increased during the Nationalist Front-1 government set up by S. Demirel with rightist parties that lasted from March 1975 to June 1977. The situation did not change with the formation of the Nationalist Front-2 government, from November 1977 to January 1978. The deputy prime minister, Türkeş, described the attacks of the Ülkücüler (who now came to be known as Komandolar) on leftists as "being helpful to the security forces" (Millet Meclisi Tutanak Dergisi, term 4, vol. 11, meeting II, session 63 [9 April 1975], p. 368). By 1977 people's lives were in danger on the streets as well as at home. The economy was in a state of collapse mainly as a result of the oil shock of 1973. Three devaluations took place in 1977. The May Day celebrations that year were marred when unidentified assailants widely believed to belong to the "deep state" forces (see Box 7-5 in Section 7) opened fire on the crowd from rooftops, causing thirty-four deaths.

Box 5-6. The Memorandum of 12 March and the Interim Regime

The memorandum bearing the signatures of the chief of the General Staff, Mernduh Tağmaç, and the commanders of the three services consisted of the following three paragraphs. (1) The parliament and the government have brought about a fratricidal conflict. The reforms foreseen in the Constitution have not been carried out. (2) The parliament must correct this situation in a nonpartisan way. (3) If this is not done, the armed forces will take over the administration.

The reference to reforms in the first paragraph led many to believe that the memorandum was a military coup by the progressives. In effect, the nonpartisan government of Nihat Erim, which was brought to power by the military after Demirel's resignation, had two aims: to put an end to anarchy and to carry out reforms. More than ten technocrats had been included in the cabinet for this reason. But the administration soon changed its nature and started to conform to a model that corresponded to the interesting warning that Tagmaç has been reported to have made about social awakening having gone far beyond the economic development (Yanki 1, 1 March 1971, p. 6). Martial law was decreed to deal with the bank robberies and abductions being carried out by illegal organizations. Wholesale arrests were made within the ranks of the military, the workers, and the students. As the rightist militants disappeared from the scene, those arrested consisted mostly of democrats and/or intellectuals, journalists, and academics known for their leftist leanings. Important restrictive amendments were made in the 1961 Constitution, and article in dealing with fundamental rights and freedoms was rewritten. Many lawyers interpreted these changes as amounting to the adoption of a new Constitution.

The interim regime undertook no reforms. This caused the eleven reformist ministers in the cabinet to resign on 3 December 1971. At this time, the three student leaders Deniz Gezmis, Yusuf Aslan, and Hüseyin Inan were executed for "violating the Constitution." This was interpreted as the 12 March regime's revenge for the three politicians executed by the 27 May regime for the same offense. Adnan Menderes, F. R. Zorlu, and Hasan Polatkan.

Eventually, the 12 March Memorandum sought to return the scope of new freedoms to their pre-27 May state. The memorandum was a sort of dress rehearsal for the much more dictatorial 12 September 1980 coup. The Interim regime went on, with the Ferit Melen government succeeding the Erim government. After Fahri Koruturk was elected president, Nalm Talu formed the government, and parliamentary elections were held in 1973. In January 1974 Bülent Ecevit emerged as the prime minister of the CHP and Milli Selamet Partisi (MSP: National Salvation Party (Islamist)) coalition government.

(B. ORAN)

The perpetrators were never apprehended. The assailants in a series of other murders also were never found. Although right-wing politicians like Gün Sazak and Hamit Fendoğlu were among those, killed, most of the victims were journalists and academics with democratic and/or leftist leanings. In 1978 seven youths belonging to TIP were murdered in their home in Ankara. On 19 December 1978 the rumor that "Communist Alevis had bombed a cinema" triggered a string of events in the city of Kahramanmaraş in which 105 people, most of them Alevis, were killed. In the face of these events, the government was far from being neutral. Prime Minister Demirel was quoted as saying: "You can never make me say that rightists [and] nationalists are committing murders" (Cumhuriyet, 26 December 1978). These incidents dragged into 1979, and 26 people were killed in Çorum in violence reminiscent of the sort that took place in Kahramanmaraş. In the year preceding 12 September 1980 the number of people who lost their lives as a result of politically motivated crimes reached 3,000.

As noted earlier, this anarchy developed in an environment of utter economic chaos. Although martial law was in force, there seemed to be no way to stem the anarchy. And yet law and order was immediately restored on 12 September 1980, the very day the armed forces took power. The strange situation elicited many different interpretations and comments in the years that followed (Box 5-7).

III. THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE PERIOD

The most noteworthy aspects of Uluğbay's table (Table 5-3) are the following.

- 1. During this period, exports increased by a factor of 8.4 while the share of Western countries, which were Turkey's major trading partners, dwindled from 68.8% in 1962 to 46.2%. The fall gathered pace, especially after 1974. The same trend is noticeable in Turkey's imports. After 1974 Turkey's imports increased by a factor of 15.6, while the share of Western countries decreased from 70.8% to 32.9%. This situation was a direct result of the rise in petroleum prices and the fall in the foreign aid and credits that Turkey received. As the price of oil increased, Turkey's imports from Western countries dwindled, while the share of oil-producing countries rose. The fall in foreign aid can be attributed first to the oil shock and then to the Cyprus operation. In addition to these two factors, the drop in foreign loans was due to Turkey's increasing difficulties in servicing its short-term commercial debts.
